PREFACE.

πίςις, ἐλπὶς, ἀγάπη τα τρία ταῦτα·
μείζων δὲ τούτων ἡ ἀγάπη.—1 Cor. xiii. 13.

THE transcendent dignity and overwhelming grandeur of the sublime and glorious subject of investigating the nature and attributes, the characteristics and ministrations of Holy Angels,-encompassed by the admonitory and awful silence of the Scriptures, evidently appear to have deterred even writers of philosophic research and lofty intellectual endowments, from imparting that plenitude of devotional consideration, to which, so attractive and cardinal a doctrine of divine revelation is, assuredly, entitled; to wit,-the special ministry and appointed agency of Angelic Intelligences, in reference to the wondrous economy of Redemption, and the mighty achievements of Omnipotent purpose, in executing the moral government of the universe.

A prefatory and deferential apology seems, therefore, requisite to atone for the apparently presumptuous temerity of the present production, unless justified or softened by the circumstances of its origination,—the appropriateness or fulfilment of its design.

Having prefixed, at the desire of a friend, a few remarks to the "Narrative of a Summer's Excursion, amidst the romantic and picturesque scenery of Nature," containing an allusion to a discourse touching the "Ministry of Angels," he was further requested, to contribute some observations on that inviting and majestic theme. Conscious of disqualification and the absence of all suitable and sufficient preparation for the specific consideration of so delightful and elevating a topic, the request was declined,-but, subsequent meditation led to a train of contemplation which heightened in interest and enjoyment as he pondered upon the doctrine, in the magnitude of its importance, as bearing upon the selected instrumentality and chosen medium of the condescension of Jehovah in his terrestrial intercourse and transactions with lapsed and sinful humanity, in connection with the urgent beatitude of angelic association and pursuits, -as his reflections starting from the celebration, according to the Mosaic narrative, of the Creation, proceeded, in biblical vision, along the illumed and extended vista of prophecy, the mysterious and radiant avenue of redeeming Mercy, to the apocalyptic revelations of the millennial reign and foredoomed overthrow of "the prince of the power of the air and all spiritual wickednesses," towards the final consummation of all things, at the arrival of the bright morning of the resurrection and the solemn assize of the judgment day, upon the august descent and re-appearance of "the righteous judge of the quick and the dead," attended by the resplendent retinue of heaven, to conduct the predestinated ascension of the best to the eternal mansion of celestial glory!

As regards the annexed compend, it is alike the dictate of prudence and propriety to state,—that it does not arrogate originality of ideas or extent of research; that it has been chiefly prepared, during the past few months, in those interstices of thought which have accrued in the brief intervals of a secular vocation which did not admit of a continuous or comprehensive reading, the advantageous retirement of the study, or the auxiliary exercises of the secret closet of meditation; nevertheless, in all frankness, he considers it his duty to declare,-in the hope that others may derive a similar benefit--that the mental process which it has required, together with the agreeable and instructive fellowship of the religious sentiments of the practical piety of various authors, has proved-in his own experience-peculiarly profitable,—driving away those Promethean vultures of distrust and despondency which constantly hover around the mind, whilst environed by an accumulation of uncontrollable evils,-the tormenting oppression of physical melancholy, aggravated by the cureless corrosion of internal grief, the perturbing vexations of social injustice, the inflicted wrongs of administrative turpitude and judicial malversation, the unprovoked injuries of clerical detraction and dishonor, and the mischievous devices of a Janus-faced and heartless hypocrisy.

Mr. S. T. Coleridge, with his characteristic intuition, has observed, "That the communicativeness of our nature leads us to describe our own sorrows," -an ægis which, if it do not protect the writer from the allegation of having trespassed beyond the boundary of a becoming decorum, in his figurative representation of The Escort of Angels, (including other emblematical designs,) he confidently turns for shelter, (regardless of the barbed missiles of a flippant censure or witless derision to which it may expose him,) to the remembered fidelity of the conjugal attachment of an expectant, though a disembodied affection,* as well as the sympathetic sensibility of a Christian candor-having had to traverse, unattended by earthly alleviations, amidst sickness and seclusion, desertion and dejection, darkened by the tenebrious assaults of Satanic suggestions, the via dolorosa of domestic and fraternal bereavement, as, in quick succession, from the relentless aim of the "insatiable archer," virtue of its soothing and edifying tendency, under the pressure of similar afflictive dispensations,*—the salutary and animating belief, that he was sustained-during the probationary discipline of providential appointment, by the gentle and sympathetict whispers of angel voices as they vibrated on the silver chords of the golden harp of the gospel, in unison with the melodious and enrapturing tones of divine promises and scriptural consolation.

And thrice his peace was slain"-

As behooveth him,—with reverential humility, he commends this imperfect tribute of adoring gratitude to the gracious benediction of the Great Angel of the everlasting covenant, who, whilst He tabernacled "in the flesh for us men and our salvation," singled out, from amidst the thronging multitude, by the divinity of His omniscience, the remaining mites of the widow's penury; recording on the page of inspiration, that as the offering of her repentant faith and "love

Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation ?-HEBREWs 1: 14.

The works of the Lord are great, sought out of all them that have pleasure therein. Psalm cxi. 2.-

INVOKING the guiding afflatus of that sacred Inspiration which animated the fervid exclamation of the pious and philosophic Psalmist, whilst contemplating in the secret chamber of rapt meditation, the mighty and mysterious operations of Jehovah, displayed in the wondrous works of the visible creation, the retributive procedures of a special providence, the revealed and prophetic glories connected with the gracious economy of Redemption-would we seek to introduce-by a few preliminary observations, sustained by the collated remarks and collateral opinions of diverse authors to the reader's serious and believing attention, the ennobling and inviting subject attempted in the succeeding pages, prompted by the sincere desire and humble hope, that it may be canvassed in such a manner, as in no wise to invalidate its manifest attractions, elevating sublimity, consolatory support, devotional and edifying tendency.

That a theme, so pregnant with the noblest sentiments and divinest considerations should have been treated with such marked indifference, cannot certainly be justified, on the alleged plea, that the perversion or abuse of any doctrine revealed in the volume of Inspiration, founded either upon the danger of the idolatrous or interdicted worship of angels, or, the impenetrable mysteriousness by which it is enveloped to our finite reason and degenerated faculties; and which disregard is fully substantiated, not merely by the prevailing slight of professing believers in the Bible, but also corroborated by the printed testimony of several pious, learned, and distinguished theologians who have adorned the various denominations of our common Christianity.

In a scarce, valuable, and anonymous treatise entitled "Pneumatologia,* or a Discourse on Angels," published in the year 1701, from the pen of a writer, who, to the rare endowment of a lucid judgment, unites the erudition of the scholar, the acuteness of the philosopher, the piety of a saint, and occasionally, the persuasive eloquence of the rhetorician; in a well written recommendatory preface by a Mr. George Hammond, the following appropriate remarks occur: "The subject here undertaken to be treated upon, is certainly very high and noble in itself, and exceedingly useful for us, to be acquainted withal, in regard there is so much spoken of the angels and their ministry in the Holy Scriptures. For that which is written therein, is written for our learning. It is then a matter which deserves to be soberly inquired into. What may be the reason why the Scripture-

THOMAS HEYWOOD, Hierarchie of the Angells, 1653.

There seems to have been in the kingdom of Judah an uninterrupted contest between the worshippers of Jehovah and those of idols, resisting all the appeals of their prophets, the miracles of Elijah and Elisha, the judgments of God, the continued fulfillment of various predictions, and every other evidence of the truth of their Scriptures.-DR. GEORGE TOWNSEND, Notes on Witch of Endor.

The history of the Jews is the record of a continual struggle between pure Theism supported by the most terrible sanctions, and the strangely fascinating desire of having some visible and tangible object of adoration. Upon the same principle or inclination may be explained, the strong tendency of the multitude in all ages and nations, to idolatry.-MACAULAY'S Review of Milton.

The angelical nature, though it is a secret for the most part to us till we come to heaven; yet it is such a secret as we may modestly inquire into and seek to know so far as it is revealed, either in nature or the Scriptures.—Pneumatologia.

* I beg to avail myself of this opportunity, to tender my respectful acknowledgments to the Rev. Mr. Cady for his obliging permission to consult some curious old theological tomes belonging to the library of the Episcopal Theological Seminary, which were not to be met with in any other of the public libraries of this city.

doctrine concerning angels is no more attended to? For it is, in our time, but sparingly treated upon; and not so frequently and deeply in the thoughts of Christians, as it should be; and consequently not improved by the children of God to their growth in faith, holiness, and comfort as might be. Let me be pardoned, if I offer my conjecture in two instances (1.) The bold, curious, and confident speculations touching the angels, both in elder times, and in the days of the schoolmen, who intruded into things not seen, vainly puffed up by their fleshly minds. This makes way for a voluntary humility, and issued in the worshipping of angels. And some (it is probable), that they might avoid this rock, have thought it dangerous to be inquisitive into these things, which are taught in the Scripture of Truth concerning them. (2). The irreligiousness and skepticism of materialists and sadducees, who deny, or pretend to doubt whether there are, indeed, any immaterial beings, at all. And if there be no separate spirits, as to their existence, there can be nothing spoken, concerning such, that is to be regarded." Further adding: "The worthy author, how much soever he extols the dignity of angels and their wonderful properties, yet he still leaves them and their ministrations under the sovereign will and command of God, and Jesus Christ their head, to whom they devote themselves and their services."

Archbishop Tillotson observes, "The doctrine of angels is not a peculiar one of the Jewish or Christian religion, but the general doctrine of all religions that ever were, and therefore cannot be objected against by any but atheists. And yet I know not whence it comes to pass, that this great truth, which is so comfortable to mankind, is so very little understood by us. Perhaps the corruption of so great a part of the Christian church in the point of worshipping the angels, may have run us so far into the other extreme, as scarcely to acknowledge any benefit by them. But surely, we may believe they do us good without any obligation to pray to them; and may own them as the ministers of God's providence without making them the objects of our worship."

The first great errors that infested the Christian Church were those of the Gnostics, who pretended into a very sublime yvwots, or Mystic Theology, which was no other than a corrupt complex of Orphic, Pythagoric, and Judaic infusion.-GALE, Court of the Gentiles, 1676.

The devout Bishop Hall, likewise, respecting the neglect of this sublime and glorious doctrine, to which he refers in his "Tractate Concerning the Invisible World," thus rebukingly soliloquizes in one of his searching meditations. "The good Lord forgive me, for that I have suffered myself so much to forget his Divine presence, and so the presence of his angels. It is, I confess, my great sin that I have filled mine eyes with other objects, and have been slack in returning praises to my God, for the continued assistance of those blessed and beneficent spirits. Oh! that the dust and clay were so washed out of mine eyes, that I might behold, together with the presence, the numbers, the beauties and excellencies of those ever present guardians." With regard to the reprehensible oversight of the valid claims of this interesting doctrine of Revelation, the late excellent Rev. Mr. Bickersteth has thrown out the following judicious and forcible intimations and requisitions. "No part of divine truth can be neglected without spiritual loss, and it is too evident that the deep and mysterious doctrine of Revelation respecting evil spirits and good angels, has been far too much disregarded in our age. This has arisen, on the one hand, from the wide spread of infidel principles, and on the other from the unscriptural, idolatrous and extravagant attention paid to this subject in the Church of Rome, in which good angels are worshipped, and the evil spirits brought forward to foster delusions. But we gain no solid victory over Popery, by omitting the truths which have been corrupted and abused. Our duty is rather to take forth the precious from the vile, and hold fast the simple and plain truth revealed for us and our children; thus shall we be as God's mouth to the people." Equally applicable are his additional observations, as bearing, with fearful apprehension upon the fatal tendency of those vicious theories, fraudulent manoeuvres, baneful and debasing delusions which attend the black retinue of the "Legion" of modern pretenders to a familiar intercourse, criminal and intriguing connection with supernatural agencies and spiritual beings, which disgrace the character of the present day, stultifying the understanding of infidel advocates, as well as ensnaring their imbecile devotees into the entanglements of a moral blindness and fearful perdition.* In view of these threatened evils, he fills, with an urgent breath, the warning trumpet of serious admonitions and sagacious foresight, sounded forth in the following expostulation. "Looking at the signs of the times, and the long neglect and unnatural denial of all angelic ministrations or spiritual influence, and at the express predictions of false Christs and false prophets, who shall show signs and wonders, insomuch that if it were possible, they should deceive the very elect, and that when men receive not the love of the truth that they might be saved, for this cause God shall send among them strong delusions that they should believe a lie. I cannot but think there is a painful prospect of a sudden recoil and religious revulsion from the present unbelief and misbelief, to an unnatural and undistinguishing credulity, when antichrist shall appear in his latest form, "with signs and lying wonders." I would, therefore, leave an earnest caution on the minds of my readers. Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits, whether they are of God. The Scriptures have forewarned us beforehand that we may not be led away with the error of the wicked and fall from our own steadfastness."

* To the sober mind, it is painful to reflect, that a talented and popular clergyman of this city should have countenanced, by his attendance, the Satanic imposture, to converse with "the spirits of the Rochester knockings;" and which became so barefaced a fraud as even to be denounced by their recent agrarian and socialist advocate. Has it not the appearance of a wicked hypocrisy for a preacher of the gospel of Christ to visit such blasphemous exhibitions, in impious disregard to the spirit and abiding moral obligations of that interdict of divine authority recorded in Deut. xviii. 10, 11. "There shall not be found among you any one that maketh his son or his daughter to pass through the fire, or that useth divination, or an observer of times, or an enchanter, or a witch, or a charmer, or a consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer." The puerile plea of curiosity is no valid excuse. Was it not the indulgence of a forbidden and unhallowed curiosity which forfeited Paradise, “brought death into the world and all our woe," and required the sacrificial atonement and piacular sufferings of the bleeding victim on the ignominious Cross of Calvary! Moreover, why does it not more frequently occur to the thoughts of the professed adherents of the "pure and undefiled religion" of Christianity that to attend on the Sabbath, the lectures and discourses of declaimers of heterodox sentiments, who desecrate the sacred hours of the Lord's day in defending the infidel claims of the

In the fervid expressions of devotion, actuated by the ardent enthusiasm of a genuine Christian philosophy, Mr. John Reynolds, in his disquisition or "Inquiries concerning the state and economy of the angelical worlds," printed in 1723, thus proceeds, " And surely we shall find in the angelical system such heights and depths, as will raise our admiration of that God, whose fiat created the various worlds he has made, and the beautiful administrations he has chosen and ordained. No wonder we meet with inscrutable mysteries connected with the nature and order, laws and ministry of those incorporeal attendants that surround and applaud the Throne. Our inquisitive minds are apt to wonder that a door or casement is not opened for our clearer prospects into the celestial world, toward which we are called to travel. We admire, when these natives of heaven appeared, so often, in the primitive world, and came sometimes, (one would think) upon lower offices and services; that when so many inspired messengers came from God; yea, that when the Lord Himself came from heaven, to teach us how to get there, they would none of them tell us more of the world from whence they came, or to which they would invite us; and that they no more particularly describe the state, the inhabitants, employments, and felicities that are there. But they came not, it seems, to gratify our curiosity; but to direct us safely thither. An early thirst of undue knowledge soon ruined our race in the head of it, and it is not now to be indulged. Our greatest business and felicity are not to return to angels, (though they will be exceeding good company,) but to Him that made (and can make blessed) both them and us; and therefore the most the Lord of heaven tells us of them, (though he knew their essence, their regimen and offices so well) is, that they are glad when any one of us is reduced to repentance, and reconciled to God; and therefore set in a fair way to their world, their enjoyments, and society. There we shall know them as much as we shall desire. In the mean time we are to walk by faith and hope in that light that has been afforded us.

And it will be our wisdom, as well as our duty, not barely to be content with, but to be thankful for that measure of supernatural revelation, that Divine wisdom has thought fit to vouchsafe to us; which will suffice to guide us to life and immortality, without any one's coming from the dead or descending from the world of native life and immortality." These important reflections, though well adapted to suppress the pruriency of that curiosity of the human mind, consequent on our degenerate condition, respecting those abstruse points of inquiry enshrined in the silence of Divine wisdom, yet, sufficient is revealed to excite our wondering admiration, as well as promote our edification, and also afford supporting comfort as we prosecute our toilsome pilgrimage through the wilderness of this vain world, till we have attained to the blissful associations and society of angels, and reached the bright and eternal residences of those illustrious and celestial immortals, for as Dr. Owen justly remarks: "It is the height of ingratitude not to search after what may be known of this great privilege and mercy whereof we are made partakers in the ministry of angels. God hath neither appointed or revealed it for nothing. He expects a revenue of praise and glory for it; and how can we bless him for it when we know nothing about it? This ministry then of angels, is that which with sobriety we are, in a way of duty, to inquire into. Let us on this account glorify God and be thankful. Great is the privilege, manifold are the blessings and benefits that we are made partakers of by this ministry of angels.

See
What shall
What shall we render for them and to them? Shall we go and bow ourselves down to the angels themselves and pay our homage of obedience to them? They all cry out with one accord:
you do it not, we are your fellow-servants."
we then do? Why, say they, worship God! Glorify and praise him, who is God of all angels; who sends them unto whom they minister in all they do for us. Let us bless God, I say, for the ministry of angels."

In an exceedingly able and very orthodox article contributed by Professor Moses Stuart to the Bibliotheca Sacra, he starts with this exegetical interrogatory. "Of what importance can the doctrine respecting good and evil angels be to us? We owe them, it is said, no duty of homage or worship, and as they are invisible beings, if they exist at all, we can never decide with any certainty whether or when they interpose in our behalf or interfere for the sake of injuring us? We have therefore no interest in this matter.

"I cannot accede to such a view of the subject; the Scriptures have taught us, that the original holy and happy condition of our race was essentially changed by the interference and crafty malignity of Satan. The necessity of the redemption of the Son of God stands inseparably connected with this. The atonement, the nucleus and centre of Christianity proper, is, in some important respects, a consequence of Satan's interference; or in other words it was rendered necessary by the tempter when he assailed our first parents. Nor is this all which may be truly and properly said in regard to this subject. If there are good angels, the voluntary ministers of God's will; or evil ones who are the executioners of his justice, or examples in their sufferings of the proper desert of sin; then, these facts are important to us, inasmuch as they cast light upon God's providential government of the world-a subject of deep interest to all moral and accountable beings,

"There is another point of view in which we may contemplate this subject. The Scriptures of the Old and New Testament are filled with passages that have respect to angels good or evil. Some of these passages are involved in not a little obscurity as presented to us, because we are not sufficiently familiar with the Hebrew modes of expression and thought to appreciate at once the full meaning of the sacred writers. If now it be true that a proper attention to the angelology of the Scriptures will help us to explain these, and especially in case it will render most of the obscure passages in question altogether intelligible, then attention to this subject cannot be fairly deemed unimportant."

Sufficient, it is presumed, has now been advanced, with the support of suitable authorities, fairly to ward off the unmeaning cavils of a determined or disguised scepticism, as well as abash the daring buffoonery* of a profane derision, to whose impiety the subject may be exposed, reinforced by the scoffing irreligion of those who ridicule, as superlatively absurd, the idea, and reject, alike, the internal and historic evidences of the veritable existence of immaterial beings, those real, though invisible instruments, who unceasingly carry forward the merciful protection, benevolent designs, mysterious operations and punitive judgments of the Supreme Governor of the moral, and the Almighty Creator and Upholder of the material universe; inasmuch as the belief of their actuality is classed by them amongst those intangible objects of sense, whose nature and essence, mode or vehicle of communication with the inhabitants of this lower world are beyond the limited comprehension of the finite and degenerate faculties of the human mind† :-

* A medical satirist, indulging "in jestings not convenient," pertly inquired of me, "If I had ever caught an angel and dissected him"! Such an extraordinary and perplexing case of profound sagacity, brimstone wit and abstruse morality, unquestionably comes clear of all exceptions and demurrers, within the tenebrious jurisdiction of the Areopagus of Pandemonium. G. C.

+ Metaphysicians incline to universal skepticism, finding in the vast regions of philosophy we can, to adopt an homely phrase, scarcely see beyond our noses; have dwelt with something like exultation on the incapacity of man's intellect to overcome the difficulties which surround the most indubitable truths.-ST. * Reason is a rebel unto Faith, and considers her propositions as absurd. There are a set of heads, that can credit the relations of mariners, yet question the testimonies of St. Paul; and peremptorily maintain the traditions of Ælian or Pliny, yet in histories of Scripture raise queries and objections; believing no more than they can parallel in human authors.—SIR THOMAS BROWNE, Religico Medicii.

The skeptic denies the realities of faith, as the blind might deny the beauty of color, or the deaf the harmony of sound.-SLACK, Ministry of the Beautiful.

The wisest of us, which is the holiest, see somewhat by the eye of faith-faith being the end of wisdom, the great lesson of the universe.—ID.

Faith only can raise us above this little daily life, and worldly business; that only can give the soul such a direction to higher things, and to objects and ideas which alone have value and importance, and amidst the circling causes of appearances and events, is an immovable pole.-M. VON HUMBOLDT, Thoughts, &c., of a Statesman.

Never yet did there exist a full faith on the divine word which did not expand the intellect, while it purified the heart; which did not multiply the aims and objects of the understanding, while it fixed and simplified those of the desires and passions.-COLERIDGE's Aids to Reflection.

Faith subsists in the synthesis of the Reason and the individual Will. Faith is the source and sum, the energy and principle of the fidelity of man to God, by the subordination of his human will, in all provinces of his nature, to his reason, as the sum of spiritual Truth, representing and manifesting the Will Divine.-ID, Confessions of an Inquiring Mind.

† Infidel France, in the height and frenzy of her barbarities and wickedness on throwing off the recognition of the divine authority of the Supreme and Moral Governor of the Universe, substituted as the idol of national worship a worse than pagan object in the gross exhibition of the nude prostitute of an egregiously depraved imagination as the unnatural, unphilosophical and lying representative of the "Goddess of Reason." For this, and other abominations, fearful judgments are still suspended over her.

G. C.

a serene and attractive countenance, to the "living oracles" of immutable and eternal Truth ;-repudiating her sacred claims and glorious hopes, so vividly described in the sublime definition of an apostle, as "the confident expectation of things hoped for, the conviction of things which are not seen;" being the only rational medium by which we understand the worlds were framed by the word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of those things which do appear; whilst by the assurances of her enlightened apprehensions, she enables us to realize the amazing scenes of the invisible and eternal world,—to await, with patience, the predicted destruction of the present fabric of this terrestial globe,-to anticipate the anxious resurrection of the redeemed in Christ,-to be prepared for the awful solemnities of the final judgment,-to espy in the resplendent perspective of eternity, "the new heavens and new earth" of the upper kingdom and sanctuary, welcomed by the "innumerable company of angels " beatified in the unfading grandeur, inconceivable felicities and immortal youth of the heavenly state;

“Where, the blest immortals,
In love's pure beauty stand;
Alluring us, through faith's translucent portals,
Into the better land."

Such exalting beatitude, ethereal sympathies, and brilliant prospects constitute the imperishable inheritance of the children of Faith; confirmed by the cheering smiles of an approving providence, and the sustaining promises of Divine asssurance as they advance along the irradiated thoroughfare of obedience and holiness to the "pearly gates" of the city of the heavenly Jerusalem! During their career on earth, they are surrounded by the fiery "chariots" and "horsemen" of the host of spiritual and benignant agencies who take a deep interest in their welfare, strewing their path with the bright and fragrant flowers of peace and joy, and refreshing their fainting souls with the sweetest music of celestial melody. Wisely, therefore, does it behoove every tempted child of fallen Adam, to heed the momentous admonition of Lord Bacon, in the philosophy of his religion, "Not to seek the living among the dead, but, soberly, to render unto faith the things that are faith's."

By a different description of minds, or the lukewarm professors of a nominal Christianity, the discussion or expression of a belief, in the varied circumstances, in which the specific instrumentality of angelic beings has been, and is still employed, as connected with the believer's present welfare and eternal destiny, will be probably demurred to, on the shallow ground, that the subject is of too speculative a character to be of any essential service in promoting the practice of religious duties or stimulating to the more fervid exercises and frequent communion of devotional piety; but, on the contrary, rather to be discountenanced, from its obvious tendency to foster the fatal delusions of a fanatical presumption and forbidden curiosity, rashly intruding themselves into those arcana of nature and the secrets of the spiritual world, which it has pleased an all-wise God to conceal within the veil of impenetrable mysteries; yet, who, nevertheless, with an earnestness and devotion that would honor a martyr's zeal, and the characteristic inconsistencies of a superficial faith advocate and revel in the most startling absurdities of modern Mesmerism, the sublimated hallucinations of a frenzied Swedenborg, and the insidious neology and transcendentalism of the German school of Divinity.

To the multifarious and antagonistic demurrers of vain hypotheses, assuredly, it is not requisite to offer an extended reply; forasmuch as the authority and facts of the Bible which relate the embassy and appearance of angels, during the Adamic, patriarchal, and Mosaic economy-the fulfillment of prophecy when they announced the glad tidings of redemption for mankind-the corroborative declarations of the Great Teacher, whilst in the days of his humiliation He sojourned upon this earth, respecting them; together with that angelic succor which sympathized with the agonized Redeemer in the sorrowful garden of Gethsemane—their overpowering splendor which confounded the affrighted soldiery of the guarded sepulchre; and their gracious information to the desponding Magdalene, as she stood in the attitude and anguish of pensive grief, beside the virgin and vacated tomb of the risen Saviour-their frequent interposition chronicled in the history of the lives and missions of the apostles, in their behalf, as the first heralds of the gospel of salvation, and toward the martyred disciples of the Prince of Peace their attendance and commission to execute the final dispensation of Jehovah, at the consummation of all things, on the exit of time, revealed in the awful disclosures of the apocalypse of St. John, fully answer, and solemnly rebuke the futility of all such opposing objections, and make manifest the serious temerity of such willful and questioning misbelief.*

With humble sincerity, it is hoped, in the ensuing pages, that no statement will be advanced, opinion adduced, or speculation presented, of "private interpretation," that will not bear the sanction of Scripture warrant; the Bible being the only acknowledged standard of authority—the only infallible oracle of our faith. From this living fountain of Divine Truth, whose crystal stream issues from, and circulates around, the throne of inspiring wisdom and all-sufficient grace, would we draw pure, and copious draughts of spiritual knowledge. With reverential gratitude would we heed the bright lamp of Inspiration, suspended by the golden chain of redeeming love, from the footstool of forgiving mercy, whose guiding and radiant beams, illumining the dreary passage of this wilderness-world, and gilding the gloomy entrance to the valley of the shadow of death, reflect their extended effulgence upon the beautiful portals of the everlasting gates of the celestial city, surrounded by the attendant and glittering train of the angelic messengers of the Majesty of heaven!

Happy, therefore, thrice happy they, who in the attainment of the divine science of spiritual discoveries applied this Holy Book as an effective repellant to the subtle magnetism of Satanic suggestions, and as the safest and most certain non-conductor of the latent electricity of those fallacious theories, too abundantly generated, in the charged batteries of the secret laboratory of a depraved heart and perverted reason!

* Purely speculative opinions are of little value except so far as they tend to promote the moral objects and a saving belief in the truth of Christianity.-FOSTER, Christian Morals.

We repel that philosophizing spirit which consists in resolving all the extraordinary phenomena recorded in the Bible into the mere effect of natural causes. Nothing can be more contemptible than such presumption of philosophy.-Idem.

Controlled by the foregoing determination, with the invoked guidance of the divine blessing, will we endeavor to prosecute an inquiry into the revealed history, exalted rank, transcendent attributes, moral virtues, attractive lineaments, and heavenly habitudes of those noble and illustrious beings -the ministering and adoring angels of Jehovah.

We pause to insert the following extracts from the notes of Dr. George Townsend's Historical and Chronological Arrangement of the New Testament, a work preeminently deserving of a place in every Christian's library; and which cannot but be read with intense interest and persuasive impression.

"The doctrine of the ministry of angels, so much esteemed by the primitive church, as well as by the most eminent and pious Christians of all ages, has now become one of those which, without any one well-founded argument, is to be reasoned away. The repeated appearance of angels, both in the old and new dispensations, seems designed to point out to us the near, though mysterious, connection of the invisible state with that which we now inhabit. And what can be more consolatory to the believer, than the idea, corroborated by numerous passages in the Scripture, than the belief, that the angels of heaven are around us, the ministering spirits of God for our good, watching over us, and fulfilling the wisdom of his providence! Why should the opinion be disclaimed? Angels were present at the creation; they have been repeatedly manifested to man. Isaiah the seraphim appeared veiling their faces with widespreading wings. The form that was visible to Ezekiel had the semblance of a lambent flame, enveloping what seemed its body. To the women they appeared in shining garments, and to the keepers of the sepulchre as lightning, with raiment white as snow. They are the happy possessors of that blessedness to which the spirits of the departed hope to be admitted. And they shall be again visible in their thousands of thousands at that magnificent and glorious triumph, when the Ancient of Days shall sit on the throne of his glory, and the assembled universe be summoned before his high tribunal. Is it impossible, then, that they are invisible yet efficient agents in many of those innumerable events which are attended with moral and religious benefit to individuals and to the world; which are but too generally ascribed to incidental circumstances, or the well-laid plans of human policy?

* It is an admirable observation closing an introduction pointing out the pre-requisites for the correct composition and essential enjoyment of Divine Poetry, prefixed to the poem on the Messiah by the devout, though too rhapsodical, Klopstock: "It requires more than the knowledge of mythology to understand and feel the beauties of Homer, and much more than philosophy to relish the sublime graces of Revelation."-G. C.

"The soul of man is gifted with powers and properties which are distinct from the human body, and which it possesses in common with superior beings. I cannot, therefore, believe that idea to be irrational, which represents the manner of our present union with the invisible world by the following ingenious and curious image. Suppose a number of lighted lamps were placed in a room, one of which only was covered with an earthen vessel; the lamp so encumbered, as soon as the covering was either broken or removed, would find itself in the same state and condition with the other lamps. So it may be with the accountable spirit of man. The earthen vessel, the body, may be broken by violence, or silently destroyed by sickness or age, but, as soon as the veil or the covering of the body is removed, the unfettered spirit finds itself the companion of kindred spirits, which, though unseen, are continually surrounding it. The time is not far hence, when we shall know even as we are known; in the meantime, the very attempt to speculate on these things elevates and purifies the mind.

"The German commentators of the self-named liberal class, endeavor to explain away every miracle recorded in the New Testament, by representing them as natural events which have only been considered as miraculous by the misapprehending of the Hebraisms of the inspired writers.

"The explanation of Hezelius is so singular, that it may appear doubtful whether in his eagerness to remove the opinions of a miraculous interference by an angel, he does not establish a still greater miracle. He thinks that a flash of lightning penetrated the prison in the night, and melted the chains of St. Peter without injuring him. The apostle rose up, and saw the soldiers who guarded him struck prostrate to the ground by the force of the lightning. He passed them as if led by the flash of lightning, and escaped from the prison before he perceived that he had been liberated by the providence of God. So completely, however, has the skeptical philosophy of the day pervaded society, that even among professed Christians, he would now be esteemed a visionary, who should venture to declare his belief in this most favorite tenet of the ancient church. The early fathers regarded the ministry of angels as a consoling and beautiful doctrine, and so much at that time was it held in veneration, that the founders of Christianity cautioned their early converts against permitting their reverence to degenerate into adoration. We now go to the opposite extreme, and seldom think of their existence; yet what is to be found in this belief, even if the Scriptures had not revealed it, which is contrary to our reason? We believe in our own existence, and in the existence of God; is it utterly improbable, then, that between us, who are so inferior, and the Creator, who is so wonderful and incomprehensible, infinite gradations of beings should exist, some of whom are employed in executing the will of the Deity toward finite creatures? Does not God act even by human means in the visible government of the affairs of the earth? what absurdity, then, can be discovered in the opinion that the spiritual nature of man should be under the guardianship of spiritual beings? This, in fact, was a doctrine universally received till it became perverted and degraded by vain and idle speculations,-till it became so encumbered with absurdities, that the belief itself was rejected. Some writers on this subject went so far as to imagine they could ascertain the orders of a hierarchy, and could even assert the numbers of each rank. Others changed the office and ministry of angels, investing them with independent control over the works of God, an opinion strongly and justly reprobated by the most eminent authorities. And because in the original Hebrew that which executes the will of the Deity is sometimes called an "angel," whether it be winds or storms, fire or air; many again have transformed the angels in the Old Testament into obedient elements, accomplishing the designs of Providence, according to which hypothesis, the aged patriarch must have prayed that the blessings of an element might descend upon his grandchildren. The Messiah must have been created a little lower than the winds and the floods, who, in like manner, were commanded to worship him; and, again, when the superiority of Christ is declared, the passage must be rendered: To which of the elements said he at any time, sit thou on my right hand, until I make thy foes my footstool.' Leaving all such fantastic and unreasonable interpretations out of the question, let us turn to that interpretation of Scripture on this point, which has been acknowledged by all classes and divisions of Christians, from the time of the apostles to the present day. From the evidence of Revelation, we have grounds for believing that angels are spirits superior to mankind, some of whom have lost, while others have preserved, the state of happiness in which they were primarily created, and that these are now opposed to each other. With the precise cause of the fall of the evil angels we are not made acquainted. We only know that they retain the remembrance of their original condition; that they are powerful, though under restraint ; that gradations of superiority and influence exist among them; that they acknowledge a superior head, and that they are destined to eternal punishment.

"Of good angels, we learn, that they continue in their primeval dignity. They are endued with great power, and because they are employed in the constant execution of the decrees of Providence, they have received the name of messengers or angels. They are called the armies and the hosts of heaven; in innumerable companies they surround the throne of Deity; they are made partakers of his glory and rejoice to fulfill his will.

"Their office, as ministering angels to the sincere and accepted worshippers of our common God, is more fully and accurately related. Through the whole volume of revelation we read of the agency of superior beings in the affairs of mankind. They were stationed at the tree of life in paradise. In Jacob's vision of the ladder, they are represented as ascending and descending upon earth. They appeared to the patriarchs, to Abraham, to Lot, to Jacob, and they were made alike the ministers of both the vengeance and mercy of God. They were intrusted with the destruction of the cities of the plain. And the angel of the Lord went out and smote in the camp of Sennacherib a hundred and fourscore and five thousand.' (2 Kings xix: 35.) God sent an angel to Jerusalem to destroy it—who was seen between the earth and the heaven, having a drawn sword in his hard, stretched out over Jerusalem. In the New Testament, they announced the birth of Christ, and of his forerunner; they became visible to the shepherds, and proclaimed the glad tidings of salvation to the senseless world. They are interested for, and sympathize with, man; for 'there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth.' They were the watchful and anxious attendants of Christ in his human nature. They ministered to him after his triumph in the wilderness and his agony in the garden. As they announced his birth, so also they proclaimed his resurrection, his ascension, and his future return to judgment. They were made the spiritual means of communication between God and man. They were the divine witnesses of the whole scheme of Redemption. By an angel Joseph was warned to flee into Egypt. (Matt. ii. 13.) By an angel Cornelius was directed to the house of Peter. (Acts x. 3-22.) By an angel that apostle was released from prison. And by the ministry of an angel were signified to St. John those things which should be hereafter. In his last and mysterions revelation, the agency of superior beings is uniformly asserted, and they are represented as fulfilling the most solemn decrees of omnipotence. They are represented as standing on the four corners of the earth, as having the seal of the living God, as offering on the golden altar the incense and prayers of the saints, as holding the key of the bottomless pit; and as executing the vengeance of God upon the visible creation, and upon all those who have not the seal of God upon their foreheads; all which, though metaphorical expressions, imply the probable agency of these invisible beings in the affairs of the world. And when time shall be no more, these holy beings who have sympathized with man here, and been witnesses of his actions, and the infinite mercies of his almighty Creator and Redeemer, will be the accusing or approving spectators of the sentence passed upon him in eternity; for our Savior has expressly declared, that whosoever shall confess me before men, him shall the Son of Man also confess before the angels of God. But he that denied me before men shall be denied before the angels of God."-DR. TOWNSEND, Notes on the New Testament.

HISTORY AND NATURE.

UPON the threshold of our intricate yet interesting and delectable subject,-approved by the united testimony and sanction of Revelation, Religion and Reason, that divinely-appointed triumvirate for the moral and mental government of man's social and spiritual nature, would we conspicuously inscribe the Christian sentiment and judicious admonition of Lord Lyttleton, that, "God is pleased, in this present world, to appropriate and proportion our knowledge, not to our pride and curiosity, but to our wants and condition."

The peculiar brevity, transcendent simplicity and instructive reserve which distinguish and dignify the Mosaic narrative, in reference to the primordial origin of all existences, and the vivific operations of the workmanship of omnipotence in the production of this material world, associated with the incorporeal and unseen presence of the subtle vitalities of spiritual beings, plainly and evidently declare, that "it is the glory of God,* to whom belong secret things,† in their profound and fathomless depth,‡ to conceal" from the unhallowed temerity of mortal intrusion, those incomprehensible mysteries which envelope the elemental principles of organic life, and the essential attributes of spiritual essences! For, notwithstanding the remarkable endowments and capacious faculties of the human intellect, is not the imperfect attainment of our knowledge, in connection. with the sublime and astonishing exhibitions of divine power, and benevolence and wisdom, admirably calculated to promote a beneficial tendency upon the mind, with respect to the fear, and homage and adoration due towards, and the sense of our entire dependence upon, the constant care and protection, as well as providential supplies of the almighty Creator of the heaven and the earth"? True! with the first elements, the bases, the essences, of matter and spirit, and all things contained in the circumference or presented in the phenomena of being, the prying attempts of the most penetrative, enlarged and gifted understandings cannot cope. With their properties, qualities, combinations, affinities, component parts, specific influences and peculiar effects, however, much has been recently elicited by the aid, and brought to light in the surprising and splendid discoveries of the searching science of modern chemistry; but, beyond this separating line of the demarcation of experience and knowledge, Reason is strictly forbidden to trespass, though to Faith, in the joyous hope of a believing expectation, guided by the gracious disclosures of Inspiration, she is encouraged to a nearer and more anxious approach to the Supreme Cause of all causes.

This sacred and majestic laconicism is likewise applied to the early history and society of mankind, giving but very slight information to what extent the arts and sciences flourished in primeval time; and withholding any very minute description of those excessive vices and artificial refinements of wickedness which provoked the awful punishment of divine displeasure, resulting in that watery destruction which overwhelmed and swept the entire antediluvian race from off the surface of the polluted earth! So, with regard to the inherent principles and hidden workings of nature in the curious machinery of the material universe, the invisible inhabitants and the secret agencies of the ethereal world, the communications of the Bible are circumscribed by divine" wisdom and knowledge," in correspondence with the necessities and limitation* of our finite faculties, mental apprehensions, moral condition, immortal desires and eternal destiny, either in the blissful perfection of Heaven, or the dolorous perdition of Hell!

* Proverbs xxv. 2. † Deut. xxix. 29.
Romans xi. 33.

The unevangelical disquisitions of some theologico-geologists to quadrate the discoveries of modern science with the infallible truth of God's word and the requisitions of a divine faith, it is to be apprehended, are calculated to produce a most unfavorable tendency on the proud and unenlightened mind. The observation of Dr. Anderson, in his recently published work entitled The Course of Creation, receives its own approbation. "The wisdom of man will be confounded when it tries to fathom the methods and devices of the divine Artificer in originating his works. His safety will often be in distrusting his own understanding, in not magnifying overmuch the ingenuity of his own speculations; and in sometimes believing that even science will be exalted by approximating to, rather than departing from, the literalities of Scripture."

Indeed, it is well for Philosophy to kindle her torch, and Reason to light her lamp, at the pure and brilliant flame, which ever burns with a steady and undiminished lustre upon the ethereal altar of the sacred temple of immutable and

"We know but little of the invisible world, or of the manner in which the disembodied spirit continues to exist; our understanding and our apprehension are so limited in this stage of existence, that we cannot comprehend one-half of those truths which both our senses, our reason and revelation compel us to approve."-DR. GEO. TOWNSEND, Note on Witch of Endor.

eternal Truth. The mind but once convinced upon the testimony of authentic history, and other demonstrative evidences of the inspiration of the Bible, whatever difficulties may arise, or apparent contradictions may present themselves to its oracular declarations, in the recent discoveries of science, must not be allowed, even, for a single moment, to interfere with the valid and established claims of a divine Revelation. The obscure province of Reason and the bright regions of Faith are too remote, and the specific objects of the one, are too distinct and dissimilar from the heavenly aspirations of the other, and a holy faith can never succumb to the vain and haughty pretensions of the former, because, in her loftiest altitude she will never be able to reach the sublimities of the latter. The very instant that reason is permitted the ascendant, Faith, also, loses her virtue, her validity, her essence,-being at once lifeless, and bereft of her vitality upon the withdrawn favor and protection of her offended God. To suppose a Revelation devoid of mysteries, involves the paradox of identifying the temple without its presiding God. Neither can I justify the bold assertion of the pompous philosophy of our quaint physician, in his Religio Medici, that in his religion there were not impossibilities (incomprehensibilities) enough to satisfy his faith: when I reflect upon the incomprehensibility of the self-existent Jehovah, who inhabiteth the immensurability of the circle of eternity, whose presence fills all space; at whose fiat came forth, "out of nothing," the beautiful fabric of this fair creation, the mysterious hypostasis of the holy trinity of the Godhead,—the permitted introduction of moral evil into this sin-disordered world,-the prophetic incarnation of Deity to impart validity to the atonement of the Redemption, in the substitution of the innocent for the guilty, typified in the sanguinary rites of the Aaronic priesthood and ceremonial, to answer the demands of moral law and harmonize the essential attributes of the divine character,-the wonderful and needful operations of the Holy Ghost, in Regeneration, by the constant descent of the enlightening, consolatory, and sanctifying influences of the promised Paraclete,—the revealed resurrection of the body, having been resolved into its original dust, to receive the irreversible sentence of its destiny, during the transforming and purifying process of the conflagrant flames of a blazing universe,—in the presence of the august assize of an assembled world, before the solemn tribunal of the omniscient scrutiny and righteous decision of the Angel-Jehovah Judge, upon the indictment of every thought, imagination and action,-every idle word and vain conversation, misapplied time and misimproved means of grace;-in this awful whirlwind of mental emotion and spiritual consternation, "the small still voice" of Faith alone restores the tranquillity of my mind, and sustains my overwhelmed and fainting spirit; whilst the thrilling apostrophe of St. Paul, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" suits my agitated feelings best, elevates me, awhile, to the "third heaven" of his supercelestial vision, or supports me in the contemplation of his unutterable spiritual experience; arresting the erratic inclinations of unbelief, and bidding her return, from whence she had wandered, to the orbit of faith in the solar system of Christianity, obscured in the penumbra of doubts, and amidst the gravitating influences of centrifugal temptation, which, but for the polarizing attractions of the MYSTIC CROSS, would draw my oscillating soul from completing the epicycle of Christian duties and moral responsibilities and conscientious monitions belonging to that nebulous sphere in which Providence has appointed me to revolve, as my terrestrial axis.*

Provided our investigations are conducted with the obedience of a biblical faith, and the humility of a reverential submission, in the reception of the revealed verities enshrined in the sanctuary of inspired truth; it is, certainly, the privileged duty and peculiar delight of the enlightened mind and sanctified heart, soberly to examine the sacred and mysterious chain of divine operations which link, in harmonious union, the wonderful economy of nature, the intercommunication of spiritual and heavenly intelligences, with the inscrutable scheme and saving dispensation of Redemption.

In the expansive and luminous firmament of celestial realities, the cheering and radiant doctrine of the appointed ministration and particular offices of unfallen angels, shines forth with a most vivid, attractive and transparent brightness; assuring us that the invisible and commissioned cohorts which attend and surround the sapphire throne of

* I believe that our estranged and divided ashes shall unite again; that our separated dust, after so many pilgrimages and transformations into parts of minerals, plants, animals, elements-shall, at the voice of God, return into their primitive shapes, and join again to make up their primary and predestinated forms. As at the creation, there was a separation of that confused mass into its pieces; so at the destruction thereof there shall be a separation into its distinct individuals. As, at the creation of the world, all the distinct species which we behold lay involved in one mass, till the fruitful voice of God, separated the united multitude into several species; so at the last day, when these corrupted relics shall be scattered in the wilderness of forms, and seem to have forgot their proper habits, God, by a powerful voice, shall command them back again into their proper shapes, and call them out by their single individuals; then shall appear the fertility of Adam, and the magic of that sperm that hath dilated into so many millions. I have often beheld as a miracle that artificial resurrection and revivification of mercury, how being mortified into a thousand shapes, it assumes again its own and returns into its numerical self. This is that mystical philosophy from whence no true scholar becomes an atheist; but from the visible effects of nature grows up a real divine; and beholds, not in a dream, as Ezekiel, but in an ocular and a visible object, the types of his resurrection. The life and spirit of all our actions is the resurrection, and a stable apprehension that our ashes shall enjoy the fruit of our pious endeavors; without this, all religion is a fallacy, and those impieties of Lucian, Euripides, and Julian, are no blasphemies, but sensible verities, and atheists have been the only philosophers. How shall the dead rise is no question of my faith; to believe only possibilities is not faith but mere philosophy.-SIR T. BROWNE.

Deity are constantly dispatched,—passing the flaming boundaries of their own locality and habitation in the distant regions of ethereal glory, and especially intrusted with benevolent embassies of love and mercy, grace and consolation to those "who shall be their heirs of salvation"!

Postponing, to the sequel, the presentation of a variety of relevant observations and irrefragable proofs demonstrative of the Inspiration of the Bible, we assume the rationality and necessity of yielding an implicit belief to the infallible truth of Divine testimony, as the only safe and solid basis of unimpeachable authority, upon which to establish the doctrine and dogma of the real existence and ordained ministration of angelic intelligences; illustrated by those appropriate and convincing facts recorded in the sacred Scriptures, which will exhibit to prominent view, the superlative excellence, supreme importance, and delightful character of the subject that we now advance to canvass in diametrical opposition to those impious negations,-originating in the natural enmity of the human heart toward a holy and a righteous God, and the stiff-necked pride of the perverted intellect, as regards the revealed method of a sinner's acceptance in the sight of Jehovah, realized in the atonement, the mediation, and the economy of salvation,-which have affronted the declarations of Holy Writ, and the faith and hopes of Christianity from the days of the disputatious and scornful Jews of the Sadducean sect, down to the present time of the pertinacious and infidel deism of modern materiality, or the profligate pretensions of a profane mesmerism; disguised in the protean assumptions of a pseudo-philosophy, as presented in the multiform appearances of metamorphizing theories, chameleon beliefs, atheistical principles, practice and systems.*

Amidst the chaos of the phantasmagoric fictions and discordant speculations,-evidently based upon distorted traditions of the Mosaic narrative of the genesis or origin of the solar system of the visible world,—which have disfigured the pagan descriptions of the cosmogony of this earth, together with those philosophic theories upon whose unsubstantial foundations are constructed the mythological theogonies of the more polished and enlightened nations of Greece and Rome;

* No savage worshipping the most preposterous idol, ever believed greater absurdities, than a modern sceptic, who makes his small modicum of reason the standard by which to measure the boundless universe. Christianity in the past was not limited by eighteen and a half centuries, which we call its era. It illumined the earliest ages, it burned brighter in the soul of Plato, than in most minds now. The good and wise of all ages have been of one faith. The loftiest truth is never circumscribed by man's intellect. The deepest truths of religion and philosophy are made known to us by appeals to our sympathy.

Nature will not allow man to intellectualize himself into infidelity.

Every grand prospect, every burst of melody carries conviction to the ne that truth is eternal, and man destined for immortality.

Let the keenesi intellect soar to its sublimest heights, and when it has found some great truth among the loftiest Alps of reason, if it sink deep into the heart of the discoverer, he will be able to bring it home to the hearts of others, not as a discovery of science, but as a verity of faith.-SLACK, Ministry of the Beautiful.

To thoughtful observators the whole world is a phylactery, and everything we see an item of the wisdom, power, or goodness of God. Words cannot exceed, when they cannot express enough. THE CREATION, Celebrated by Angels.
Drawn by Perkins

the only clear ray of light and information which Jehovah has condescended to vouchsafe, respecting the creation of spiritual and angelic beings is preserved and conveyed through the medium of that most ancient and authentic of all books, whose supposed author was the Jewish lawgiver -the book of Job, where in the seventh verse of the thirty-eighth chapter, they are represented, under the appellation and character of the sons of God, as celebrating the stupendous and magnificent display of the power, and benevolence, and wisdom of the Deity, in the glorious exhibition and appearance of the visible and various works of a completed universe, having received the complacent approbation of the Almighty Architect, as they sprang up innumerable, under the omnific influence of the uncreated beam of the Sun of Righteousness, along the shining banks of the crystal river of life, on the bright morning of everlasting day, instinct with the unfading youth of immortality!—

"From multitudes of angels, with a shout
Loud as from numbers without number, burst
Forth blessed voices, uttering joy.

* * * * * *

All these with ceaseless praise his works behold
Both day and night-
Singing their great Creator."-MILTON.

Beyond the boundary line of inspired information, with which divine wisdom, as it were, has fenced in, this sublime and inscrutable subject, it is vain for mortal intellect to try to traverse, by attempting the irrational, presumptuous, and indevout endeavor to penetrate through the veil of the intentional silence of unrevealed mystery-for as much as any additional knowledge, if it were attainable by the unaided effort of our finite comprehension, we cannot perceive, would either promote our happiness, deepen our penitence, advance our holiness, establish our faith, superinduce greater spirituality of mind, or more effectually secure our salvation; whilst from the reserve of the Mosaic account, which makes no mention of angels, the design of the Jewish lawgiver, is, therefore, obviously intended to prefer a practical confutation of the ancient and prevalent idolatry of Sabeism, or the worship of sun, moon, and stars, evidently referred to by the venerable and renowned patriarch Job: If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness ; and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth kissed my hand.

Equally futile, fabulous and fantastical are those speculations which have been indulged to adjust and determine the precise period of the creation of angelical intelligences; for some, in the foolishness of their mental conception, aiming "to be wise above what is written," have supposed they were created on the same day with the "heaven and the earth;" implying that Moses included them under those terms, in the declaration that In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth; others, that he intended them under the epithet light,* which God created on the first day, comprehending under that expression both angels his angels, who, from being angels of light, by reason of their pride and rebellion were converted into Devils of darkness. At the same time, the matter of the four elements with spiritual creatures was produced, viz., those spiritual and corporeal bodies which were created in the beginning of time. Life, wisdom, and Light designate the angels who are said to have been first created, by virtue of their excellency and dignity, and especially ordained to contemplate, praise, and magnify Almighty God's liberality and goodness throughout all generations.

and souls; and also, that the soul of Adam was created before his body, like as the angels were, and afterwards breathed and divinely infused into him.

The Hebrews, likewise, held the conceit, that they were created on the second day; and that God consulted them, saying, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; others, again, maintain the opinion that they were called into existence on the fifth day. Origen, with some of the Greek and Latin fathers, believed they were created before the formation of the world, and which sentiment they think derives some countenance from that passage of Job: Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth ?"

Plato considered the angels as the first born and first fruits of God's creation; upon the hypothesis that spiritual beings preceded, in priority of existence, corporeal bodies, and that the Great Parent employed them as ministers for the procreation of others. Aristotle maintains a similar opinion, speaking of them as the original movers of the universe; holding, also, the notion that the heavens were eternal, together with all empyreal souls and intelligent substances.

The supposition has likewise been favored by some modern divines, that angelic beings were created a long period antece-

* But to determine the day and year of this time (creation of angels) is not only convincible and statute madness, but also manifest impiety.-SIR THOMAS BRowNE.

+ Pythagoras used to entertain his disciples with stating the various generations and transmigrations his soul had undergone before it entered his body, borrowing his notion of its preexistence from the east, and its gradual descent into this dark and material world from that region of spirits and light which it is supposed to have once inhabited, and to which, after a long lapse of purification, it will return. This belief, under various symbolical forms, may be easily traced in almost all the oriental theogonies.

dent to the formation of our earth,—a series of ages before the construction of the solar system; but at what era in the mysterious revolutions and immeasurable cycles of eternity, Divine Revelation has not disclosed; suggesting the idea that the Supreme Being of infinite power, wisdom, and benevolence, would not have remained inactive during this incomprehensible interval of illimitable space, leaving so vast and inert a vacuum in the immeasurable regions of his boundless kingdom, to be unoccupied by intelligent creatures, as inconsistent with the operations and character of the omnipotent Creator, and as tending to reflect discredit upon the unimpeachable and living oracles of God.

Modern, like ancient Sadducism, impiously denies the reality of the existence of angels, arising, forsooth, from the invisibility of their intangibile nature; a negative which, upon this absurd hypothesis, is likewise applicable with awful temerity, to the irrefragable truth of the very existence of the Deity, whose ubiquity we cannot apprehend, either by our visual organs or mental faculties; whilst the demonstrative refutation of St. Paul declares: That the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by those things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without rcuse. The pointed reproof of our Saviour-in addition to his other declarations, to the affrighted and disbelieving disciples, confirms the same position, a spirit has not flesh and bones as ye see me have. The belief of their existence, however, has prevailed from the earliest period of mankind, conveyed through the medium of traditions which have long been corrupted alike by Jewish Rabbies and learned pagans. The imaginary beings which human fancy has offered to our notice, have been but the superior representations of our race under the name of Genii, Demons, Dii, or gods of the ancient eastern sages, down to the Fairies, Sylphs and Elves of modern credulity; invested by a disordered and impure imagination, with corresponding powers and attributes, dispositions and demeanor; in striking contrast to the essential particulars, extraordinary faculties, and preeminent attributes which adorn and constitute those transcendently pure, benevolent, illustrious and celestial beings described, in the sacred volume, as the constant attendants and commissioned ambassadors, and selected agents appointed to execute the gracious and punitive purposes of Omnipotence upon the throne of universal empire.

The positive existence, the ready attendance, and protective guardianship of angelical intelligences was frequently alluded to, by the Messiah, during the humiliation of his terrestrial sojourn, as well as corroborated by the declarations and visions of the apostles and St. John the Revelator.

The Old and New Testament abound with references to the visible appearances and actual interpositions of angels. It was a cherub, armed with a flaming sword, that was stationed as a guard at the entrance of the terrestrial paradise-angels appeared to Abraham, in his tent-to Lot, and forewarned him of the impending destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, those guilty and devoted cities of the plain-it was an angel that pointed out to the disconsolate Hagar, the spring of water, to relieve the extremity of her thirst-they were angels that ascended and descended on the mystic ladder for the encouragement of the patriarch Jacob-it was an angel which opposed Balaam, in his wicked career and avaricious project, threatening to slay his she-ass which found a rebuking tongue to resent the prophet's cruelty-the archangel Gabriel visited Daniel, in Babylon, appeared to Zechariah, the father of John the Baptist, the forerunner of the Redeemer of the world, and also announced to Mary, the consecrated virgin-mother, the birth of the long expected Messiah, as well as his nativity to the shepherds, who were peacefully attending their flocks--and also probably pointed out the phenomenon of a particular star, which directed the Magi to the manger which cradled the infant Christ, at Bethlehem--it was an angel that warned Joseph, in a dream, to retire, with the holy family, into Egypt, and escape the barbarous stratagem of Herod-they were angels who attended upon our Saviour after his temptation in the wilderness; and an angel descended from heaven to administer to his agony in the sorrowful garden of Olives; and after his resurrection, angels appeared to the holy women who came to the consecrated tomb to embalm his body-angels were seen by the apostles after the Resurrection of the ascended Saviour the angel of the Lord delivered the apostles from their prisons-the law was given to Moses by the ministration of angels; but without extending the enumeration, evidential of their real existence and diverse operations as revealed in the Scriptures, we will only add, that the belief of this attractive doctrine has obtained amongst the Mahometans, Greeks, Romans, and other nations of the earth,-under every imaginable form, use, and worship, in strict correspondence with the respective systems of their senseless dolatry, the theories of their pseudo-philosophy, and the delusions of their debasing superstitions.

We have now reached a point in our reflections, from which we shall not deem it expedient to venture into the imaginative and hazardous regions of abstract speculations, and which has provoked the curiosity, taxed the ingenuity, and exercised the girded efforts of the loftiest intellects, whether in the character of the philosopher, the metaphysician, the moralist, or the theologian; and therefore, it behooves us to observe the utmost Christian circumspection while treating of the supposed constitution of angelical natures, in reference either to the immateriality or corporeity of their subsistence, the mode of their intercourse with, or those vehicles of communication in which they have appeared to the apostate inhabitants of this sublunary planet, lest in the daring excursion beyond the precincts of biblical ethics and Scriptural information, we incur the analogical penalty of that reiterated interdict which guarded the sanctified Mount, upon the delivery and enactment of the Decalogue, from the unhallowed gaze and forbidden intrusion of the children of Israel, as it trembled amidst the thunder and lightnings, the smoking cloud and reverberating voice of the trumpet waxing louder and louder, increasing the terrific solemnity of the distant and august scenery which glorified the sacred and awful summit of Sinai !

A very brief survey, then, of the opinions which have been entertained on this difficult subject will be sufficient; as any ineffective attempt at critical inquiries on so abstruse a matter would be alike vain, dissatisfactory and unprofitable.

The ancient philosophers, including the peripatetics of the Grecian schools, considered that angels or demons (for these appellatives were employed synonymously) were composed of two qualities, corporeal and incorporeal, corresponding to the body and soul of man; the only difference being, that the souls of angels never descended into such gross and terrestrial bodies as the human, and are invariably invested with aerial or fiery substances; classifying their genii into demons, angels and heroes, of which distinction, those were esteemed angels whose appropriate sphere was placed nearest to the heavens: others, giving them also, a double substance-igneous and ethereal-slightly varying in their representations, viz., that by their empyreal essence they were enabled to contemplate God, but by their material element they became visible to men.

The fathers of the church supposed angels to be possessed of subtle, ethereal, and aerial bodies, making this difference between good and evil angels, to wit, the former being clothed with a radiant splendor, and the latter with a dark fuliginous obscurity--the good angels being constituted of transcendently refined substances which always accompanied their development to mortal vision, and which they believe was only the phlogistic or ethereal essence belonging to their nature.*

The specific nature of angels, whether pure spirits divested of all corporeal vehicles, has been a controversy of long standing, not only among the ancient philosophers, but of the Christian fathers; whilst Divine Revelation has maintained an admonitory silence upon this mysterious theme of human investigation. The nature of angels is expressed in the Scriptures by the epithet "spirit." They are of a spiritual nature, not compounded of parts as bodies are, and yet they are not simple and uncompounded as God is, who is a spirit.

To the human mind it is difficult to entertain a proper perception of a spirit. Even in our endeavors to impart our individual and inadequate conceptions of the varied operations of Deity, we are confined to the imperfect medium of anthropological expressions; whilst the apostle Paul, in his striking illustrations of the doctrine of the resurrection, drawn from the analogies of the material world, makes the distinction of terrestrial and celestial bodies:-There is a natural body and there is a spiritual body. "From angels being called spirits, it is not necessary to conclude that they have no body, nor material frame at all; to be entirely immaterial, is probably peculiar to the Father of spirits, to whom we cannot attribute a body without impiety, and involving ourselves in absurdities. When the term spirit is employed to denote the angelical nature, it is most natural to take it in a lower sense, to denote their exemption from those gross and earthly bodies which the inhabitants of this world possess. Their bodies are spiritual bodies, "for there is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body;" the latter of which the righteous are to receive at the resurrection, who are to be made equal to the angels.

* Angelical bodies send forth rays and splendors such as would dazzle mortal eyes, and cannot be borne by them; but the demoniac body, though it seemeth to have been such once (from Isaias calling him, that fell from heaven, Lucifer), yet it is now dark and obscure, foul and squalid, and grievous to behold, it being deprived of its cognate light and beauty. Again the angelical body is so devoid of gross matter that it can pass through any solid thing, it being indeed more impassible than the sunbeams; for though these can permeate pellucid bodies, yet are they hindered by earthy and opaque substances by which they are refracted; whereas the angelical body is such, as that there is nothing that can resist or exclude it.-CUDWORTH, Intellectual System.

The angels are not subject to any change, saith St. Bazil, for amongst them there is neither child, young man nor old; but in the same state in which they were created in the beginning, in that they everlastingly remain; the substance of their proper nature being permanent in simplicity and immutability. By nature angels were created mutable, but by contemplation immutable.-HEYWOOD, Hierarchie.

"Whether there is in the universe any being purely spiritual, and perfectly detached from matter, except the Great Supreme, is a question, perhaps, not easy to solve, nor is the solution of it at all essential to our present inquiry. 'God is a spirit,' and we cannot conceive of any portion or modification of matter, as entering into his essence without being betrayed into contradiction and absurdity. In regard to every other class of being, it is conjectured, that the thinking principle is united to some corporeal vehicle through which it derives its perceptions, and by which it operates; while perfect spirituality, utterly separate from matter in any possible state, is the exclusive attribute of the Deity. When angels are spoken of as spirits, this mode of expression may possibly denote no more, than that the material vehicle with which they are united, is of a nature highly subtle and refined, at a great remove from flesh and blood which compose the bodily frame. Who will presume to set limits to creative power in the organization of matter, or affirm that it is not, in the hand of its Author, susceptible of a refinement which shall completely exclude it from the notice of the senses? He who compares the subtlety and velocity of light with grosser substances, which are found in the material system, will be reluctant to assign any bounds. to the possible modification of matter, much more affirm there can be none beyond the comprehension of our corporeal organs."*

But if in physics there are unfathomable depths, is it not reasonable to expect that in the obscure regions of ontological investigations—in that science particularly conversant with God and spiritual essences, that we shall be stopped, at almost every step, by phenomena beyond our comprehension ? "It is childish," remarks John Foster, "to babble about the "impossibilities of religion," until we understand the entire scheme of the intellectual and physical world—until we can explain who we are, whence we are, and wherefore we are. Until we know what laws govern the elements, mould them into sentient forms, and again after a season, dissolve those warm and beautiful structures, and give their dust to the wind. Until we can decide the nature of that mysterious principle which we term life, discover how in some it becomes a fountain of motion, in others, of passion, intellectuality, and all those marvellous phenomena which we observe in ourselves and others. Until we can determine in what consists the invisible chain we denominate affection, that binds us not only to the living but to the dead, to forms long passed away, to minds translated beyond the stars, and the utmost bourne of the visible creation. Until then, let us be humble, nor mutter even in the secrecy of our hearts; considering how very imperfectly we comprehend even our present existence, notwithstanding our experience of, and intimacy with it. Diminutive as we are, we nevertheless involve a world of mystery.* The acutest, the profoundest investigations have been baffled. What is life? How continued? and if we had the means of pursuing the inquiry into our future state, it may be presumed, that every mystery would be aggravated. It is true that the Great Revealer of secrets' could have told us by revelation some things respecting the future state which we might in some superficial general manner have understood. For example : whether the disembodied spirit will have a material vehicle? whether there will be a distinct formal process of judgment on it at death? In what place it shall dwell till the resurrection? Whether it will, during that interval, be apprised of the transactions on earth? Whether it will have sensible intimate communications with superior spirits? Whether it will have a clearer, vaster manifestation of the grand scene of the creation? Whether it will have a luminous foresight of what it will become at the resurrection? When, and of what kind will be the local habitation of the hereafter? Of what the employments will chiefly consist ?" Such overwhelming realities—such grand and incomprehensible probabilities, so mysteriously veiled, are calculated to attract, whilst they confound and elude the scrutiny of the severest investigations of scientific and metaphysical research, as they stand aloof, like the mystic and awful recess in the innermost pavilion of the Jewish temple! Yet, is not the moral intention of Divine wisdom and grace sufficiently apparent, in that concealment with which God has been pleased to screen, from the intrusion of mortal presumption, the imbecility and limitation of human faculties, of a fuller knowledge of the mysteries of the organic world, the specific nature of angelical beings, the inscrutable decrees of almighty purpose and sovereign grace, and the inconceivable wonders of the future state, that in our present sinful and spiritual condition, attended with the religious responsibilities of this probationary scene of existence, Faith should unceasingly operate as the active principle upon the stimulating anticipations of our hopes, the devout aspirations of our hearts, and the practical demeanor of our lives? This obvious appointment of faith, to be an actuating principle, upon the interior thoughts and outward actions, is partly, because it cannot be otherwise, and partly, because to be governed by the inspired declaration and revealed will of Jehovah, constitute the vital and energetic essence of all

*There is surely a piece of divinity in us, something that was before the elements, and owes no homage to the sun. Nature tells me that I am an image of God, as well as the Scriptures. Man has the whole world in counterpoint to hm, but he contains an entire world within himself. Now, for the first at the apex of the living pyramid, it is man and nature; but man himself is a syllepsis, a compendium of nature—the Microcosm. In man, the centripetal and individualizing tendency of all nature is itself concentred and individualized—he is a revelation of nature.-S. T. COLERIDGE, Theory of Life.

The conjecture that angels-these pure intelligences and transcendently dignified spirits, assume corporeal forms, only on particular occasions, which, as soon as they are fulfilled, they throw off the transient medium which they required the vehicle of their visibility returning to the source from whence it originated; Dr. Dick, in his Philosophy and Theory of a Future State, pronounces "a mere assumption, destitute of any rational or spiritual argument to substantiate the truth. There is no passage of Scripture, with which I am acquainted," he remarks, "that makes such an assertion." The passage in Psalm civ. 4, "Who maketh his angels spirits, and his ministers a flaming fire," has been frequently quoted for this purpose, but it has no reference to any opinion that may be formed on this point. Although the passage were considered as referring to angels, it would not prove that they were immaterial substances, for, while they are designated spirits, which is equally applicable to men, as well as to angels-they are also said to be a "flaming fire," which is a material substance. This passage seems to have no particular reference to either opinion; but if considered as expressing the attributes of angels, its plain meaning is, that they are endowed with wonderful activity-that they move with the swiftness of the winds, and operate with the force and energy of flaming fire; or, in other words, that He, in whose service they are engaged, and who directs their movements, employs them with the strength of the winds and with the rapidity of lightning. In every instance in which angels have been sent on embassies to mankind, they have displayed sensible qualities. They exhibited a definite form, somewhat analagous to that of man, and color and splendor, which were perceptible by the organ of vision-they emitted sounds, which struck the organs of hearing, they produced the harmonies of music, and sang sublime sentiments which were uttered in articulate words-they were distinctly heard and recognized by the persons to whom they were sent—Luke ii. 14—and they exerted their power over the sense of feeling; for the angel who appeared to Peter in the prison, "smote him on the side, and raised him up." In these instances angels manifested themselves to men through the medium of the three principal senses, by which we recognize the properties of material objects; and why, then, should we consider them as purely immaterial substances, having no connection with the visible universe? We have no knowledge of angels but from Revelation; and all the descriptions it gives of these beings, leads us to conclude, that they are connected with the world of matter as well as of mind, and are furnished with organical vehicles, composed of some refined material substance suitable to their nature and employments. When Christ shall appear the second time, we are told, that he is to come, not only in the glory of his Father, but also in the "glory of his holy angels," who will minister unto him, and increase the splendor of his appearance. Now, the glory which the angels will display, must be visible, and, consequently, material; otherwise, it would present no glory or lustre to their view. An assemblage of purely spiritual beings, however numerous, and however exalted in point of intelligence, would be mere inanity, in a sense intended to exhibit a visible display of the Divine supremacy and grandeur. The vehicles, or bodies of angels, are, doubtless, of a much finer mould than the bodies of men; but although they were at all times invisible. through such organs of vision as we possess, it would form no proof that they were destitute of such corporeal frames.

The air we breathe is a material substance, yet it is invisible; and there are substances whose rarity is more than ten times greater than that of the air of our atmosphere. Hydrogen gas is more than twelve times lighter than common atmospheric air. If, therefore, an organized body were framed of a material substance similar to air or hydrogen gas, it would in general be invisible; but in certain circumstances, might reflect the rays of light, and become visible, as certain of the lighter gaseous bodies are found to do. This is, in some measure, exemplified in the case of animalcula, whose bodies are imperceptible to the naked eye, and yet are regularly organized material substances, endowed with all the functions requisite for life, motion, and enjoyment."

To whose striking suggestions may not inappropriately be added, the acute observations of a kindred philosopher and that original thinker, Sir Thomas Browne. "Intuitive perception in spiritual beings may, perhaps, hold some analogy unto vision, but yet how they see us or one another, what eyes, what light, or what perception is requisite unto their intuition, is yet dark unto our apprehension,—and even how they see God, or how unto our glorified eyes, the beautiful vision will be celebrated, another world must tell us, when our perceptions will be new, and we may hope to behold invisibles.

"Again, desert not thy title to a divine particle and urion with invisibles. Acquaint thyself with the choragium of the stars, and consider the vast expansion beyond them. Let intellectual tubes give thee a glance of things which visive organs reach not. Have a glimpse of incomprehensibilities, and thoughts of things which thought but tenderly touch. Lodge immaterialities in thy head, ascend unto invisibles, fill thy spirit with spirituals, with the mysteries of faith, the magnalities of religion, and thy life with the honor of God, without which, though giants in wealth and dignity, we are but dwarfs and pigmies in humanity, and may hold a pitiful rank in that triple division of mankind, heroes, men, and beasts. For though human souls are said to be equal, yet, is there no small quality in their operations; some maintain the allowable station of men, many are far below it; and some have been so divine as to approach the apogeum of their natures, and to be in the very confinium of spirits."

Leaving the obscure frontiers and uncertain boundaries of doubtful speculations, we gladly re-enter the clearer atmosphere and reascend to the brighter scenes and more brilliant prospects which belong to the ethereal region of a satisfying belief and the sublimer decisions of the metaphysics of a biblical faith-recalled and re-animated by the exciting expostulation of St. Paul's glorious interrogatory, realizing the promise of our hope, the foundation of our faith, the perfection of holiness, and the victory of Redemption. Why should it be thought incredible with you, that God should raise the dead ?—or the thrilling and magnanimous challenge of the valiant warrior, the apostolic champion of the MYSTIC CROSS. Where is the wise, where is the scribe, where is the disputer of this world? Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? For after all that, in the wisdom of God, the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that BELIEVE.

The annexed particulars have been selected from Allen's Modern Judaism ;-a most entertaining and instructive work, displaying an elaborate and extensive research into rabbinical literature, and a familiar acquaintance with Jewish traditions;-on account of the very extraordinary fictions, and representations and discrepancies which they embrace respecting the creation, other circumstances and events of the angelical world.

TRADITIONARY AND ANECDOTICAL.

"The rabbinical writings abound with traditions concerning angels. Of the time of their creation different accounts are given by different rabbies; who have endeavored to support their respective statements by the citation of texts of Scripture, which they wish their readers to accept as decisive proofs of what they have taken upon themselves to affirm. To the question, 'When were the angels created?' Rabbi Jochanan answered, 'The angels were created on the second day; this is what is written;' 'who layeth the beams of chambers in the waters; who maketh the clouds his chariot; who walketh upon the wings of the wind; who maketh his angels spirits.'-Psalm civ. 3, 4. Rabbi Chanina said, 'The angels were created on the fifth day; this is what is found written.'

'And fowl that may fly about the earth;' and, with twain, he did fly.'-Gen. i. 20, Isaiah vi. 2. Rabbi Luliani maintains the orthodoxy of both these statements. They who follow the opinion of Rabbi Chanina, and those who adhere to that of Rabbi Jochanan, all agree that the angels were not created on the first day, that it might not be said Michael spread out the firmament in the south, Gabriel in the north, and the holy and blessed God in the middle; but "I am the Lord that maketh all things, that stretcheth forth the heavens above, that spreadeth abroad the earth by myself."—Isaiah xxiv. 24. Rabbi Bechai harmonizes them.

'There are some angels who continue forever, namely, those who were created on the second day but others perish, according to the explanation of our rabbies of blessed memory, who say that the holy and the blessed God created daily a multitude of angels who sing an anthem to his praise and glory, and then perish; and they are those who were created on the fifth day.' Another rabbi contradicts them all. 'Before the creation of the world, the blessed God created the shape of the holy angels, who were the beginning of all created beings, and were derived from a glance of his glory.' The description of Daniel, A fiery stream issued and came forth before him ;' 'thousand thousands minister unto him,' is supposed by Jaechiades to represent angels as emanations from the divine essence. He means to say, that they are of the very substance of that divine light which is of the same nature with the throne of glory; and because they are supporters of the throne, which is flaming fire, that is, pure light; though there can be no doubt, but that the light of the throne is a more transcendent light, because it is with God, himself, and emanated from him the first of any; whereas the angels were created afterwards, being seraphs, and a stream of fire, that is, light drawn from the first light.' But this comment is at variance with the Talmud, which from the same text had extracted the doctrine of a daily creation of angels who immediately sing an anthem and then expire;

that standard of Jewish orthodoxy not confirming this production of celestial ephemera to one particular day, as Rabbi Bechia does, but extending it to every day. Every day ministering angels are created out of the river Dinor or fiery stream, Daniel vii. 10, and they sing an anthem and cease to exist; as it is written; "They are new every morning; great is thy faithfulness. Lam. iii. 23. One book of high authority asserts all angels to be short-lived creatures of a single day. "The emperor Adrian (let his bones be pounded) once asked Rabbi Joshua, the son of Chanina: you say that none of the multitude of angels above do praise God twice, but the holy and blessed God creates every day in heaven, a multitude of angels who sing an anthem before him and then perish." And Rabbi Joshua answered him; "yea, we do say so." Another represents some angels as exempted from this fate. The holy and blessed God creates every day a multitude of angels, and they sing a hymn; except Michael and Gabriel and the princes of the chariot and the Metraton and Sandalphon, and their equals, who remain in their glory with which they were invested in the six days' creation of the world, and their names are never changed. After their hymn of praise the "ephemeral angels return again to the river Dinor, which is the place of their creation, and is derived from the sweat of those animals which are under the throne of glory, which sweat because they carry the throne of God." Some angels are said to be created from fire; others from water; others from wind; but from the sixth verse of the thirty-third psalm, Rabbi Jonathan inferred that there is an angel created by every word that proceeds out of the mouth of God." Angels are described as differing greatly in magnitude and stature. The Talmud declares one angel to be taller than another by as many miles as a man would travel in a journey of five hundred years. One rabbi affirms, "that four classes of ministering angels sing praises in the presence of the holy and blessed God. The first class, at the head of which is Michael, is on the right hand; the second, under Gabriel, on the left; the third, under Uriel, before him; the fourth, under Raphael, behind him; and the divine Majesty is in the midst, seated on a throne high and lifted up." The distance at which the angels stand from the divine Majesty, is pretended to be stated by the famous Rabbi Akiba, almost with the geometrical exactness of an actual admeasurement. High rabbinical authority affirms that angels were consulted respecting the creation of man; that they divided into two parties, some strongly recommending his creation, and others loudly protesting against it; that while they were in a fierce pursuit on the subject God made Adam without their knowledge, and then informed them that their contentions were useless, for that man was already created.

Whatever satisfaction or dissatisfaction was produced in the angelic council by this decision, it was, long after, arranged at the bar of rabbinical scrutiny, and judgment was formally pronounced against the Creator. The following anecdote of piety and sapience is recorded in the Talmud. "The wise men say that for a number of years the school of Shammai and the school of Hillel disputed amongst themselves; some asserting that it would have been better if man had not been created; others contending that it was better for man to have been created. The votes being at length collected and counted, the majority were of opinion that it would have been better if man had not been created; but that now since he had been created, it was his duty to lead a virtuous life. Another rabbinical author asserts that the angels were previously consulted about the creation of the world. Among the Jews it is a received opinion, that the world was created on the first day of the month Tisri, and that on this day God sits in judgment on mankind; when three books are opened, of the righteous who observe the precepts, of the middling, and presumptuously wicked. The righteous are instantly written to everlasting life, and the wicked assigned to the burning fire. Those whose works are equal, remain in a state of suspense till the day of atonement. If, however, they forsake their evil works, and manifest repentance, their portion, ultimately, will be with the righteous; but if reformation do not intervene, death will be their destination."

The following additional traditionary and anecdotical statement of the diverse opinions and strange speculations which have been entertained by various writers, together with some curious particulars respecting the formation of the world, the creation and intercourse of angels, the first pair, the apostasy, Paradise, the nature of the soul, &c., may not be regarded as altogether uninteresting.

Some have imagined that the angels were created at the same time that Adam was made; while others have again considered the speculation as inconsistent or unworthy of belief from the supposition that sufficient time was not allowed for the obedience and probation of the angels in which to manifest their respective characters and moral dispositions. From the period of Adam's creation to the time of his fall, ten days were supposed to have transpired, which has undergone the following singular and descriptive calculation. Adam it appears was created on the sixth day, which was Saturday, the next being the Sabbath; which no doubt he observed and sanctified by worship; for, it is said, God ceased from his labor on that day and rested. On Monday, the animals were brought, in procession, by pairs, before him, to receive their appropriate names. On Tuesday, finding himself still companionless, God caused him to fall into a deep sleep, and took from his side the famous rib from which was produced the mother of mankind. Wednesday was occupied by Adam and Eve in forming one another's acquaintance, and selecting a suitable resting-place for the approaching night. Thursday was noted for the giving of the divine law expressing the conditions of life and death. On Friday they were shown the garden and trees of Paradise and instructed in what manner to dress and cultivate them. On Saturday they commenced their agreeable labors, unattended, however, by fatigue, indulging themselves in delightful conversation, in the examination and comparison of the beautiful objects of Paradise, and from which originated all the social happiness of the globe. On the Sabbath, they rested. Adam, with his heaven-given bride, celebrated the second Sabbath of the creation, employing its sacred hours in recounting the history of their first thoughts, and complacent interviews with angelic spirits, referring to the power and wisdom and benevolence of their Maker, and other suitable acts of devotion and holy aspirations. On Monday, they again resumed their attention to the garden of Eden, ascertaining the different kinds of fruits most delicious to their taste, beguiling their occupation by their happy conversation. Their language was imparted to them by Inspiration, and was the most comprehensive, eloquent and musical that could possibly salute the ears of immortals, resonant with the melody of heaven. On Tuesday, they became excursive in their imaginations, and desirous of knowing further respecting the extent and productions of Paradise, to wonder at its immensity, luxuriate in the profusion of its bounty, and look over its battlements to the country beyond or beneath it. The first pair, now separated from one another in the extensive grounds of the garden of Eden, but with greeting smiles met one another, at every opening of the enchanting scenery through which they wandered. As inclination actuated our first parents, so they were attracted by the fascinating objects which surrounded them. A beautiful stream, which formed a cascade, that dashed its transparent waters over a ledge of diamonds, arrested the notice and charmed the ears of our primogenitor Adam. During this time, Eve had seen at a distance, on a mount, the most gorgeous landscape of blushing roses, golden fruited trees, and luscious vines; while thousands of birds of Paradise feather the fragrant air with their burnished wings, warbling ethereal songs in harmony with the Æolian zephyrs of the atmosphere. Enchanted with the beauty of the surrounding loveliness, unobserved and unsuspected by Adam, who remained in fixed admiration by the iridescent cascade of the head waters of the Euphrates, Eve stole away. Surprised by the sportive play of a glittering fish in the silvery stream, which had not passed before him on the day he had designated the animals, he looked around to communicate his joyful astonishment to his fair helpmate, but discovered she had strayed away from his side. Not doubting of soon finding her, he strolled gently down the stream, when passing by a delicious grove of oranges, he saw her afar, descending a grassy acclivity, having in her hands the very fruit of the forbidden tree, of which she soon prevailed upon him to eat;

"Whose mortal taste
Brought death into the world, and all our woe,
With loss of Eden."

This disastrous event completed the tenth day, including the Saturday of his creation.

The comparative extent of Eve's delinquency in proportion to Adam's guilt, has also exercised the elaborate ingenuity of the commentators, and they mostly agree that since she was not created when the prohibition was issued, she could not therefore have heard it, a conclusion confirmed by the inaccurate manner in which she reports it to the serpent; her share in the crime of disobedience is consequently considerably lighter than Adam's. In corroboration of this view of the matter, it is asserted that the Deity addressed his reproaches to Adam, alone, for having partaken of the forbidden fruit; whilst the gallantry of one annotator upon the words "I will put enmity between thee and woman," affirms the proof, that the sex from that period, became enlisted into the service of heaven as the chief foe and obstacle, which the Spirit of Evil would have to contend with in his inroads on this world.

"The fall of Adam by frail Eve-entic'd,
Was his own death, ours, and the death of Christ;
In whose backsliding may be apprehended
Offenders three, three offences, three offended.
The three offenders that mankind still grieve
Were Satan, Adam, and our grandam Eve;`
The three offences that sin first advanced
Were malice, weakness, and blind ignorance ;
The three offended to whom this was done,
The Holy Spirit, Father, and the Son.
Thus in the devilish Alcoran 'tis said
God i' the beginning four things made,

And those with his own hands: the first a pen,
Which all things from the first to the last, both when
And how they were created (writes at large ;)
The second thing he took into his charge
Was the man Adam, and the self-same day

He fashioned him of parti-colored clay,
And that's the reason (neither think it strange)
That in men's faces there is still such change
And contrariety in look and hair,
Some black, some brown, some tawny and some fair;
The third a throne, his majesty to grace;
The fourth for souls a blessed resting place
Called Paradise.-
As yet for instance, before man's creation,
The earth had solid and a firm foundation,
And was inhabited in time forepast,
By devils first, then angels, Adam last."
-HEYWOOD, Hierarchie of Angells.

Whether Eve was created in Paradise or not, has caused much controversy amongst the fathers and theologians. With respect to Adam, it is agreed, that he was created outside and put into Eden, to undergo the temptation which issued in his fall. Some of the commentators inquire with considerable warmth, why should woman, the ignoble creature of the two, be created inside? To which query, others again reply, that it was but a fair tribute to her beauty and purity that it should be so, and that in compliment to her, if the scene of creation was not already Paradise, on that event (her creation), it became so immediately. Josephus is amongst the number who believe she was made outside. The generality of the sentiments of the fathers upon this difficult subject is in favor of her being produced inside Paradise. The Rabbies have made some strange additions to the Mosaic account of the fall. They assert that Eve perceiving, by certain indications, that in consequence of eating the forbidden fruit, she must certainly die, thereupon determined that her husband should partake of the same, and amiably informed him that he must perish with her; urging him to taste of the interdicted fruit. Meeting her solicitations with repeated refusals, she tore off a branch from the tree, and belabored him without mercy, until he was induced to comply with her request; saying, this was the accusation preferred by Adam in his reply to Jehovah, "The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree (that is, according to rabbinical interpretation, she cudgeled me with a bough of the tree) and I did eat." Some divines count Adam thirty years old at his creation, because they suppose him created in the perfect age and stature of man. Adam is represented as having been created of such an enormous height that he reached from earth to heaven. When the ministering angels saw him, they trembled and feared. What did they do? They all went up before God in the upper habitation and said, 'Lord of the Universe! There are two powers in the world.' Then God laid his hand upon Adam's head and reduced him to a thousand cubits; other rabbies affirm him to have been reduced to nine hundred cubits,-two hundred cubits-one hundred cubits in stature. They further mention, that in the hour in which God created the first man, he made a double person, male and female, with two faces, but joined them behind. That he afterwards cut asunder this two-fold person, thereby forming a man and a woman; and made a back for each. Not satisfied with converting Adam into a monster, the rabbies have degraded him into the similitude of an ape; gravely asserting that the creator made him with a tail, resembling an ourang-outang (Lord Monboddo's theory) but afterwards cut it off to increase his beauty. The following serio-comico description is too curious to be omitted. Adam and Eve being buried in the cave of Machpelah, this altercation is said to have happened between them. About twelve hundred years after their death, when Abraham was preparing to bury Sarah in the double cave, they arose, feeling unwilling to remain there any longer. They said, 'We have always been ashamed and confounded before the blessed God on account of the sin we have committed, and you are come to increase our disgrace, for your good works overwhelm us.'. Abraham answered: 'I promise that I will intercede with God for you, that you may not be confounded any more.' And so Adam returned to his place; but Eve, by no means satisfied with this, would not re-enter; whereupon Abraham, without losing much time, carried her, with his own hands, to Adam, and buried Sarah and Eve together. The grotesque notion was also held by some of the rabbies, that angels have bodies, which if cut, with admirable skill, would soon come together again, like the property of vermicular substances.

Amongst their ridiculous fables, the Rabbins mention as the descendants of Sammael, who was a fallen seraph, Adam and Eve. When the blessed God created the first man, whom he formed alone, without a companion, he said, 'It is not good that the man should be alone,' and therefore he created a woman and named her Lilith. They immediately began to contend with each other for superiority. The man said it behooves thee to be obedient, I am to rule over thee. The woman replied, we are on a perfect equality, for we were both formed out of the same earth. So neither would submit to the other. Lilith seeing this, uttered the Shem-hamp-horath, that is, pronounced the name of Jehovah, and instantly flew away through the air. Adam then addressed himself to God and said, 'Lord of the Universe! the woman whom thou gavest me has flown away from me.' God immediately dispatched three angels, Sennoi, Sansennoi, and Sammangeloph to bring back the fugitive. He said to them: If she consent to return, well; but if not, you are to leave her, after declaring to her that a hundred of her children shall die every day. These angels then pursued her, and found her in the midst of the sea, in the mighty waters in which the Egyptians were to be afterwards destroyed. They made known to her the divine message, but she refused to return. They threatened unless she would return to drown her in the sea. She then said, Let me go; for I was created for no other purpose than to debilitate and destroy infants; my power over the males will extend to eight days, and over the females to twenty days after their birth. On hearing this, the angels were proceeding to seize her, and carry her back to Adam by force, but Lilith swore by the name of the living God, that she would refrain from doing any injury to infants, whenever and wherever she should find those angels or their names or their pictures, on parchment or paper, or on whatever else they might be written or drawn, and she consented to the punishment denounced against her by God, that a hundred of her children should die every day. Hence it is that every day witnesses the death of a hundred demons of her progeny. And for this reason, young we write the names of these angels on slips of paper or parchment, and bind them upon infants, that Lilith, on seeing them, may remember her oath, and may abstain from doing our infants any injury. Another rabbinical writer says, 'I have also heard, that when the child laughs in its sleep in the night of the Sabbath or of the new moon, the Lilith laughs and toys with it, and that its proper father or mother, or any one that sees the infant laugh, to tap it on the nose and say, Hence, begone, cursed Lilith, for thy abode is not here, which should be said three times, and each repetition should be accompanied with a pat on the nose. This is of great benefit because it is in the power of Lilith to destroy children whenever she pleases.'

Some of the ancient divines held the opinion, that the creation of the angels was concealed from Moses, lest any man should apprehend (like some heretics of old) that they aided and assisted God in the formation of the world, when they only appeared as spectators; lest they should be deified, and the honor due to the Creator be conferred upon the creature. The schoolmen placed Paradise in the east, because the east is the nobler quarter, the right hand being more noble than the left, and the east being on the right. The period during which our first parents enjoyed their state of innocence, is as much disputed as the site of Paradise. Some extend the period to one hundred years, others, contract it to three hours; and a few, grant seven years. Cedrenus and Chrysostom place the fall on the evening of the day, in which Adam was created; and there are others who assign to the Protoplasti (as our first parents have been named), as many years of paradisiacal beatitude, as were occupied by our Saviour's ministry on earth.

The jesuit, Hardouin, places the terrestrial paradise in Palestine, intersected by the Jordan, and not far north from Enon, near Salim, in which John baptized. Different speculations have situated paradise in the third, fourth, or in the lunar heaven, in the moon itself, in a mountain near the lunar heaven, in the middle region of the air, without and above, and beneath the earth, in a place where the ken of man can never reach, under the arctic pole, in that spot of Tartary now occupied by the Caspian seas, in the extreme south, in a land of fire, in the east, on the banks of the Ganges, in Ceylon, in China, in an uninhabited place beyond the east, in America, in Africa, under the equator, above the mountains of the moon, from which the Nile is supposed to arise, in Armenia, in Mesopotamia, Assyria, Persia, in Babylonia, and in Arabia. The Gannath, or happy garden of the Mahommedans, is compared to Paradise, irrigated by rivers of incorruptible water, streams of milk, pleasant wine, and clarified honey; containing flowing fountains, and abounding with all kinds of fruit, furnished with couches lined with embroidered silk, and covered with beautiful carpets interwoven with gold. Beauteous damsels, pure virgins with complexions like rubies and pearls, attended by youth with goblets of flowing wine. With the Mussulmen, it is a disputed question whether the future Paradise is already created or whether it will be created hereafter. The orthodox maintain that its locality is in the seventh heaven under the throne of God: that its soils consist of the finest wheat flour, or of the purest musk, or of saffron; its stones are pearls, and jacinths; the walls of its buildings are enriched with gold and silver, and the trunks of all its trees are of gold. The most remarkable tree in the palace of Mahommed is the Tuba, the tree of happiness, extending its boughs to the abode of every true believer. It affords grapes, dates, and pomegranates more luscious than ever regaled mortal palate, upon its twigs are ready dressed birds, silken mantles and horses with rich housings, all like fairy gifts in a pantomime, will burst from its opening fruits at a wish. The black-eyed damsels or Houris are formed of pure musk; some of the pavilions in which they reside are sixty miles square. Eight gates will lead to Paradise, and the first entertainment of the blessed, will be the whole earth presented as a single cake of bread, the ox Balâm and the fish Nûn, the lobes of whose liver will suffice for seventy thousand men. The very meanest will have eighty thousand servants and seventy-two Houris, besides all the wives whom they married when living. Whenever he eats, three hundred attendants will serve his table, with three hundred golden dishes at once. Wine, not forbidden in Paradise, will be supplied in equal variety and abundance. Perpetual youth will be the portion of the glorified inhabitants, who, at whatever age they may die, will be raised with the power and vigor of a man of thirty, and their stature will be increased to equal that of Adam, who measured sixty cubits.

Respecting the soul, the heathens supposed it was a coruscation of the sphere or particle of the Deity, and had an existence anterior to the foundation of the heavens. The modern Jews maintained the preexistence of the soul, considering it an emanation of the Deity, and eternal in its nature.

The Chaldeans represented the soul as originally endowed with wings, which fall away when it shrinks from its native element, and must be produced before it can hope to return. Some disciples of Zoroaster once inquired of him, "How the wings of the soul might be made to grow again." "By sprinkling them," he replied, "with the waters of life.” "But where are those waters to be found?" they asked. "In the garden of God," replied Zoroaster.

The mythology of the Persians has allegorized the same doctrine in the history of those genii who strayed from their dwellings in the stars, and obscured their original nature by mixture with the material spheres; while the Egyptians connecting it with the ascent and descent of the sun in the Zodiac, consider autumn as emblematical of the soul's decline toward darkness, and the reappearance of spring as its return to life and light.

The Rabbinical fictions of the loves of Uzziel and the Schamchazai, may represent the fall of the soul from its original purity, and the loss of light and happiness which it suffers in the pursuit of the world's perishable pleasure; and the punishment both from conscience and divine justice with which impurity, pride, and presumptuous inquiry into the awful secrets of nature are sure to be visited.

The ancients fancied that impure souls, after their departure out of the body, wandered up and down, for a certain space, in their spirituous, vaporous, and airy body, appearing about sepulchres and haunting their former habitations.

The Arabians held the opinion that the souls of men perished with their bodies, but should yet be raised again at the last day.

It was forbidden by the Council of Iliberit, in the year 313, to kindle a candle in a burying ground, lest it should disturb the souls of the departed. And that the dead, whose bodies were not decently interred, could not enter the world of spirits, but would have to wander about on the earth, was the general belief in Homer's time.

Origen supposed that God would not persist in his vengeance forever, but after a definite time of his wrath, he would release the damned soul from torture. He imagined it to exist anterior to the body, which as its earthly prison, would not rise again.

Pythagoras entertained the opinion of a three-fold constitution of the soul. The stoics, however, repudiated the idea of triple souls, or a triad of the mind.

The Rabbies divided the soul into three compartments-the seats of reason,-of appetite,-and of the passions.

They also held the conceit, that there is a heaven or treasury of souls called Gelph, from which God furnishes children, before their birth. On the sixth day of their existence, souls are described as having the honor of being consulted regarding their future incarnation into bodies. When the Creator said, 'Let us make man,' &c., he addressed the souls, and did not force them into the body, as a prison, without their consent. That in their original and glorious state, for centuries they enjoy the utmost happiness previously to their being embodied; and might again realize the same felicity after death; rendering the resurrection of the dead needless. The descent into and occupation of the body, however, is represented as not always perfectly voluntary. Take the following specimen of the union of the spirit to the embryo body. God beckons to the angel who is set over spirits, and says to him, Pray send me such a spirit. Presently he appears before Jehovah, and worships in his presence. Then says Jehovah to him: Betake thyself to this matter. Instantly the spirit excuses himself, and says unto him: Governor of the world, I am fully satisfied with the world in which I have existed from the day I was created; if it please thee, do not oblige me to betake myself unto this putrid matter, for I am holy and pure. Jehovah says unto him, The world into which I am going to send thee, is better than the world whence thou art; besides, when I formed thee, I did not make thee but for this matter; whereupon, God immediately coerces him, whether willing or unwilling, into the midst of the matter.

The foregoing, and many other vagaries, even more extravagant, which might be adduced from Talmudical and Rabbinical writings, are taken, be it remembered, from books which the Jews hold more sacred than the Bible of the Old Testament; and painful is the reflection, that such puerile fancies should still becloud the understandings, in connection with that awful delusion and disbelief which still paralyze the heart of Israel—once the peculiar and favorite people of Jehovah, to whom appertained the law, the prophets and the covenants-and of whom as concerning the flesh, Christ came, who is over all, God blessed forever.-Romans ix. 5.

In the prosecution of our inquiries, under the second division of our delightful theme, we are not forbidden the appropriate and auxiliary application of the law or principle of analogy, which we have previously employed; provided we invade not the sacred jurisdiction, nor trespass beyond the permitted boundary of an evangelical Faith,—on whose awful Peniel of solemn mysteries, wrestling Reason, Jacob-like, oft adventures with her sublime truths, a determined encounter; refusing to surrender, until the Angel of the covenant, at the day-dreak of spiritual illumination, touching the sinew of bold presumption, and checking the inquiry of vain curiosity, commands her to proceed onwards, though with the halting step of human frailty, in the toilsome and troublous journey of mortality, having achieved, in the glorious contest, the benediction and assurance of Divine aid and protection, as the victory of prevailing prayer.

The interdict of Scripture is not suspended over the supposition, that in the stupendous operations of Deity, a vast and boundless scale of beings exist, confirmed to the hallowed and modest inspection of Reason, as established by the developments and discoveries of science, and further sanctioned by the inspired declaration of apostolic authority, "That one star differeth from another star in glory;" whilst in the expanse of devout contemplation, wonders are presented exceeding the utmost ken of mortal faculties, and the still more astonishing and brighter perceptions of angfec-intelligences—Canst thou by searching find out God?

Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection!

Any attempt, how ingenious soever or plausible, to fathom
the amazing and awful machinery of the Divine Architect, eyond the precincts of Revelation, is not only vain and un-fitable, but obvious impiety; and it is on this principle we indignantly reject, notwithstanding his pretended tions, the absurd supernaturalism of the Sweden-ry of the intimate correspondency of terrestrial h the celestial economy; as being in direct oppothe sacred averment of Inspiration, that Eye hath seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God has prepared for them that love him, as a daring encroachment upon the invisible and resplendent domains of a genuine Faith.

The subtle efforts, also, of another class of theorists, are equally objectionable, who would endeavor to reconcile the verities and mysteries of Christianity with the infidel notion of an eternal series; so ably considered and refuted in the following observation, of one of the strongest intellects, since the days of the Royal Preacher, which has appeared in gladiatorial conflict upon the capacious arena, of the splendid amphitheatre of metaphysical controversy and ethical science.

Soame Jenyns, in his Free Inquiry,—and to whose theory corresponded that of Pope* and Lord Bolingbroke,—

*"See through this air, this ocean, and this earth,
All matter quick, and bursting into birth;
Above, how high progressive life may go!
Around, how wide! how deep extend below!
Vast chain of being! which from God began

ached the hypothesis, that there exists a vast and finely graduated chain of being, from Infinity to non-enity—from God to nothing; and that to exclude a single link out of the

Beast, bird, fish, insect,-what our eye can see,
No glass can reach; from Infinite to thee,
From thee to nothing. On superior powers
Were we to press, inferior might on ours;
Or in the full creation leaves a void,
Where one step broken, the great scales, destroyed
From nature's chain, whatever link you strike,
Tenth, or tenth thousandth, breaks the chain alike."
Essay on Man.

For there is in this universe a scale of creatures, rising not disorderly or in confusion, but with a comely method and proportion. Between creatures of mere existence and things of life, there is a large disproportion of nature; between plants and animals and creatures of sense, a wider difference; between them and man a far greater; and if the proportion held between man and angels there should be yet greater.-SIR THOMAS BROWNE, Religio.

Writers have not been wanting who enforce the doctrine of necessity with regard to all the phenomena of nature, as concatenated in a chain of iron mechanism, and affirm that an unbroken chain of gradually advancing organization has been evolved from the crystal to the globule, and thence through the successive stages of the polypus, the mollusk, the insect, the fish, the reptile, the bird, and the beast, up to the monkey and man. But while, on the other hand, we avoid being led away by the dazzling generality, or being offended with a wild speculation, reckless alike of inductive fasts and of moral consequences, let us not reject a principle which, when viewed, in subservient relation to other principles, may prove to exist, and to have a place in the reality of things.—HARRIS, Pre-Adamite Earth.

All the leading nations of the heathen world have fallen upon the belief of intermediate beings between man and the Great Supreme. The Dii Minores of the Latins and Greeks; the multitude of inferior gods amongst the Egyptians; the Amshaspands and Izeds, and Defs of Zoroaster and the Persians; the innumerable subordinate deities of the Hindoos, as well as other nations, all substantiate the propensity of the human mind to inculcate the doctrine of the existence of an order of intermediate beings between man and the Supreme.

concatenation would be destructive of the beauty and perfection of the whole. Dr. Johnson, however, asserted in opposition to this sentiment, "That this chain, from the very nature of things, must be incomplete at both ends-that between that which does, and that which does not exist, there must be an infinite difference, that chain, therefore, cannot be attached to nothing." The moralist further demonstrated, "That between the greatest of finite existences, and the adorable Infinite, there must exist another illimitable void,—that between unlimitedness and the limited, there must evidently appear an inevitable separation in nature and qualities, in relation to the existent and non-existent. He also asserted, that not only is it incomplete at both ends, but that we must view it as nearly incomplete, in many of its intermediate links, as well as at the terminal ones; that it is already a broken chain, seeing that between its various classes of existence, myriads of intervening existences might be produced by graduating more minutely what must necessarily be capable of infinite gradation; and that to base an infidel theory on the imaginary completeness of what is positively incomplete, and the impossibility of a gap existing in what is already replete with vacuities, is just to base one absurdity upon another.

"The scale of existence from Infinity to nothing cannot possibly have being. The highest being not infinite, must, be at an infinite distance from Infinity. Cheyne, who, with the desire inherent in mathematicians, to reduce everything to mathematical images, considering all existences as a cone, and allowing the basis is at an infinite distance from the body, in this distance between finite and infinite, there will be room for an infinite series of indefinable existences.

"Between the lowest positive existence and nothing, whenever we suppose actual existence to cease, is another chasm infinitely deep, where there is room, again, for endless orders of subordinate nature, continued forever and ever, and yet infinitely superior to non-existence. To these meditative excursions humanity is unequal. But we may inquire, not of our Maker, but of each other, since on the one side, creation, whenever it stops, must pause infinitely below Infinity, and on the other, infinitely above nothing, what necessity there is, that it should proceed so far either way-that being, so high or so low, should ever have existed. We may interrogate, but can any created wisdom supply an adequate rejoinder !"

Dr. Dick observes: "When we consider the variety of original forms and intellectual capacities which abound in our terrestrial systems, and that there is an infinite gap in the scale of being between the human mind and the Supreme Intelligence, it appears quite conformable to the magnificent harmony of the universe, and to the wisdom and beneficence of its Almighty Author, to suppose, there are beings within the range of his dominion as far superior to man in the comprehension and extent of mental and corporeal powers, as man is, in these respects, superior to the visible, despicable insect; and that these beings, in point of number, may exceed all human calculation and comprehension. The idea is corroborated by several intimations contained in the records of revelation, where we have presented to our view a class of intelligences, endowed with physical energies, power of rapid motion, and a grasp of intellect incomparably superior to those which are possessed by any of the beings which belong to our sublunary system."

Furthermore. In the scale wheresoever it begins or ends are infinite hiatus. At whatever distance we conceive the next order of being elevated above man, there is room for an intervenient order of beings between them; and if for one, then an infinite concatenation of other orders, since everything that admits of more or less, and consequently all the parts of that which admit them, may be infinitely subdivided; so that as far as we can judge, there may be room in the vacuity between any two steps of the scale, or between any two points of the cone of being, for the infinite exertion of infinite power.

A becoming apprehension of the glorious attributes and moral perfection of God inclines to the conviction that He would take pleasure in calling into existence beings bearing a nearer resemblance to the spirituality of the divine nature, and renders it, therefore, not improbable, that Jehovah would create more than one order of intelligent and holy beings to reflect the glories of the Godhead, and celebrate with the seraphic praises of eternity the infinite benevolence and wisdom, and holiness of the incomprehensible I AM. Upon this supposition several philosophic writers have suggested that the planets are inhabited by rational beings as harmonizing with the arrangements of creative power, visible in the uniformity and developments of the natural world; and a similar inference has been drawn by theologians respecting the multitude and rank and precedency of the glorious inhabitants of the heavenly state.

The hypothesis is not without foundation, that a variety of orders prevail amongst the illustrious inhabitants of the celestial world, as consonant with the exhibitions and manifestations of almighty design and purpose, illustrated by an appeal to the physical constitution of the material universe which connects the solar system with others of a similar nature, and these not improbably, with some still greater and more magnificent central system, around which they revolve, and to which they are subordinate. What, therefore, is true and applicable with respect to the physical universe by the parity of analogy, may be correct in reference to the great moral universe, in which Deity is represented as the central and all-influencing Sun.

"It is highly probable, independent of Revelation, that there are many orders of beings superior to man. To suppose our own species to be the highest production of Divine power would indicate irrational and puerile presumption. When we consider the infinite variety of creatures presented to our notice in the descending scale between us and nothing, it is agreeable to analogy to conceive the number is not less of those which are above us; the probability of which is enhanced by the discoveries now made of the extent of the universe, and of the existence of bodies compared to which the globe we inhabit is but a spot. While there are known to be material systems immensely superior in magnitude to that with which we are conversant, what should lead us to doubt that there are in the intellectual world beings possessing an equal mental superiority? It surely will not be pretended that there are any properties discernible in man that mark him out as the most transcendent workmanship of the Deity, the masterpiece of almighty power; or that there is any ground for supposing creative energy suspended its operations here, rather than at any other point in its progress. The distance between us and nothing is infinite, yet the interval is occupied and filled up with innumerable orders of sensitive beings; how improbable is it, then, that the distance between us and Deity, which is infinite, is an empty void! Were all the secrets of the material world laid open, and the whole structure of the human mind, with all the laws of thought, volition and emotion perfectly developed and explained, we should not be a step nearer to a solution of the question, under present consideration, nor at all more qualified to determine the number and orders of superior intelligences, or what station they occupied, or the faculties by which they are distinguished."*

An order of angels is as consentaneous with the natural apprehension of our minds, as the orders of beings lower than man, are with the observations of our senses.-PROF. STUART, Bibliotheca Sacra.

In the works of creation with which we are acquainted, we find a regular gradation pervading the whole; from the rudest specimen of brute matter, up to man, the lord and ruler of the lower world. Minerals, vegetables, and animals rise regularly in dignity, one above the other; the lowest species of these kingdoms of nature ascend, but little above the highest in that immediately beneath it; and no where do we find wide transitions or gaps in the scale of existence. It can scarcely be believed, therefore, that the interval between man and the Supreme Being, which presents such a wide chasm, is totally unpeopled. It is more natural to suppose that the interval is filled up by numerous orders of intelligent creatures, to whom the blessing of existence has been imparted by the Creator, and who are, in a variety of ways, subservient to the accomplishment of the purposes of providence.—Idem.

How natural does the thought seem which suggested itself to the profound mind of Cuvier, when indulging in a similar review of the wonders and analogies of nature. Has the last scene in the series arisen, or has Deity expended his infinitude of resources and reached the ultimate state of progression at which perfection can arrive? The philosopher hesitated, and then decided in the negative, for he was too intimately acquainted with the works of the omnipotent Creator to think of limiting his power; and he could therefore anticipate a coming period in which man would have to resign his post of honor to some nobler and wiser creature-the monarch of a better and higher world. How well it is to be permitted to indulge in the expansion of Cuvier's thought, without sharing in the melancholy of Cuvier's feelings, to be enabled to look forward to the coming of a new heaven and a new earth, not in horror, but in hope,—to be encouraged to believe in the system of unending progression, but to entertain no fear of the degradation or deposition of man! The adorable Monarch of the future, with all his unsummed perfection, has already passed into the heavens, flesh of our flesh and bone of our bone, and Enoch and Elias are there with him-fit representatives of that dominant race, which no other race shall ever supplant or succeed, and to whose onward and upward march the deep echoes of eternity shall never cease to respond.-HUGH MILLER, Footprints of the Creator.

RANKS AND TITLES.

Attracted by the rich luxuriance, and inviting landscapes of the panoramic scenery of beautiful illustrations, brave thought, curious and speculative theories, by which the pleasing investigation of our sublime subject has been surrounded, we have been detained beyond our intention; and proceed to show, so far as Revelation warrants, the preeminent dignity and exalted station which angelic beings sustain in the boundless empire of creation, irradiated in the dazzling glories of the reflected magnificence of the divine presence and the majestic display of Almighty wisdom and benevolence.

From the various representations which are given in the sacred pages of Holy Writ, respecting these celestial beings, as bearing the character, and fulfilling their exalted destination as attendants around the throne of the Most High, as the illustrious ambassadors of his will, and the appointed executioners of his purposes throughout the domains of universal empire; in connection with the transcendent attributes with which they are endowed, we cannot hesitate in determining, that they hold the highest rank and elevation in the scale of created intelligences. In the heavenly and supernatural visions vouchsafed to Isaiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and St. John, they spoke of their overpowering resplendency, in the most exalted terms of inspired description, and with emotions of consternation and horror, indicative of their surprising grandeur. Mortal dialect fails to afford an adequate expression of their greatness and beauty, by allusions to earthly delineations and distinctions, describing them as the top, flowers, and the masterpieces of creation, the cream of all intelligent excellency, the nobles and princes of the universe, the body-guard of Jehovah, and the cabinet council of the Great Supreme, the miniatures of God. Even imagination, in her loftiest poetical strains, surrenders the attempt as presumptuous and vain; whilst the different and numerous titles attributed to them in the Scriptures, will further establish the pre-eminency of their distinction amongst spiritual existences.

SERAPHIM*; is the title applied, and in the Scriptures specified only, by Isaiah, in his overpowering vision recorded in the sixth chapter of his prophecy, as denominating the highest order of the celestial hierarchy, and as their name indicates, from the Hebrew epithet, burners or burning ones, "glowing with a pure and serene, intense and immortal flame of divine love; returning, without ceasing, the light and warmth which they have received from the great central Sun of the universe; reflecting with supreme beauty the image of that divine Luminary." In the entranced visions of the prophet Ezekiel, and St. John the Divine, the living creatures mentioned, if not precisely identical, present a most striking and very close resemblance. As the symbolical figures in the Holy of Holies were called cherubim, from their proximity to the Divine Presence, so Isaiah appropriates to these glorious beings which he beheld in the spirit, the term of Seraphim, to de-

* Dionysius makes the following arrangement in the precedency of angels; giving the first place to the angels of love, called Seraphim; the second, to the angels of light, styled Cherubim ; and to the third, in their respective rotation, as angels of knowledge, illumination, office and authority, under the terms, thrones, principalities, dominions, powers, virtues, &c.

The Platonists divided angels into three classes. Supercelestes, which stand in the presence of Jehovah; Celestes, who are appointed to govern the stars; Subcelestes, commissioned to rule over kingdoms, cities, and particular persons.

Cardinal Hugo, a famous divine of the twelfth century, distributes the heavenly angels into three classes or hierarchies, each of which he subdivides into three orders. In the highest are cherubim, seraphim, and thrones; in the middle class are dominions, principalities, and powers; in the lowest are virtues, arch-angels and angels.

note their flaming, dazzling appearance; the idea being naturally suggested by the splendid effulgence of the golden cherubs, when they reflected the glory of God in the tabernacle of Israel; and in which belief the Jewish commentators agree: "This is Mercavah, which is the name they give to Ezekiel's vision of the living creatures and the wheels; and this appears by the name Seraphim, which signifies burning. So Ezekiel's living creatures are said to be like burning coals of fire."

Dr. Owen regards the seraphim as a distinct order of angelic beings. The generally received opinion of the Jews maintain, that those visions of the glory of God granted to Isaiah and Ezekiel were the same, and that Ezekiel saw nothing but what Isaiah saw also; only they say, that Ezekiel saw the glory of God and his majesty, as a countryman, who admires all the splendor of the court of a king; Isaiah, as a courtier, who took notice only of the person of the king himself. Isaiah calling the glorious ministers of God, seraphim, from their nature compared to fire and light; Ezekiel, cherubim, from their speed in the accomplishment of their duties. Isaiah saw his vision as in the temple. "I saw the Lord sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up, and his train filled the temple." Aben Ezra and Kimchi, suppose that he saw the throne of God in aven, and only his train of glory descending into the temple; yet it is more probable that he saw the throne itself in the temple, his train spreading abroad to the filling of the whole house; for the temple is called "The throne of his glory," Jer. xiv. 21; and, “A glorious high throne," chap. xvii. 12; that is, a throne high and lifted up, as in this place. Ezekiel saw his vision abroad in the open field, by the river Chebar; chap. i. 3. Isaiah saw first the Lord himself, and then his glorious attendants. Ezekiel saw first the chariot of his glory and then God above it. Isaiah's seraphims had six wings, with two thereof they covered their faces, which Ezekiel's cherubim had not; and that because Isaiah's vision represented Christ, referred to by the Evangelist John: These things said Esaias, when he saw his glory, and spake of him, involving the mystery of the calling of the Gentiles and the rejection of the Jews, and which the angels were not able to look into,-Eph. iii. 9, 10; and were therefore said to cover their faces with their wings, as not being able to look into the depths of those mysteries; but in Ezekiel's vision, when they attended the will of God in the works of his providence, they looked upon them with open face."*

* Amongst the directions of Jehovah given to Moses, he was commanded to make figures of cherubim of solid gold, with which to decorate the mercy-seat of the tabernacle.-Exodus xxv. 18-22. Solomon also, ornamented the altar-piece of his magnificent temple, with immense figures of cherubim.-2 Chron. iii. 13, 14. We have no account, that there was ever made any sculptured or pictorial representations of seraphim. Sir Robert

Ker Porter, however, in his travels in the East, found in Persia an ancient relic, on one side of a square column at Mourg Aub, purporting some resemblance; but it was conjectured to have intended some superior spirit, probably the tutelary genius of the country. It is supposed to have been about the age of Cyrus, the conqueror of Babylon, and to furnish the best, if not the only ancient representation of the seraphim of Scripture. The figure is of the human form, with the wings attached; two of which fall to the feet, and two others rise above the head, which is covered with a symb cal mitre surrounded by horns. The figure faces the temple, with uplifted hands and open, standing in a benedictive attitude. Sir Robert, remarks, "With the exception of the mitre, there is no thing I have seen or read of, which bears so strong a resemblance to the whole figure on the pillar as the ministering or guardian angels described under the name of cherubim, by the different writers in the Bible; and if we are to ascribe these creations to Cyrus, how readily may he have found the models of his genii, either in the spoils of the temple of Jerusalem, which he saw among the treasures of Babylon, or from Jewish descriptions, in the very word of prophecy, which mentions Though their name and title are not declared by the apostle John, it seems clear that the mysterious beings, who in vision were beheld by him when in exile in the isle of Patmos, were seraphim. His description corresponding to that of Isaiah's, "In the midst of the throne, and round about the throne, were four living creatures, full of eyes before and behind. And the four living creatures had each of them six wings about him; and they were full of eyes within; and they rest not day or night, saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come.-Rev. iv. 6-8. "The Lord sitting upon a throne," as in human form, is declared by the apostle to have been Christ in his glory. He alone has manifested the Godhead to men; for, No man hath seen God at any time; the only-begotten Son who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him.-John i. 18. This august emblematical scene relates, therefore, to the pre-existent glory of the Son of God, as our Redeemer.

The "throne high and lifted up," the Rev. Mr. Scott, in his Commentary, observes, "seems to have been the place of the mercy-seat, over which the glory of the Lord used to appear, and where he reigned as the God of Israel over the whole earth; and as an exterior symbol of his majesty," his train or the skirts of his robes filled the whole temple. "Above," or rather over against, this throne stood the seraphim, the burning ones, the most glorious of him by name, and which doubtless would be in the possession of Daniel, and open to the eye of the monarch, to whom it so immediately referred."

In Sweden, about the year 1334, there was a military order instituted with the title of Seraphim; but dormant from the period of the Reformation until 1748. It derived its name from the golden fringes, embroidered with cherubim, whereof the collars of the order were composed. The number of knights, besides the king, and members of the royal family, being limited to twenty-four.

the angelic order. They stood as employed in celebrating his praises, and preparing to execute his mandates. Each of them had six wings; "with twain he covered his face ;" an emblem of his inability steadfastly to behold, or fully to comprehend, all the glory of the Lord, and of profound reverence and adoring awe. "With twain he covered his feet," denoting humility, as conscious that he and his services were unworthy the notice of the Lord, or even of the other seraphim in the presence of the Lord. "And with twain he did fly," representing their prompt celerity and alacrity in executing the will of God; at the same time, they sang aloud, responsive to each other, " Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of Hosts." This three-fold repetition has generally and justly been supposed to refer to the three Divine Persons in the Trinity, and to the holiness displayed in the great work of redemption.* For the seraphim seem to celebrate to the Lord's holy hatred of sin, as displayed both in the salvation of the gospel, and in the punishment of its opposers; in which respect the whole earth, "as well as the heavens has been or will be filled with his glory. While this solemn hymn of praise was echoed from one to another of the angelic worshippers, the post or pillars of the porch of the temple shook at every response, and the whole house was filled with smoke, or thick darkness, as when it was dedicated by Solomon."-1 Kings viii. 10-14.

The Jews say that this treble ascription of praise refers to the three worlds, as if it were, Holy, is Jehovah in the world of spirits; holy, in the middle world of the stars and other heavenly bodies; and holy, upon earth which we inhabit. But leaving this fanciful interpretation, every Christian will readily acknowledge that the mystery of the Trinity of the sacred persons in the adorable Godhead, is the evident mystery contained in this triple celebration of the glory and holiness of Jehovah.

In the book of Numbers, xxi. 6, 8, the fiery serpents there mentioned are called seraphim, either from their color, or from their rage, or the effects of their venomous bite, which produced the most painful inflammation attended with insatiable thirst. Their luminous appearance, when flying, in the air, presented a shining form like fire; and as beings of the highest order in the celestial hierarchy, are styled "angels of the presence," from Isaiah vi. 2, 6; the prominency which has been given to the serpent in ancient worship and idolatry is doubtless founded on their symbolical character. The brazen serpent raised by Moses in the wilderness, was typical of the expected Messiah, the Saviour of mankind, and so recognized by those of the Israelites whose faith realized the saving remedy for all sin in the redemption of Christ. For proof of which they adduce that passage in John iii. 14: "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up." Some writers having indulged the conceit that the brazen serpent exhibited the shape of the cross, formed by the appearance of its wings, which resembled, however, more those of the web-like texture of the bat, than the feathers of a bird. Some of the Christian fathers and early commentators, suggest the idea, that the success of the arch-fiend over Eve, in the temptation of the garden of Eden, was mainly attributable to his assumption of the similitude of this splendid and illustrious figure, which she had observed always attended the majesty and manifestation of the divine glory or shechinah, mistaking the voice of the serpent which addressed her as one of the Sons of God.

Istum fuisse serpentem cui Eva ut filio dei crediderat.

CHERUBIM, is also another title by which the angels of God are designated; its etymon being derived from the Hebrew, and signifies, fulness of knowledge. According to some expositors the term is taken from a Chaldaic word denoting youth. Others, give it the meaning of swiftness of flight, as angels have usually appeared with the appendage of wings. Others, again, attribute to it the same root as Rabbi, a teacher, implying the extent of knowledge and vast intelligence possessed by angels, represented also by eyes in the mysterious and apocalyptic visions of Ezekiel and St. John. Full of eyes round about, and before, and behind, and within.

The first mention of cherubim recorded in the Scripture, is in 3d chapter of Genesis and 24th verse,* from which we learn they were divinely appointed as sentinels to guard the approach to the garden of Eden immediately upon the disobedience and apostacy of our first parents.

Respecting the history, the character, the nature and the design of the cherubim, much ingenuity has been exercised, learning expended, and an abundance of theological controversy and speculative explanations indulged. Those which Moses, by divine authority, was commanded to prepare and place at each end of the mercy-seat or propitiatory, and which overshadowed the ark, with expanded wings, in the most holy place of the Jewish tabernacle, were very splendid figures, made of pure and solid, beaten and burnished gold.-Exodus xxv. 18, 19. The original import of their name, together with their form or shape, excepting that they were alata animata, winged creatures, is not definitely ascertained. The opinion of Grotius, that they resembled the figure of a calf, or the supposition of Bochart and Spencer, that they partook more of the character of the bull, than anything else, is as groundless as it is infelicitous. Josephus states that they were extraordinary creatures, of a figure unknown to mankind. The opinions of critics founded upon the 10th verse of the 1st chapter of Ezekiel were, that they were figures composed of various creatures, as a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle. But we are not furnished with any decided evidence that the figures placed in the Holy of Holies in the tabernacle were of the same description as those symbolical representations which appeared, in a vision, to the prophet Ezekiel. The contrary rather seems to be indicated, inasmuch as they looked down upon the mercy-seat, which is an attitude not well adapted for a four-faced animal, like the

* The fiery flying serpent, whose body moving in the air resembled the vibration of a sword, like flaming fire, was appointed with the cherubim to guard the entrance of the garden of Eden. Cherubim and seraphim are frequently mentioned in Scripture as attendants upon the Divine Majesty or Shechinah; which appeared here in great glory, at the passage into the garden of Paradise, as well as in aftertimes, at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation of Israel, to their great astonishment.-PATRICK.

* All the multiform animals which appear in connection with Idolatry owe their origin to the cherubim; being misrepresentations of the doctrines or mysteries retained in the legends of these "overshadowers of the mercy-seat." The satyrs, sphinxes, chimera, &c., which have been introduced and interwoven into every system of pagan idolatry, probably originated from the misunderstood remembrance of these Hebraic symbols.

The cherubim mentioned by the sacred historian, were the sum and substance of the second and patriarchal dispensation, as the Jews truly confess the ark with the mercy-seat and cherubim to have been the whole Levitical service. There can be no doubt but these sacred emblems were carefully preserved by Adam and his believing posterity to the times of Noah, and from him to Moses.-PARKHURST, Lexicon.

The cherubim may be traced on the insignia of the armies of the Israelites. The standard of Reuben was the figure of a man; Judah's, that of a lion; Ephraim's, that of an ox; and Dan's, that of an eagle.

emblematical cherubim which Ezekiel beheld.

The cherubim of the sanctuary were two in number, one at each end of the mercy-seat, which, with the ark, was placed exactly in the middle, between the north and south sides of the tabernacle. It was here that atonement was made and God rendered propitious, by the high priest sprinkling the blood upon and before the mercy-seat.-Lev. xvi. 14, 15. Here the glory of God was manifested, and here, he met the high priest, and through him, maintained intercourse with his chosen people.-Exodus xxv. 22; Numb. vii. 89. From hence he gave forth his oracles; whence the whole place was called debir, from the root debar, which signifies to speak, because God who dwelt between the cherubim, declared his mind from hence, when he was consulted, by the high priest, with urim and thummin. These cherubim had feet whereon they stood, and which were joined in one continued beaten work to the ends of the mercy-seat, covering the ark, so that they were entirely over and above it.

Those in the tabernacle were wrought solid gold, but of small dimensions; whilst those in the magnificent temple of Solomon were of great magnitude, fabricated from the wood of the olive tree, or tree of oil, overlaid with gold, and whose expanded wings extending the entire breadth of the oracle or altar piece, being twenty cubits broad.-1 Kings vi. 23-28; 2 Chron. iii. 10-13.

They are also styled cherubim of glory, not from the beauty or excellency of the material of which they are composed, but from constituting a glorious symbol of the Divine Presence or Shechinah which rested between them. As this glory resided in the inner tabernacle, and as the figures of the cherubim represented the angels who surrounded the manifestation of the Divine Presence in the world above, that tabernacle was rendered a suitable emblem or image of the court of heaven, in which light it is alluded to throughout St. Paul's epistle to the Hebrews.*

The disciples of Mr. Hutchinson strenuously contended that the cherubim are emblematical representations of Jehovah himself, or rather of the Trinity of persons in the Godhead, with man received into the divine essence. To which objections have been raised ;-that God being a pure spirit, without parts or passion, perfectly separate and remote from all matter, should require Moses to make material

*The most generally received opinions respecting the cherubim are, either that they were hieroglyphics of the Trinity, as they appear in the works of creation, providence, and redemption; or that they represent the character and office of the ministers of religion; or were descriptive of the general history of the church. The subject is intricate, but one leading idea runs through all the interpretations, namely, that they have evident reference to the plan of redemption, for they are allowed to be descriptive either of its divine authors, its divinely commissioned human instruments, or its general history.-WM. BROWN.

Cherubim were introduced into the tabernacle and the temple, and appear to have been considered as the emblems of the visible church.-TownSEND, Notes Old Test.

The word translated flaming sword, imports a bright flame of waving fire. That this appearance was permanent at the gate of Paradise, and supposed to be the same glory which was manifested to Moses in the Burning Bush. Under the Levitical institution the cherubic symbols and the burning flame were united both in the tabernacle and the temple; the cherubim being constered as emblems of the visible church, and the burning flame symbolical of the Divine Presence. The human form in Ezekiel's vision was a representation of the Angel-Jehovah; the head and protector of the visible church. From this Divine personage, out of the midst of the flame, between the cherubim, the prophet received his commission; and is the same mysterious and sacred Being who had appeared unto Adam, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Moses, Isaiah, Ezekiel, "the school of the seers," under the Judaic, and prophetic economy as well as to the apostles, St. John, in the isle of Patmos, and the primitive saints, under the Christian dispensation, and who will descend to the Judgment, with the glory of heaven, surrounded by the resplendent train of attendant angels.

and visible images of himself is highly improbable, and counter to the repeated interdictions to the Israelites, as well as the more direct prohibition enacted in the second command of the decalogue delivered from the summit of Mount Sinai, amidst thunder and lightnings, blackness, and tempest, and the awful voice of the trumpet waxing louder and louder, "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or the earth beneath, or the waters under the earth."* Add to this, that in all places in Scripture where the cherubim are specified, God is expressly distinguished from them. The Lord placed at each end of the Garden cherubim, and a flaming sword. He rode upon a cherub and did fly. He sitteth between the cherubim. The glory of the God of Israel was gone up from the cherub, whereupon he was to the threshold of the house. Then the glory of the Lord went up from the cherub, and stood over the threshold of the house; and the house was filled with the cloud, and the court was full of the brightness of the Lord's glory. And again, Then the glory of the Lord

* Within the sanctuary of the temple at Jerusalem were the figures of the cherubim. These figures combined, in one body, a man, a bull, a lion, and an eagle, in which the form of the bull predominated. The calves which Jeroboam set up, were intended to represent these cherubim, and were either the entire figure of the cherubim, or in the shape of an ox or a calf, or perhaps, only having the head of a calf, in which case Jeroboam would merely have been guilty of schism and not idolatry. But he had no sooner set up the golden calves than he gave them the names of the Egyptian idols, declaring the cherubim to be the bulls Apis and Mneois, and pronounced them the deliverers of Israel from the thraldom of Egypt, requiring them to be received with similar rites, as those with which Jehovah was worshipped at Jerusalem. In this manner Jeroboam caused Israel to commit the heinous sin of idolatry. Hosea x. 5: Styles the idols of Jeroboam "the calves of Beth-aven." Aven was the same as the Egyptian deity Aun or On. Aven, Aun or On, was the sun, the same as Osiris. The worship of the calves, therefore, must have been, virtually, that of the sun.

In all the foregoing passages the glory of the Lord, that is, the shekinah, the sublime symbol of his presence is carefully distinguished from the cherubim; without the slightest intimation being afforded, that they were images or emblematical representations of the incomprehensible Jehovah. Mr. Parkhurst's elaborate attempt to sustain Mr. Hutchinson's sentiments, involve contradiction, and are much too fanciful for the sobriety of Christian judgment to obtain a ready reception.

In conformity with the opinions of many eminent divines, the cherubim are supposed to represent the angels that surrounded the Divine Presence in heaven; and accordingly their faces were directed towards the mercy-seat where God was declared to dwell; whose glory the angels in the tabernacle of the upper sanctuary always behold, and upon which their eyes are continually fixed, as they are also on Christ, the true propitiatory, which mystery of Redemption, They desire to look into, and evidently signified by the cherubim being turned inward, and their eyes steadfastly fixed, in the attitude of inspection, on the mercy-seat.

In Ezekiel's vision, the cherubic figures are obviously connected with the dispensations of providence, and they have, therefore, appropriate forms emblematical of strength, wisdom, swiftness, and constancy, requisite for holy angels, as ministering spirits to execute the designs of God; but in the sanctuary they are associated with the administration of the purposes of grace, and accordingly appear more properly in the representative character of adoring angels.

Some commentators have agreed that zōa, or the living ones (mistranslated "beasts,") are hieroglyphical representations, not of the characteristics of angels, but those of genuine Christians during the suffering and active periods of the Church of Christ. The first a lion, signifying their undaunted courage in undergoing the torture of martyrdom; the second, a calf, indicative of unwearied patience and constant labor; the third, having the face of a man, expressive of circumspection, prudence, and compassion; the fourth, a flying eagle, to imply activity, penetration, and vigor—representing, likewise, the extensive ministration of angels, in whatever appertains to the providential events and circumstances attending the progress of Christianity.

The wheels which composed a part of the august machinery of Ezekiel's vision, have been regarded as representing the throne of the Deity. The involution of the wheels intimate, their rolling every way, with the perfect freedom of locomotion, showing how well adapted were the forms of the cherubim for the service of conducting the throne-their faces turning every way.

The eyes* in the wheels are significant of the dispensations of Providence controlled by infinite wisdom; and the glittering splendid hues or tints radiated from them, fitly represent the dazzling brightness of those illustrious and attendant spirits that encircle the divine majesty of Jehovah.

A modern divine† considers that "there is no foundation in the Scripture for the opinion that cherubim and seraphim are distinct orders of angels. The two names are merely distinctive of two attributes attaching to the same order of beings their nearness to Jehovah, and the glorious effulgence of their celestial nature."

Dean Woodhouse, in his translation of the Apocalypse, pronounces with much confidence a similar opinion, stating that the description of living creatures in Rev. iv. 6, is improperly rendered, and which he proceeds to prove by a comparison of several particulars; and that the living creatures of Saint John, are the same celestial intelligences with those described by Isaiah and Ezekiel, showing by the resemblance of the description, that the seraphim of Isaiah and the cherubim of Ezekiel are reconciled in the similitude or character of the living creatures of St. John's apocalyptic vision, to wit: 1st. The number of living creatures is the same as described by the prophet; but Ezekiel already intimates the indistinctness of the vision, and the difficulty of expressing by similitudes taken from earthly things; for he says, "As it were the likeness of four living creatures."

2. Here both writers concur in expressing this indistinct-

of these heavenly attendants. Ezekiel says, "In the midst," and at the same time expresses the uncertainty of their position.

The abundance of eyes is the same in both writers, though not described exactly in the same manner. From both, it appears that no part of these heavenly ministers are without eyes. The eyes, that wonderful part of animal creation, the inlets of knowledge and intelligence, are innumerable, and thus express infinite superiority of understanding to anything which is earthly.

In the vision of Ezekiel, the cherubim had each four wings; in that of Isaiah and Saint John, they have six.

With reference to the propriety of the difference, Grotius remarks, that "the seraphim of Isaiah have two more wings than the cherubim of Ezekiel, because they are represented as being more immediately in the presence of God; and therefore each of them is furnished with twain to cover his face before such transcendent brightness." Here, also, what was wanting in Ezekiel's description is supplied by that of Isaiah. The seraphim sung the praises of God without intermission.

After this comparison of concordant passages of Scripture, we shall have little hesitation in determining the nature and species of these living creatures of the Apocalypse. They are the same with those in Isaiah and Ezekiel; and Ezekiel has settled that point, by declaring expressly that they are cherubim, and that he knew them to be cherubim. They are the highest order of angelic beings, attending nearly upon the throne, and speaking thence with the voice of thunder, which is the voice of God. They are so near to the throne, so intermingled with its dazzling splendor, that human faculties must fail in attaining any precise and adequate idea of them.

Notwithstanding the confidence with which the Dean has supported his views regarding the identity of the living creatures seen by Ezekiel and those glorious spirits beheld in the vision of Isaiah, we leave them to the judgment of those who are conversant with the difficulties of reconciling the differences of theological controversy, and submit his diatessaron accordingly.

Withdrawing, from the turbid and agitated waters of polemical theology, how much serener, more delightful, consolitary and animating is the contemplation that these illustrious, resplendent, benevolent and sympathizing spirits are ever active on our behalf, and constantly interpose for our welfare, in every temptation, trial, affliction, seasons of despondency, privation, and sorrow;-softening to our overpowered spiritual apprehension, the insufferable glory and ineffable grandeur of the Divine Majesty,* by whom they are commissioned, with errands of mercy and grace, to carry forward the benignant purpose of almighty goodness, forbearance and loving-kindness, comprehended in the great and wonderful mystery of Godliness-the Redemption.†

Perhaps when the Jewish nation shall be converted, and become believers in Christ, there may be such new effusion of the Spirit on men, or such a happy discovery some way made of the darker parts of the Mosaic economy, and the writings of the prophets, as may show us more of the resemblance, which God designed between the type of the law in the temple and priesthood, and their antitypes in the gospel, than has ever yet appeared;

For the angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him and delivereth them. The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousand of angels.

In connection with the foregoing statement, it will be only quisite that we briefly enumerate the other titles of disction by which the angelic Intelligences of the celestial hosts are designated in the sacred Scriptures.

ARCHANGEL.-The specification of this title is no where. to be found in the Old Testament, and only mentioned twice in the New, being applied only to one personage, under the name of Michael. In St. Jude, where it is mentioned, Michael is represented as contending with the arch-fiend respecting the discovery of the body of Moses.* The other and, among other things, the form of a cherub, as an attendance of angelic beings on the Majesty of God, in the Holy of Holies, may appear more conspicuously in its original truth and glory.-DR. WATTS.

* From an obscure passage in the New Testament, in which Michael the archangel is said to have contended with the devil, about the body of Moses (Jude 7) we may collect, that he was buried by the ministry of angels, near the scene of the idolatry of the Israelites; but the spot was purposely concealed, lest his tomb might also be converted into an object of idolatrous worship among the Israelites, like the brazen serpent. Bethpeor lay in the lot of the Reubenites (Josh. xiii. 20). His death was announced by the Lord himself to Joshua, "Moses my servant is dead," (Josh. i. 2). So that there was no human witness of his decease; the account of which was probably added by Joshua from revelation.-DR. Hales.

The same God, that by the hands of his angels carried up the soul of Moses to his glory, doth also, by the hands of his angels, convey his body down into the valley of Moab, to his sepulture. Those hands which had received the law from him, those eyes that had seen his presence, those lips which had conferred so often with him, that face that did so shine with the beams of his glory, may not be neglected when the soul is gone: He, that took charge of his birth and preservation in the reeds, takes charge of his carriage out of the world; the care of God ceaseth not over his own, either in death, or after it.-BP. HALL.

Michael seems to be invested with a rank and power in the armies of instance in which it occurs is recorded in 1st Thessalonians iv. 16, where the term archangel is used in reference to the second advent of our Saviour at the last day, coming in his glory, and attended by the resplendent retinue of heaver respecting which Theoderet has this striking and soler apothegm. "That if the sound of the trumpet, when t law was given from Mount Sinai, was so dreadful to te Jews, that they said unto Moses, Let not the Lord spek unto us, lest we die; how terrible must be the sound of this trumpet (the archangel's) which will call all men to the final judgment.” Whether in both these instances Jesus Christ may not be intended, is deserving of the consideration, and has attracted the notice of the biblical student. Bishop Horsley, besides other critics, confidently asserts, with much ability and ingenuity, that the reference in the passage in Jude is alone applicable to the Redeemer of mankind; for the word archangel simply indicates a superiority of command over the hierarchy of heaven. Some of the ancient writers, holding the singular conceit, that the rank over which Michael presides, is the eighth of the celestial orders,* affirming that Paul mentioned only a part of the heavenly choir, there being more of which he has not spoken. Others have imagined that the distinction of the title bears some allusion to the customs of oriental order observed in the courts of the Assyrian, Chaldean and Persian kings.

heaven, to which that of Satan seems to correspond amongst the infernal crew of fallen angels.

* The fathers entertained the opinion that the vacancies occasioned in the different orders of angels by the fall of Lucifer, were to be filled up from the human race.

A council of the papacy backs the idea, that it was only the tenth order of the celestial Hierarchy that revolted and apostatized, and that, therefore, the promotions which occasionally take place are intended for the completion of that grade alone.

Michael, the archangel, tells Daniel that he is one of the chief princes in the court of the Almighty.

From the passages in the Bible which contain the name of Michael, he there appears, and is pointed out to our view as an angel of peculiar dignity and transcendent glory in the court of the Most High. Gabriel and Michael are the only proper names of angels recorded in the Holy Scriptures; and it has been argued from this circumstance, that all the multitudes of the angelic hosts have their appropriate distinctive appellations; and though to our finite comprehension such a conjecture presents an extreme difficulty, yet, the God "who telleth the stars and calleth them all by their names, and whose understanding is infinite, may have the name of each particular angel registered in the apocalyptic book of immortality.*

Some commentators suppose that those princes or angels, (Danl. x. 13,) who opposed Michael and Gabriel, were evil spirits, such as are described by St. Paul under the names of the rulers of the darkness of this world, having their residence in the lower regions of the air.-Ephes. ii. 2; vi. 12. These evil spirits are sometimes represented as a part of the heavenly host, both in respect to their original station, and because they are the instruments of Providence, and have a command over the inferior world, as far as God thinks fit to permit it.-(1 Kings xxii. 19; Job i. 6. They are likewise represented as accusers of good men before God, and as aggravating their faults, in order to have them delivered over to them, as the executioners of God's judgments, (Job i. 11; ii. 5; Rev. x. 12). It was the opinion of the Jews, that there are noxious and accusing spirits who fly about the air, and that there is no space between the earth and the firmament that is free from them, but the air is full of demons.

Various opinions have been given as to the dispute respecting the body of Moses in the martial contest between Michael and Satan. Some consider it has been taken from an apocryphal book, or a Jewish legend, and only mentioned as an illustration; but such a quotation hardly would have been made by an inspired penman. Others think that the body of Moses is a figurative expression for the Jewish people or polity, as Christians are called the body of Christ, and has reference to Zech. iii. 2. But it seems most reasonable to conclude that Moses was buried by the ministration of angels, Deut. xxxiv. 6, and the spot concealed, lest his remains should be made the object of idolatrous worship. Lightfoot, however, considers it a mere Jewish tradition, quoted by the apostle to meet the Jews on their own ground.

* After the captivity, the Jews borrowing the invention of the pagan nations, gave names to angels, and were scrupulously careful to retain them. In Tobit iii. 17, we find the name of Raphael; and in 2 Esdras iv. 1; i. 36, Uriel, or Jeremiel, an archangel.

That the body of the Jews and their service, should be called the body of Moses, and that these words are to be referred to Zech. iii. 1, 2, seems not very probable, seeing in that prophet there is no mention of Michael or of the body, or the death of Moses, nor doth Onias speak of the body of Moses, (2 Macc. xv. 12), but of the whole Jewish nation.

Moreover, that Moses was not buried by the Jews, we learn from Scripture, which saith, No man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day, and therefore Philo saith, he was buried not by men, but angels; that there was an altercation betwixt Michael the archangel, and Sammael the prince of Devils, about the body of Moses, we learn from the tradition of the Jews; and it is most probable it was not only that his sepulchre might be unknown, lest the Jews, who were prone to idolatry, should worship him; but about the ascent of it into heaven, he being taken away as Enoch and Elias were, and not dying the common death of men, (which Satan contended he ought to do, for killing the Egyptian), but disappearing only.

Hence the Jews say, "ascendit ad ministrandum Excelso," that he ascended to minister to the Lord. And Philo saith, God brought him near to himself, saying to him, stand with me, and that by the word of God he was translated, whence he was present with Elias at the transfiguration of our Lord.*

"Lawrence has translated from the Ethiopic, the book of Enoch (Jude 14), which was brought from Abyssinia by Bruce, and considers it to have been written by some Jew, a short time before the Christian era. It does not appear to have ever been received into the sacred canon; and the quotation of a single passage from it by St. Jude, as Lawrence observes, will not prove his approbation of the whole book, more than the quotations from uninspired writers by other apostles; but the book itself is interesting, as showing what were the Jewish opinions upon various points, before the birth of Christ. The passage quoted by St. Jude, forms what is called chap. 2 of the Book of Enoch, and is translated by Lawrence as follows: "Behold he comes with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon them, to destroy the wicked, and to reprove all the carnal for everything which the sinful and ungodly have done and committed against him."

invocation of intercessory angels, who made supplication on behalf of the righteous, and obtained the remission of their sins; and which fictions were deposited, as testimony before the angels of the presence of the Most High. In this spurious production Gabriel is represented as praying for those who dwell on earth, and supplicating the Lord of spirits.

ANGEL. This name may be considered as a generical term applied to the various orders of intelligences belonging to the spiritual world, as well as those diversified agencies and ministrations which Jehovah has been pleased to employ as instruments in accomplishing the omnipotent purposes of His will, declared in the operations of nature; the procedures of his Providence, and the economy of Grace, as connected with the redemption of mankind. The term is derived from a Greek word avyεos (angelos), signifying messenger; and in its most comprehensive acceptation is a name of office, not of nature :-nomen non naturæ sed officii. The most august and prominent personage to whom this name has been attached is the Angel-Jehovah, the Messenger of the everlasting Covenant-the Messiah.

In several places of the Old Testament we find mention of this sacred person, under the title of Angel of the Lord, styling himself JEHOVAH and GOD; exercising Divine prerogatives, manifesting Divine perfections, and claiming the homage which is due to Deity alone.

"This person, therefore," remarks Dr. Hunter, in his Sacred Biography, can be none other than the uncreated Angel of the Covenant, who, at sundry times and in diverse manners,' in maturing the work of redemption, assumed a sensible appearance ; and at length, in the fulness of time, united his Divine nature to ours, and dwelt among men, and made them "to behold his glory, as the glory of the only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.'”

To Adam appeared the "Angel Jehovah," in Paradise," both before and after his transgression-although no specific or express mention is given of God being revealed to him in this character or relation before the apostacy; but as the Son of God" created all things visible and invisible," we believe that" the Lord God, who formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul," was the Angel Jehovah.

In the beginning of the third chapter of Exodus, the glorious individual who appeared to Moses, and spoke to him out of the burning bush, was this "Angel of the Covenant."-"Now Moses kept the flock of Jethro, the priest of Midian, and he led the flock to the mountain of God, even to Horeb. And the Angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a flame of fire, out of the midst of a bush. And when the Lord saw that he turned aside to see, God called unto him out of the midst of the bush. Moreover, he said, I am the God of thy Father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. And Moses hid his face, for he was afraid to look upon God. And God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM."

*Three things were necessary to be known by man, even in a state of innocence and purity, and they appear to have been revealed by the voice-the Angel Jehovah, which talked with our first parents, in Eden. These were the right choice of food, the institution of marriage, and the use of language. The Angel Jehovah had been the guide and protector of man before the fall, and He afterwards becomes his Mediator and Judge. The Angel Jehovah commences a new dispensation, which, when it has passed through its three forms of the Patriarchal, Levitical, and Christian, will be terminated by reviving and perfecting the primeval happiness of mankind, in that future Paradise, of which the Garden of Eden was but a type and emblem.

The reply of Hagar, the handmaid of Sarah, contained in the narrative regarding her in the 16th chapter of Genesis, points out the angel which addressed her as the "Angel of the Covenant."-" Thou God seest me."

One of the three heavenly messengers whom Abraham "entertained unawares," was the Angel of the Covenant, is evident from the name Jehovah, which the patriarch rendered, and the supplication made to him to avert the destruction of Sodom; and it was the same Angel of the Lord who called to him out of heaven the second time, upon the obedience of his faith manifested in the sacrificial offering of his only son Isaac, when he received the assurance, "By MYSELF have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing, that in blessing I will bless thee,-because thou hast obeyed my voice."

It was the same glorious personage who appeared to Jacob in the mysterious conflict of Peniel-" For I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved. Likewise unto Joshua, on succeeding Moses, as the leader of Israel, styling himself the "Captain of the host of the Lord;" to Manoah, the father of Sampson. "And Manoah said unto his wife, We shall surely die, because we have seen God. But his wife said unto him, if the Lord were pleased to kill us, he would not have told us such things as these."-Judges, xiii. 16-23.

In various passages of the prophetic book of Zechariah, this Divine Person is described as being intimately acquainted with the counsels of the Most High, as presiding over the affairs of the world, directing the ministrations of superior intelligences; as protecting, vindicating, and interceding for the oppressed Jewish church, as judging and triumphing over their enemies, as sent by the LORD of Hosts, and therefore repeatedly called "JEHOVAH." Passages evidently pointing out the Great "Angel" or "Messenger of Jehovah," respecting whom, Dr. J. Pye Smith, in his Scripture Testimony, observes—" that he claims uncontrolled sovereignty over the affairs of men; He has the attributes of omniscience and omnipresence; He performs works which only omnipotence could accomplish; He uses the awful formula by which the Deity, on various occasions, condescended to confirm the faith of those to whom the primitive revelations were given; He'swears by HIMSELF;' He is the gracious Protector, and Saviour, the Redeemer from all evil, the Intercessor, and the author of the most desirable blessings; His favor is to be sought with the deepest solicitude, as that which is of the highest importance to the interests of men; He is the object of religious invocation; He is, in the most express manner, and repeatedly declared to be JEHOVAH, God, the ineffable I AM THAT I AM; yet this mysterious person is represented as distinct from God, and acting (as the term Angel imports) under a divine mission."

GODS; from the Hebrew, translated elohim, is a word, in several instances, applied to angels in the Scripture. So the inspired Psalmist calls upon and admonishes the mightiest and noblest of created beings to render cheerful and solemn homage to the Messiah, "worship him all ye gods." Bishop Horne remarks, that this clause of the verse establishes "Christ's supremacy over all that are called god in heaven or in earth, and who are hereby enjoined to pay adoration to him instead of claiming it for themselves."

In Hebrews i. 6, St. Paul teaches us that the gods elohim in Psalm xcvii. 7, are angelic spirits. The Hebrew word elohim, is first employed in the Bible in Gen. i. 1, as the sacred name of God the creator, and though plural, it is joined to a singular verb, to inculcate, as many believe, the doctrine of the adorable Trinity.

The application of the term elohim or gods, to angels, commentators consider as denoting their power and authority as the delegated administrators of the divine government, in different parts of the world; as magistrates are appointed under kings to execute justice in assigned districts and provinces of their kingdoms. Judges and magistrates are, therefore, designated by the epithet elohim or gods, "God standeth in the congregation of the mighty, he judgeth amongst the gods."-Psalm lxxxii. 1. Rulers and judges are here intended, as is manifest from the following verses: "How long will ye judge unjustly, and accept the persons of the wicked? I have said ye are gods; and all of you shall die like men."-Verses 2, 6, 7.

SONS OF GOD, is another title applied to the angels who resemble in glory and effulgence the morning star, or as others suppose, on account of the luminous vehicles with which they are clothed. The morning star is distinguished for its peculiar brightness. What a grand appearance does the poetry of Job (xxxviii. 7) present to our view-ten thousand times ten thousand and thousand of thousands of glittering angels attending the birth of time, and hymning hallelujahs to the Almighty Creator.

The appellation also indicates their near relation to the Supreme Being in reference to His paternity, as well as the superlative beauty and splendor of character by which they outshine all other intelligent creatures, and not improbably, an intimation of their office as the harbingers of the Sun of Righteousness. Under this head it may be as well to remark, that the term of Sons of God has been applied to believers under the Old and New Testament dispensations, as in the 6th chapter of Genesis and the 2d verse ;*

ANGELS OF THE CHURCHES* are frequently alluded to by St. John, in the Revelation, as designative of the Pastors of the seven churches of Asia, to whom he wrote epistles of warning, admonition, and condemnation. Prideaux observes, that the minister of the Synagogue, who officiated in offering the public prayers, being the mouth of the congregation, delegated by them as their representative, messenger or angel to address God in prayer for them, was in Hebrew named Sheliack-Zibbor, that is, the angel of the church; and that from hence the chief of the ministers of the seven churches in Asia, in the, apocalypse are, by a

God saw the daughters of men that they were fair; and took them wives of all they chose." Some understood by the sons of God, the great men, nobles, rulers and judges, who being captivated with the "beauty of the daughters of men," that is of the meaner sort, took by force and violence as many as they pleased. (May not the classic fable of the Romans carrying away the Sabine women, have originated from a tradition of this misunderstood text of Holy Writ?) But other ancient interpreters, together with those of modern times, by the "Sons of God," understand the posterity of Seth, who were worshippers of the true God, (chap. iv. 26,) and who now saw and conversed with "the daughters of men," that is, the daughters of the ungodly race of Cain.

* Ephesus was the chief of the Seven Asiatic churches, the metropolis of Proconsular Asia, and principal residence of St. John; for which reason, his first epistle was addressed to this particular church, over which, as well as the others, he appointed bishops, in the ecclesiastical capacity of their metropolitan.

According to Strabo, Ephesus was one of the best and most glorious of cities, and the emporium of this part of Asia. It was called by Pliny, one of the eyes of Asia, Smyrna being the other, but recent travellers who have visited it relate, that it has nothing venerable remaining excepting the ruins of palaces, temples, and amphitheatres. It is spoken of by the Turks, by a name which signifies the temple of the moon, from the magnificent structure anciently dedicated to the goddess Diana. The church of St. Paul is wholly destroyed. The little which remains of the church of St. Mark is a complete ruin. The only church remaining is that dedicated to St. John, which is now converted into a Turkish mosque. The whole town is nothing but a habitation of herdsmen and farmers, living in low and humble mud cottages, sheltered from the inclemency of the weather by mighty masses of ruinous walls. The pride and ostentation of former days, title borrowed from the Synagogue, called the angels of the churches.

WATCHERS, is also a title by which the angels are denominated in the prophecy of Daniel, iv. 13: "and behold a watcher, and an holy one came down from heaven ;" and at verse 17 "The matter is by the decree of the watcher," who, in the divinely admonitory dream of Nebuchadnezzar, forewarned him of his doom. The Hebrew root signifies one that watches, or is waking, or one that wakeneth and stirreth up others. In Malachi ii. 12, it is rendered Master." The Lord shall cut off the man that doeth this; the master and the scholar." It was a proverbial expression descriptive of an instructor, or one that "wakeneth the ear" of his disciple. The Septuagint or Greek version, use the ward Eto, from which, as some think, the Greeks derive their Iris, or messenger of their Gods. They are called watchers or wakers, either in respect of their spiritual and incorporeal nature not needing sleep, or in respect of their watchful office, being always ready to do the will of God; and from their constant care and vigilant guard of God's people, are emphatically called Watchers. Bishop Horsley contends that angels are not intended by the "watchers." He says,

66 amongst those who understand the titles of "Watchers' and 'Holy Ones' of angelic beings, it is not quite agreed whether they are angels of the cabinet or the provincial governors-the tutelar angels to whom these appellations belong. The majority, I think, are for the former. But it is agreed by all, that they must be principal angels -angels of the highest order. Of how high an order, indeed, must these Watchers' and 'Holy Ones' have been on whose decrees the judgments of God himself are founded, and by whom the warrant for the execution is finally issued! It is surprising that such men as Calvin among the Protestants of the Continent, such as Wells and the elder Lowth in our own church,—and such as Calmet in the Church of Rome, should not have their eyes open to the error and impiety, indeed, of such an exposition as this, which makes them angels. The plain truth is, that some learned men, though but few, have seen it, that these appellations, Watchers' and 'Holy Ones,' denote the Persons in the Godhead; the first, describing them by the vigilance of their universal providence, the second, by the transcendant sanctity of their nature."

In this view of the subject, few expositors coincide with the Bishop, whilst the title appropriately portrays the attributes and characteristics of angels; for their sleepless diligence in executing the appointed services of their Almighty Sovereign, and their watchful attendance, protection and assistance to the faithful people of God during all the toils, and trials and temptations of their earthly pilgrimage; and well, therefore, might the inspired psalmist invoke them: "Bless the LORD, ye his angels that excel in strength, that do his commandments, hearkening unto the voice of his word." -Psalm ciii. 20.

THRONES (povo), DOMINIONS (KUPLOTηTES), PRINCIPALITIES, (aoxai), POWERS (εžovolas), are titles given to the angels by St. Paul, in his epistle to the Colossians i. 16, and denote metonymically that they "sit on thrones, exercise dominion, hold authority, preside in governments, and are invested with the powers necessary for these great purposes."*

"They are also styled Chief Princes, to intimate that they are the first order of rulers in the universe, under Him who has prepared his throne in the heavens, and whose kingdom ruleth over all. They are called the Sons of God, to teach us that they are beings related to God in character, favor, place, and authority. They are called Morning Stars, implying the splendor and glory by which they surpass all other intellectual beings. They are called Cherubim and Seraphim, to inform us that they are beings furnished with superior knowledge to discern, and with superior holiness to pursue whatever is good and right, honorable to the Creator, and useful to his creatures.

From the preceding scriptural nomenclature, descriptive of the qualifications and attributes of Holy Angels, we are confirmed in the belief of the transcendent nature which they possess, the supereminent station which they sustain amongst created intelligences, and the permanent dignity by which they are adorned and distinguished, as the royal attendants around the throne of the Most High; nor can we worthily honor the "living oracles" of God as regards the information which they supply respecting them, justify our profession of faith, based on the testimony of Inspiration, neither realize the full extent of that consolation, support and felicity which the biblical doctrine of their real existence and varied ministrations is intended to impart, unless we sincerely apply our understandings and hearts to a sober and serious investigation of a subject so sublime and glorious, delightful and edifying; whilst for the constant, though invisible protection, assistance, and guidance of these benevolent, illustrious, and immortal spirits, it behooves us to render the acknowledgments of grateful praise to the Maker of heaven and of earth-the Lord of angels, who sends them forth with embassies of favor and grace, to minister especially for them who shall be the heirs of salvation."

TRADITIONARY AND SPECULATIVE.

JEWISH traditions, with their characteristic extravagance and variety, abound with allusions to the celestial hierarchy, which they have described as containing four orders or companies, each presided over by its particular archangel; the first order is under the gubernatorial superintendence of Michael; the second, under the government of Gabriel; the third, under the dominion of Uriel; and the fourth, belongs to the jurisdiction of Raphael. Others multiply the number to ten orders, and others again, greatly increase their ranks, having numerous associations of bright spirits under their immediate direction and control, within the circuit of the seven celestial regions; whilst the various speculations of the Christian fathers, and ecclesiastical writers, in general, include nine orders, comprehending three hierarchies, founded on that passage in Colossians i. 16: For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him and for him.

The Jews supposed the angelical world to be organized under ten denominations, to which they have gigthen the following names: Chaioth-Hakkodesh, Ophanim, Erellim, Chasmalim, Seraphim, Melachim, Elohim, Ben-Elohim, Cherubim, islim.

In the hierarchy of the heavenly host, the Rabbins single out as the most illustrious, Metraton, respecting whom the following particulars are related in the collection of cabalistical doctrines, called the book of Zohar, or The Book of Light. This mysterious person the Zohar styles the angel of the Lord, which denotes the Shechinah referred to in Exodus iii. 2, "It is he who liveth forever and ever, who is arrayed with the name (Metraton) Mediator." The Mediator is the servant of the Lord, the Elder of his house, who is head of the creation of the Lord, exercising dominion over all things that are his; for the Holy and Blessed God hath given him dominion over all.

Buxtorf and Witsius have also collected some singular traditions concerning Metraton, an appellative probably derived from the latin Metator, and subsequently employed in the sense of Mediator. "The Targum of Jonathan gave the same appellation to Enoch after his translation. In subsequent times, it was differently understood; and the doctrine arose of an inferior Metraton, Enoch, and a superior, who is called Zohar. The very Shechinah himself,-the Crown of the ten Perfections,-the Pillar of the Metraton,-in whom the Holy and the Blessed God appears in his Shechinah.”*

Dr. Owen, in alluding to this angel, whom the Talmudists call Metraton, speaks of the title as a tradition of the glorious name of Messiah; of which even since their utter rejection, the Jews retain some obscure remembrance, and by which they obviously intend any uncreated angel; and the Cabalists say, Metraton was the master or teacher of Moses himself; the Talmudist adding, that he hath power to blot out the sins of Israel; whence they call him the Chancellor of Heaven; but Bechai, a famous master amongst them, affirms, that his name signifies both a Lord, a Messenger, and Keeper. A Lord, because he ruleth all; a Messenger, because he standeth always before God to do his will; and a Keeper, because he keepeth Israel.*

From amongst the puerilities and degrading superstitions which becloud the understanding of the Messiah-rejecting Israel, the following traditions appear. The angel Metraton is the king of angels. Metraton distributes among all princes or angels of the nations their necessaries. He gathers all songs that are made in the universe, weaving the prayers and songs of the Israelites into garlands, because he is set over the songs of sinners to bring them into the innermost. He ascends up to the throne of glory above nine hundred firmaments, to carry up the prayers of the Israelites. Metraton, by some of the Rabbins, is considered as the great personage mentioned in the Old Testament, under the term of "The angel of the Lord," or "The Angel-Jehovah." "The Messenger of the Covenant," specified in Malachi, chap. iii. 1. Another Rabbi declares, "There is a man that is an angel, and this is Metraton. And there is a man in the image of God, who is an emanation from him, and this is Jehovah; of whom can be affirmed neither creation, nor formation, nor fabrication, but only emanation." One authority insists, "Behold, out of the bodies of Enoch and Elijah, are made angelical forms; for out of Enoch is made Metraton, but out of the body of Elijah, Sandalphon." The following is a specimen of absurd extravagance: "While Enoch, alias Metraton, was in the course of his ascension to the celestial regions, the various orders of angels smelled the scent of him five thousand three hundred and eighty miles off, and were somewhat displeased at the introduction of a being of the human race into their superior world, till God pacified them by explaining the cause of his translation." To complete the ludicrous contrast of meanness with magnificence, it is fur-his kingdom be blessed forever."*

Some of the Jewish writers have endeavored to prove, that all the angels have their proper names; and the Cabalists contend that the names of all the angels are contained in the Scriptures mysteriously.

The Mussulmen say of Gabriel, that he descended, in one hour, from heaven, overturning a mountain with a single feather of his wing.

Dionysius enumerates nine orders of angels, corresponding to the number specified in the Scriptures, and describes their several distinctions in the following manner:-The first three orders are for immediate attendance upon the Almighty; the next three, for the general government of his creatures; the last three, for the particular good of God's elect: that the archangels surpass the beauty of angels, ten times; principalities exceed the archangels, twenty times; powers excel the principalities, forty times, &c. The learned Mede, in his diatribe on the angels, speaks of seven principal angels which stand before the throne of God, and also represents them as the seven eyes of Jehovah, which run to and fro through the whole earth, being the seven spirits mentioned by St. John. The erudite prelate further remarks-that these titles which they attach to the respective class of angels are characteristic either of the qualities in which they excel, or of the offices assigned to them by God. Thus they choose to call those Cherubim which excel in the splendor of knowledge; Seraphim, those which are most ardent in divine love; Thrones, those which contemplate the glory and equity of the Divine judgments. The Cherubim, they say, enlighten others with wisdom; the Seraphim inspire them with love; the Thrones teach to rule with judgment. Those of the first class they suppose never to be sent forth to discharge any office, but wait upon God continually. In the middle class they place the Dominions, as they suppose, to regulate the duties of the Angels; the Principalities preside over the people and the provinces; the Powers are a check upon evil spirits. In the last class, they put the virtues, as having the power of working miracles assigned to them; the Archangels are sent as messengers on matters of importance; Angels, on those of less consequence. St. Augustine intimates his belief in these distinctions, but confesses his inability to define them with precision, and challenges any one else who can.

"It is the opinion of that great doctor and prince of divines, St. Thomas Aquinas, that the angels are so different in nature and perfection, that there is not two of one sort and kind (as there are of men and other creatures), but that every one is distinguished in nature and office from every one, even from the highest to the lowest. Which his opinion is generally received of all Thomists, who for their numbers and learning bear no little sway in the schools, and are no little esteemed in the church of God. The same doctor is also of opinion that the angels are far more in number than are all the species or kinds of all corporeal creatures in the world, that is, more than the celestial bodies, than the simple bodies which we call the four elements, yea, than all the mixed bodies composing them, be they animate or inanimate, living or not living, as beasts, plants, herbs, metals, and the like, which is the opinion of all his followers, do embrace as constantly as they do the former."

-MATHEW KELLISON, from Southey's Common Place Book.

Plato's Theology classified his gods, demons or spirits into three kinds,--superior, inferior, and intermediate. The superior reside in the heavens, and by the excellency of their nature, are so far above mortals, that except by the intervention of the intermediate gods, who inhabit the air, mankind can hold no intercourse with them, and whom they commission as ministers to the human race, carrying the behests of the Supreme to men, and returning with the offerings and vows of mortals to the gods, according to the appointment of each, in his respective department of the government of the world, and who preside over oracles, and divinations, in all their variety; are the authors of all miracles which are performed, and those prodigies which happen. The third class he places over rivers, and also assigns them the influence of instilling dreams as well as the performance of wonders, similar to the power of the intermediate, who, fill all parts of the universe, appearing to, and vanishing from mortal vision constantly. It is most probable that the sentiments of Plato originated from the sylphs, salamanders, the elves and gnomes of the Cabbala.

Plato also inculcated the opinion, that the demon or angel which attends us at our birth, conducts the soul after death, to the place of judgment. Those who are considered to have led neither an entirely criminal, nor yet an absolutely innocent life, are transported by Acheron's boat to the Acherusian lake, where they dwell and suffer punishment proportionate to their vices, and remain, till after having undergone a sort of purgatorial abstersion from their sins, they are set at liberty and obtain the recompense of their good actions. Those whose wickedness is deemed incorrigible, who have been guilty of sacrilege and murder, or other offences of equal depravity, are by a just and fatal destiny thrown into Tartarus, where they are incarcerated forever. But those under the imputation of curable delinquencies, though considerable ones, such as homicide, are conveyed into the waters of Cocylus; parricides being cast into Phlegeton, which ultimately draws them into the Acherusian lake.

The following arrangement of angels, according to the signs of the Zodiac, will explain the pictorial representation of the Frontispiece. The ancients divided the Zodiac into twelve signs, or compartments, or houses. The first house, is the house of life; the second, of riches; the third, of brothers; the fourth, of parents; the fifth, of children; the sixth, of wealth; the seventh, of marriage; the eighth, of death: the ninth, of religion; the tenth, of dignities; the eleventh, of friends; the twelfth, of enemies. Each house had one of the heavenly bodies as its peculiar and presiding lord.

The Angels who control the elements:—

Which from th' Evangelist have doctors ground,
Because it is in the Apocaylps thus found;
On the four angles of the Earth I saw,
Standing four angels, those that kept in awe,
The four great winds restraining them from blowing
On earth, on sea, or on any tree growing.
Four angels, as four viceroys, are exprest,
To sway the four winds placed above the rest;
All princes, and with mighty power endued,
Remarkable for their celsitude.
The East, whence Eurus blows, sways Michael,
The West, whence Zephyr breathes, guide Raphael,
The North, whence Boreas blusters, Gabriel;
The South, whence Auster comes, rules Uriel.
Others there be that doth not doubt to say,
That the four elements are forc'd t' obey
Four several angels; Seraph reigns o'er fire,
Cherub, the air; and Thursus doth aspire
Over the water, and the earth's great lord,

We add the following eccentric poetical description of Satan's ubiquitous influence, knowledge, and attributes (using modern orthography).

In all materials he acquainted is,
From the earth's superficies, to the abyss ;
He knows such virtues, as in stones abide,
Gems, minerals, creeping worms, and beasts (for hide
From him you nothing can) for he doth vaunt
Still in the marble, porphyry, adamant,
The coral, pumice, and the chrysolite,
The smaragd, topaz, and the margarite.
The onyx, carbuncle, gold, silver, lead,
Brass, iron, and sulphurs; He is likewise read
In the properties of creeping things,
Ants, toads, snails, serpents (all that the earth brings).
Of all the several fishes he hath notion,
Bred in fresh waters, or the briny ocean;
Of Beasts the sundry qualities he finds,
Sows, bears, tigers, camels, horses, hinds,
The elephant, the fox, ape, ass, mule, cat,
Sheep, wolf, hare, hedge-hog, with each other that
The earth produceth; So in herbs, and trees,
Plants, leaves, fruits, roots, seeds, juices, liquors, these
The artist hath like skill in. He can tell
The sev'ral qualities of fowls, and well
Distinguish them; as such and such belong
To the earth, air, or water.
He is strong
In further knowledge of the elements,
As in their power, their nature, and extents.

He is further represented as the sovereign lord of every species of magicians, incantation, &c.

For most of this prognosticating tribe,
Metals unto each planet can ascribe;
Silver, unto the Moon, to the Sun was
Gold sacred, unto Jove copper and brass,
To Venus white lead, unto Saturn black,
Iron and steel to Mars; nor doth there lack Amber to Mercury. To each of them
They likewise consecrate several gem,

Unto the sun, the carbuncle is due,
And hyacinth of color green and blue;
Th' adamant and crystal to the queen of night,

To Saturn the onyx, and the chrysolite,
The sapphire with the diamond to Jove,
The jasper and the magnet Mars doth love,
Smaragd and Sardis Venus doth not hate,
Nor Mercury topaz and agate.

ATTRIBUTES AND CHARACTERISTICS.

In the present section of our inviting subject, the requisition devolves upon us, to examine a little more fully those wonderful attributes which have been manifested by angelic power and ministration, as well as portray those attractive lineaments which distinguish and adorn the disposition and character of the illustrious inhabitants of the celestial world -those constant, and innumerable, and fascinating courtiers which surround the resplendent Majesty of heaven, as confirmed and illustrated by a variety of declarative facts and striking circumstances recorded in the scriptures of the Old and New Testament.

Under this head it may not be inexpedient to premise and interpose the expostulation,-that the visions, which to the experience of the patriarchs, the prophets, the apostles, the evangelists, and the primitive disciples of Christianity which have preceded or attended the instrumentality of angelic operations, must be received by the mind, unencumbered by sinister reservations or suppositions, referring them to fictious representations, as opposed to positive and veritable realities; for many unestablished, in the biblical reception of divine and revealed truth, by reason of the superficiality of their faith, are apt to consider that those marvellous exhibitions of omnipotent purpose, and prophecies of gracious promise performed by angelic agency, of which they read in the Bible, are to be regarded as the mere imagery, the gorgeous drapery of a dream, the shadowy apparitions of optical illusion, because, forsooth, of the difficulty with which they realise to themselves the actual existence of incorporeal or spiritual beings; usually applying the term vision, in a sense and manner contrary to its scriptural and intended import-virtually interpreting the epithet as something intangible or not seen-a mental phantasmagoria, unreal, and easily produced by a disordered state of the bodily functions, affecting with a sympathetic morbidity, the workings of a distempered brain. Such an anti-christian conclusion no sincere believer in the declarations of an unimpeachable Inspiration can, for an instant, admit or venture upon; though many are inclined to suppose that what the inspired writers have described of what they have beheld and witnessed of angelic beings and their miraculous interpositions, must be understood as a sort of allegorical representation—a vehicle for conveying to the mental perceptions of mortals, the designs and purposes of the Divine will. With these phantomising interpretations we entertain no sympathy, and therefore believe on the sacred authority of immutable and eternal truth, that Daniel really saw with his bodily eyes the angels of God, as also the stationed keepers at our Lord's sepulchre, and the inquiring disciples after the resurrection of Christ from the entombment of the grave, as in like manner we shall all behold them when they attend the Redeemer's second advent to earth, as He comes in "the glory of his Father," surrounded by the splendid retinue of "holy angels," amidst the inconceivable agitations and awful solemnities of the judgment-day, at the assize of an assembled universe!

That God, if he please, can hold intercourse with his chosen servants without the intermediate agency of angelic interference, is proved by several instances interspersed throughout the Scriptures, but in some cases it has been His pleasure to employ one or more of the heavenly hosts in his communications with sinful humanity, and who has also commanded his witnesses to record such supernatural and superhuman interpositions for man's instruction and hope, encouragement and comfort. And assuredly we owe it to our Divine Teacher, to receive with the gratitude of reverential humility and undoubting credence, what Deity has vouchsafed to reveal to us of the disinterested cheerfulness with which benevolent angels are always ready to promote the spiritual welfare and temporal interests of those who put their trust in Jehovah, and repose implicit confidence in the assurances of divine promises; persuaded that not one thing contained in Holy Writ, dare we with impunity, presumptuously attempt to alter or impugn, which has been given by the Inspiration of God, and most profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, and that to receive such a book of divine origin, as a volume of riddles, enigmas or allegories, and not as a clear and comprehensive declaration of what we are to believe, as well as what we are to do, would be a palpable violation of the dictates of sober reason, as well as an egregious infringement of the precepts of an acquiescent faith.

Consistently with our previous intimation, our intention is, to adhere closely to the evidence presented to, and enforced upon, our consideration, by the several descriptive statements furnished in the Bible, respecting the astonishing and surpassing qualifications, and those noble and intellectual faculties with which the holy angels are endowed, and by which they are empowered to accomplish the behests of Jehovah, according to those special purposes of providence and grace, for the execution of which they have been delegated. In Genesis iii. 24, where angels are first mentioned under the title of cherubim, we learn they were dispatched, and divinely appointed to keep watch and guard at the passage of the garden of Eden, to prevent any endeavor, by the disobedient and fallen parents of mankind, of making the attempt for a re-entrance, being armed with the majesty of a most terrific splendor, and the dreadful appearance of the glittering brandishings of a sword of flaming fire; reflecting a glory, which, according to ancient Jewish interpretation, probably furnished the archetype of the Shechinah, first, in the tabernacle in the wilderness, and afterwards in Solomon's magnificent temple. With this characteristic grandeur and awfulness, have angels frequently appeared to, and disappeared from, mortal vision. The angel that descended to roll away the stone (a large fragment of rock), placed at the entrance of our Saviour's supulchre, presented the personal spectacle of such a superhuman and ethereal appearance, as to overpower with affrighted terror, the Roman guard, who trembled and became as dead men :- "for his countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow; and for fear of him the keepers became as dead men." "And I saw," declares St. John, "another mighty angel come down from heaven, clothed with a cloud, and a rainbow was upon his head, and his face was as it were the sun, and his feet as pillars of fire." nicates himself to them, we should have more worthy and awful thoughts of God, the Maker and Lord of them,-we should have more worthy thoughts of His power, wisdom, and greatness. Nor should we so easily question his goodness, as now we do. When we hear of God's severity declared against ungodly ones, we are ready to say, Where is the goodness of God if he will send the greatest part of men to hell, to be eternally tormented? Alas! God has myriads of creatures to glorify his goodness on, beside those few mortals whose dwelling is on earth. There is a world of angels as well as of men. Oh! glorify the God of angels, magnify Him. Pneumatologia, 1701.

gels, beside the splendor of their appearance, are also endowed with amazing power, forcibly indicated by the names of might and power, which, in several places of the Scriptures, are ascribed to them, and further established by the corroborative testimony of the Psalmist, where King David, inviting the choral celebration of heaven and earth, bursts forth into the jubilant exclamation: Bless the Lord ye his angels that excel in strength! A strong angel, and a mighty angel, in the Apocalypse, are expressive and evidential of the same truth. Their great power is still further manifested by reference to those extraordinary achievements which they have performed in the execution of the Divine commission. The destruction of the first-born of Egypt was the work of an angel. Two angels overthrew the abandoned cities of the plain-Sodom and Gomorrah, smiting its guilty and profligate inhabitants with instantaneous blindness. An angel destroyed, in three days, three score and ten thousand persons out of Judah and Israel, in consequence of the sin of David in numbering the people. An angel slew, in a single night, of the army of Sennacherib, an hundred four score and five thousand men. In the Revelation of St. John, the irresistible potency of angels is represented by their holding and restraining the four winds of heaven; and as executing, in a long series, the successive judgments of God upon this evil world. In the twentieth chapter of the Apocalypse, a single angel is represented as binding that fierce, strong, and malignant spirit the dragon, that old serpent, the Devil, the prince of the power of the air, who has so extensively and dreadfully distressed this sinful and unhappy world, as casting him into the bottomless pit, and setting a seal upon him, binding him with a chain, that he should deceive the nations no more, until the thousand years should be fulfilled. Instances and exemplifications these, of the strength and might belonging to no other intelligent creatures, and of which humanity can only form very inadequate conceptions. In 1 Chronicles xxi., what a splendid vision is there presented to us.-A spiritual warrior with a drawn sword and outstretched arm, of surpassing strength, glorious brightness, and probably of prodigious magnitude, standing in mid-air, extended over the holy city of Jerusalem, which lay in beauty and repose beneath an evening sky. This is one of the glimpses afforded us of what is perpetually passing around us, but which our eyes are holden from seeing. We speak of casualties, of epidemics, of contagious disorders, but we regard not the hand that with unerring fidelity deals forth each mysterious dispensation, directed by the appointment of the Almighty Lord and Maker of heaven and earth. The same absurd and presumptuous disregard to the delineations of the Bible has clothed evil spirits with fantastically frightful grimaces and grotesque figures, and also invested the holy angels with a puerile childishness of appearance, wholly at variance with every scriptural representation. Baby faces between a pair of bird's wings, destitute of bodies; slender girls with long and flowing ringlets, and the appendage of pinions well feathered with silvery plumes,—these are the imaginary and inconsistent similitudes of things in heaven, which we are interdicted and warned from representing in such material shapes and fanciful apparitions to our minds, so palpably destitute of that terrible grandeur and ethereal glory with which God has invested those illustrious and beautiful ambassadors of his rainbow throne and imperial sovereignty.

Our conceptions respecting the potential attributes of angelic beings may be yet further greatly assisted by a reference to those illustrative and surprising objects, selected from the natural history of the Scriptures, as described with such superlative sublimity in the Book of Job, where God, when answering the humbled patriarch out of the whirlwind, sets before him a few of the representatives of his Omnipotence, illustrated in the creatures of his workmanship. The ocean, with its proud waves, and secret springs, its garment of clouds and swaddling band of thick darkness; the war-horse, with his neck clothed in thunder, pawing in the valley and rejoicing in his strength, mocking at fear, and swallowing the ground with fierceness and rage; Behemoth, drinking up a river, and trusting that he can draw up Jordan into his mouth, whose bones are like brass and iron; Leviathan, making the deep to boil like a pot ;" -these are the handiworks of the Almighty, on which He bids the patriarch to meditate, as exhibitions of His majesty and glory; nor can it admit of a sober doubt that Jehovah invests his celestial hosts with still more stupendous powers, whilst waging constant battle with the myriads of apostate spirits which environ and besiege the redeemed children of faith and obedience—the heirs of salvation.

Another distinguishing attribute of the angelic nature is their astonishing activity, referred to by the Psalmist, civ. 4, and cited by the apostle in Hebrews i. 7: Who maketh his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire. The word in this passage rendered spirits, usually signifies winds. In either sense the phraseology forcibly implies the remarkable velocity of the beings described by it, who are represented as moving with the swiftness of the winds, and operating with the irresistible energy of fire. The same doctrine is emphatically inculcated in the frequent attribution of many wings to the cherubim and seraphim, and other orders of angels; and although the language is symbolical, yet its intention is very apparent, as significant of the celerity, and the alacrity with which they fulfil the missions of divine command. The following narrative in the prophet Daniel, exhibits this position with peculiar and unrivalled force. Chapter ix. verse 3 and 20-23-And I set my face unto the Lord God, to seek by prayer and supplication, with fasting, and sackcloth and ashes. And while I was speaking, and praying, and confessing my sin, and the sins of my people Israel, and presenting my supplication before the Lord my God, for the holy mountain of my God; Yea while I was yet speaking in prayer, even the man Gabriel, whom I had seen in the vision at the beginning, being caused to fly swiftly, touched me about the time of the evening oblation. And he informed me, and talked with me, and said, O Daniel, I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding. At the beginning of thy supplication, the commandment came forth; and I am come to show thee; for thou art greatly beloved; therefore understand the matter and consider the vision. From this remarkable story, we learn that some time in the day, Daniel set himself to seek the Lord in fasting and prayer; that after his prayer was begun, the commandment was given to Gabriel, to explain to him the vision and the prophecy. In verses 20 and 21, we are told, that Gabriel came to him, while he was speaking ; that this was his evening prayer; and that during the time, in which he was employed in uttering his prayer, Gabriel came from the supreme heaven to this world. This is a rapidity exceeding all the comprehension of the most active imagination, surpassing beyond comparison, the amazing swiftness of light. Light, we know, is several years in coming from such fixed stars, as are visible to the eye of mortals. But there is reason to believe, that the Heaven of Heavens is at a much greater distance than those stars; so as, not improbably, to be a Heaven to them, as the starry firmament is to us.

The poet, therefore, is justified by this wonderful fact in that cogent expression :-

"The speed of Gods (angels) time counts not."

No stronger exhibition can be required or presented, of the rapidity of these celestial beings.*

Another peculiar and distinguishing attribute with which angels are endued, is their unfading and immortal youth. This peculiarity is beautifully pointed out by the name ¿wa, living ones, applied to them by St. John, in the Apocalypse, and by Ezekiel in his first chapter, as well as in several parts of his prophecy. By this appellation we are instructed, that life is a pre-eminent and glorious constituent of their nature-life as a peculiar property, and in a most distinguishing degree; the most perfect manifestation of that quickening energy which Christ ascribes to the Father, and challenges to himself, as an exclusive, appropriate, and wonderful attribute of the Godhead.

The truth of the immortality of the angels is also beautifully exemplified and confirmed by the adolescent appearance

* Yet, notwithstanding the incogitable force and dexterity of spirits, the theologists are of opinion that they are not of power to destroy any one element, or to pervert that constant order by which the fabric of the world is guided and governed. Yet of their incredible celerity and strength, histories are very frequent, both in the sacred Scriptures and elsewhere. We read that the angel of the Lord took the prophet Habakkuk (as he was carrying meat unto the reapers) by the hair of his head, and in the strength of the spirit, in an instant, transported him from India to Babylon.-HEYWOOD'S Hierarchie.

of those which were seen by Mary, in the tomb of Christ. These illustrious individuals were then, at least, four thousand years old; still they had the appearance of young men ; and in all that long succession of ages, had not undergone the slightest indications of decay. Their youth, a bright and beautiful blossom, still shone with all its lustre and fragrance; and directly indicated that it was superior both to accident and time; and would, after many such flights of years, survive in all its undiminished vigor. Even this representation may probably, after all, be only an imperfect adumbration. The youth of angels, like their other attributes, is destined to refine, improve, and brighten forever.

This distinguishing and exalting feature of the angelical nature-their immortality,—was strikingly pointed out, by the Great Teacher, during his sojourn upon the earth, whilst he "tabernacled in the flesh;" when He disconcerted, by the divinity of his answer,—as the Creator and Lord of angels, -the captious inquiry and curious question propounded by the infidel Sadducees, respecting the hypothetical marriage of a woman with seven husbands,-" whose wife she should be in the resurrection ?" to which our Savior replied, that those who should be counted worthy to obtain admission into heaven, would neither marry nor be given in marriage; neither can they die any more; for they would be equal to the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection, subject to none of the changes, and decays, and vicissitudes incidental to this mortal state, where death reigns, and marriages are requisite to supply the vacancies arising from the ravages of mortality- and therefore necessary to prevent the entire extinction and extirpation of the human family; but in the celestial kingdom, the redeemed of mankind will resemble the angels of God, glorious, unchangeable, and immortal,-resplendent in the presence of Jehovah, and beatified in the eternal enjoyment of an unalterable felicity and unfading glory.

Another prominent, most distinguishing and superlatively attractive attribute of the angelical constitution is the surprising and inconceivable extent of their knowledge and intelligence, arising from their proximity to the overflowing and inexhaustible fountain of Divine wisdom and benevolence, their closer and concomitant insight into the plans and purposes of Jehovah, as connected with the sovereign dispensations of his providence and the mysterious economy of redeeming grace.

Doubtless, too, they have a great familiarity with our thoughts and desires, circumstances and moral necessities, and are delegated from the up-lifted throne of the Most High, to render us important and needful aid in the services and excursions of our faith, the prayers and aspirations of penitential supplication, and the retired meditations of a contemplative devotion,* being also well acquainted with the favorites of heaven, as evidenced in the prophet Daniel, the greatly beloved, on whose behalf they restrained the ferocity of the ravenous lions into whose den the prophet had been cast, by the impious and irrevocable decree of King Darius.†

and ministry of angels, the high estimation with which they regarded the exalted and intellectual prerogatives of these magisterial and celestial beings, is clearly indicated by the proverbial expressions and sayings which were in general use amongst them; illustrated in the stratagem and flattery of the wise women of Tekoah to King David. For as an angel of God, so is my lord the king, to discover good and bad; and my lord is wise, according to the wisdom of an angel of God, to know all things that are upon the earth.-2 Sam. xix. 17-20. Nevertheless, our knowledge, even with the aid afforded us, by the partial disclosures of Revelation, are very limited respecting the vast knowledge, sinless purity, and expansive benevolence, of these affable and amiable Immortals, either in relation to each other, or to beings in the far off regions, and distant empires of the universe. The ennobling superiority of sagacity and wisdom possessed by angels has been duly noticed and largely expatiated upon in the exegesis of theologians, the disquisitions of the philosopher, the breathing thoughts and burning words of profane and sacred Poesy. The learned and eminent expositor, Greenhill, in his Commentary on Ezekiel, observes, "That the prophet was guided by the spirit, and his cherubim hold forth the same parties to us, that Isaiah's seraphim did to him. They had the likeness of a man, verse 5. By their likeness to a man, is laid before us, the rationality, knowledge, and understanding of angels. They are the most understanding creatures in heaven and earth. They have prophetical knowledge in them, and a treasury of things that are past and done long since. There is mention, Rev. iv. 6, 8, of four living creatures, the same with those of Ezekiel, full of eyes before and behind, because they see and know what is past, and what is before them; their natural knowledge is great, being such excellent spirits. But besides that, they have much revealed to them concerning God, Christ, the church, and things contingent. Hence it is said, 1 Peter i. 2, which things the angels desire to look into. They understand partly by their essence, and partly by special communications to their understanding, as to ours. Angels are good philosophers; they know the principles, causes, effects, life, motion, death of natural things.-Rev. vii. 1, 2. They are great statists, and know the affairs of kingdoms.-Dan. x. 13. Gabriel saith: I remained with the kings of Persia ; he became a courtier, and acquainted himself with the affairs of Persia.

In his truly eloquent and thrilling discourses on this interesting and engaging subject, Dr. Dwight admirably represents the high intelligence of angels as one of the most distinguishing features which adorn the character of these bright, and noble, and heavenly beings, observing that 66 Angels are endowed with the greatest intellectual faculties, and of course are possessed of knowledge superior to that of any other created beings. This character is represented to us in the Scriptures in many forms. The Living ones mentioned by the apostle John, in the Book of Revelations, are declared to have been full of eyes within; that is, to have been all sense, all intellect, all consciousness, turning their attention every way, beholding all at once all things within the reach of their understandings, and discerning them with a clearness of perception which is the most perfect created semblance of the intuitive and boundless views of the Omniscient Mind.

"The face also of a man, attributed to one of these illustrious beings by St. John, and to all those which appeared to Ezekiel by that prophet, is another ascription of this character to angels. The face of a man was amongst the Jews and other eastern nations, the standing symbol of Intelligence, and denotes here the superior possession of this attribute by those to whom it is ascribed.

66 Angels were originally formed with an entire freedom from sin, the only source of prejudice, and the chief source of errors.

Their faculties were at first such as became the morning stars of the highest heavens,-the sons of God intended to surround the throne of JEHOVAH, and to hold the chief places of power, distinction, and glory, in his eternal kingdom. They were such as to become those to whom, in the beginning, was given by God himself, the name of Cherub, or fulness of knowledge.

"They were such, in a word, as to become their other transcendent attributes of power, youth, activity, and the exalted station which they were destined to fill forever.

With the nature and extent of their faculties, has the place of their residence exactly accorded. They have ever dwelt in the world where truth reigns without opposition-where knowledge is the universal state and character-where all mysteries are continually disclosed-and where the nature and propriety of both the means and the ends of Providence are, more than in any other part of the universe, unfolded. There, day and night, for six thousand years, they have been unceasingly employed in studying the works of God. Weariness and decay they know not. Strength of understanding in them is incapable of being impaired. Every object of investigation is to them delightful, and every faculty by its nature susceptible of improvement. What then must be the extent of their attainments at the present time?

66 Beyond this, the favor of God is extended to them in a degree incomprehensible by such minds as ours. To communicate just and extensive views of his works to these glorious beings, is declared to be Jehovah's especial intent in the creation of things by Jesus Christ (Eph. iii. 9, 10), and peculiarly his manifold wisdom in his dispensations to the church. No communication on his part, and no attainments on theirs, can be imagined too great for this divine purpose, or the goodness by which it was formed. In Matt. xxiv. 36, our Savior declares that of that day, not the day of his coming to the destruction of Jerusalem, knoweth no one, not even the angels in heaven. This appeal, if we understand the passage in the common acceptation, can have force and pertinency, only on the supposition that nothing which is known of the works and ways of God is hidden from angels, and is, therefore, a complete proof of the entire superiority of their intellectual nature and attainments to those of any other created being."

Various writers, differing in the calibre and dimensions of their minds, or ascending in the loftier flights of their imaginations, have been attracted into animated descriptions of this ennobling and surpassing distinction of the angelical nature. The Rev. John Wesley with admirable point suggests, "What an inconceivable degree of wisdom must they have acquired, by the use of their amazing faculties, over and above that with which they were originally endued, in the course of more than six thousand years!" That they have existed so long we are assured; for they "sang together when the foundations of the earth were laid." How immensely must their wisdom have increased during so long a period, not only by surveying the hearts and ways of men in their successive generations, but by observing the works of God, his works of creation, his works of providence, his works of grace! and above all, by continually beholding the face of their Father who is in heaven.

The actual possession and abundant advantages of such means for advancing their intellectual acquisitions, is thus presented by Dr. Chalmers in his "Astronomical Discourses: "God walked with our first parents in the garden of Paradise, and there did the angels hold their habitual converse ;* and should unblotted innocence, which charmed and attracted these superior beings to the haunts of Eden, be perpetuated in every planet but our own, then might each of them be the scene of high and heavenly communications, and an open way for the messengers of God be kept up with them all, and their inhabitants be admitted to a share in the themes and contemplations of angels, and have their spirits exercised on those things of which we are told that the angels desire to look into them; and thus, as we talk of the public mind of a city, or the public mind of an empire-by the well-frequented avenues of a free and ready circulation, a public mind might be formed throughout the whole extent of God's sinless and intelligent creation -and just as we read of the eyes of all Europe being turned to one spot where some affair of eventful importance is going on, there might be the eyes of a whole universe turned to the one world, where rebellion against the Majesty of Heaven had planted its standard; and for the re-admission of which, within the circle of his fellowship, God, whose justice was inflexible, but whose mercy he had, by some plan of mysterious wisdom, made to rejoice over it, was putting forth all the might, and travelling in all the greatness of the attributes which belonged to him."

In the overtures of Divine compassion and the provisions of Almighty grace, holy angels are invariably represented as exercising a most deep and ardent solicitude, as connected with the salvation of mankind, wrought out in the

*Lord King, in his Morsels of Criticisms, expresses the idea, that some period will arrive, when the communications of earth and heaven will be visible, and the angels of God descend and ascend to converse with men.

Redemption effected by the Cross of Christ. The Scotch divine further observes, "It is an impressive circumstance, that when Moses and Elias made a visit to our Savior on the Mount of Transfiguration, and appeared in glory from Heaven, the topic they brought along with them, and with which they were fraught, was the decease he was going to accomplish at Jerusalem. And however insipid the things of our salvation may be to an earthly understanding, we are made to know, that in the sufferings of Christ and the glory which should follow, there is matter to attract the notice of celestial spirits; for these are the very "things," says the Bible, "which the angels desire to look into." And however listless we, the dull and grovelling children of an exiled family, may feel about the perfections of the Godhead, and the display of those perfections in the economy of the gospel; it is intimated to us in the book of God's message, that the creation has its districts and its provinces; and we accordingly read of " thrones, and dominions, and principalities, and powers ;" and whether the terms denote separate regions of government, or the beings who, by a commission granted from the sanctuary of heaven, sit in delegated authority over them,-even in their eyes the mystery of Christ stands arrayed in all the splendor of unsearchable riches; for we are told that this mystery was revealed for the very intent "that unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places, might be made known, by the church, the manifold wisdom of God."

As a minor, yet additional confirmation of the exalted and transcendent intelligence of angels, we produce the apposite allusions of apostolic averment respecting the utter inutility of the most splendid mental endowments, as well as the denounced inefficiency of the penetrative sagacity of an intellectual philosophy, or the oratorial eloquence of a persuasive rhetoric, in lieu of the enlightened apprehensions of an evangelical faith to understand the economy of grace in the realized blessings of Redemption :-Though I speak with the tongues of men and of ANGELS, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling symbol. And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge, and have not charity, I am nothing.-1 Cor. xiii. 1, 2. But though we, or an ANGEL from heaven, preach any other Gospel unto you than we have preached unto you, let him be accursed. Gal. i. 8.

With augmented attractiveness, our subject now invites us to consider-though within too circumscribed a limit-- the ennobling and radiant characteristics which adorn and magnify the angelical nature. And as the firm foundation, surest safeguard, and impregnable citadel of the unfading and immortal excellencies of the angelical character we present to prominent view, their confirmed and consummate holiness. Throughout the Scriptures, instances are multiform. and the evidence is abundant confirmatory of this delightful and exalting truth. Holiness is the well-spring from whence unceasingly flow the crystal streams of their beauty, their morality, their sensibilities, and their unalloyed pleasures. These elements and attributes of moral excellence and celestial happiness are derived from this virtue which constitutes the imperishable beauty of the mind, and is as superior to the exterior grace of the body as the spirituality of the soul is superior to the earthy tabernacle in which she resides. Virtue is the essential beauty and unfailing felicity of the heavenly world; and while it engrosses the attachment and the homage of angels themselves, is regarded with entire complacency by its divine author. In virtue, according to the decision of mankind, sinful as they are, is placed the moral grandeur and loveliness of intelligent beings, that which unbiassed reason approves; which is always excellent; which is uniformly the object of delight; which will never change; and which will never cease to be desired.

This peculiar and distinguishing feature in the angelical character will be better understood and enhanced in its glory by the contrasted effects of its opposite principle, which occasioned the apostacy of the fallen angels, revealed and described in the apocalypse by St. John: And there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels.

“Fallen Angels were once possessed of this illustrious attribute, and held the exalted station, which is now exclusively enjoyed by their fellows. Fallen angels are still possessed, in an eminent degree, of power, life, activity and knowledge; but they yielded up their holiness, when they revolted from their Maker; and changed forever their character and their destiny, by sinning against God. Sin converted them into fiends, and made hell their habitation. From sin, that dark and dreadful world derives all its gloom, sorrow, and despair. Sin ushered it into being; raised its prison walls; barred its iron gates; shrouded its desolate regions in the blackness of darkness; kindled the fires by which it is gloomily enlightened, and awakened all the cries, and groans, and curses, and blasphemies, which echo through its regions of sorrow. Sin changed angels, once surrounding the throne, and harmonizing in the praise of God, into liars, accusers, calumniators, adversaries, and destroyers. How amazing and dreadful the change! How loathsome, how detestable, the spirit by which it was accomplished !"

"The mighty difference between Heaven and earth, angels and men, lies in holiness and sin.* Angels are holy;

* Sin made a sad and lamentable breach, both between God and men, and we are sinful: their residence is happy; ours, in many respects, wretched. This world was originally formed to be a delightful habitation; and at the close of creation, was by God himself pronounced to be very good. Man was once immortal and happy; because he was just, kind, sincere, humble and pious. What has the world, what has man, gained by the change? The afflicting answer may be summed up in a word. God made the earth a beautiful image of heaven; man, by his apostacy, has changed it into no obscure resemblance of hell. God made man a little lower than the angels, and crowned him with glory and honor. Man, being in honor, abode not, but became like the beasts that perish."*

As a glorious manifestation of this principle in the constitution of the angelical character, obedience, is a conspicuous virtue, whereby they fulfil, with an alacrity, represented in the expressive imagery of a flash of lightning, the gracious purposes, as well as punitive procedures of the Divine Will.

"Some may think it needs be to the angels loss to leave heaven and God's presence there, to follow business in this lower world and wait upon man; but no such matter. They count it no loss to follow their master's work whereever it lie. Neither is there an instance throughout the Bible, where an angel appears to have acted independently between men and angels too, yea, and between them and all creatures.—Pneumatologia.

* Dr. Dwight, (late President of Yale College, New Haven, Connecticut, U. S.) from whose masterly and eloquent discourses in his System of Theology, on this superlatively beautiful subject, I acknowledge, once for all, that I have freely borrowed; and no writer that I have had the opportunity to consult equals him, either in the felicity of his diction, the force of his ratiocination, or the fertility of his chastened imagination.

of the divine command. Perfect submission to the authority, and cheerful performance of the behests of Jehovah, is the unvaried and exemplary character of the heavenly hosts. Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven, in our Savior's comprehensive formula of prayer, is declarative of the joyous subordination which reigns with supreme harmony in the kingdom of heaven, and that encircles the throne of Deity. Bless the Lord, ye his angels, that do his commandments, hearkening unto the voice of his word, ye ministers of his that do his pleasure, exclaims the devout Psalmist, with the admiring emotions of expostulatory praise.

Another most attractive feature in the formation of the angelical character is their profound humility* and instructive meekness. In these great and ennobling virtues, how affecting the contrast between sinful man and unfallen angels; for though greatly exalted above mortals, the illustrious inhabitants of the celestial world are unspotted by pride, and vanity, the root of sin, and the stem of bitterness. Haughtiness or vanity would instantly disrobe of all their comeliness and glory the blessed spirits of the upper sanctuary, and cause them to resemble the worst and most odious of all the creatures of God!

Who would not rather aspire to be clothed with the stainless, spiritual, and never-fading robe of humility and righteousness; that faith, repentance, and love of the Gospel, which compose the embroidered garment, the fine linen of

* Indeed there shines in them such a brightness of the majesty of God, that there is nothing in which men might be more easily drawn, than with a certain admiration, to fall down in worshipping them. This very thing, St. John, in the Revelation, confesseth of himself, but he added withal, that he received this answer, “See thou do it not, for I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren that have the testimony of Jesus: worship God.”—AMBROSE, Communion and Ministry of Angels.

the saints, wrought and made white in the heavens ;-that best and beautiful robe with which, in his father's house every repenting and returning prodigal will be appareled and adorned.

How beautifully are the humility and meekness, and obedience of angels exemplified in the thrilling parable of Dives and Lazarus, "presenting to our view a choir of these illustrious and sympathising beings leaving the glory of Heaven, and directing their flight to this forlorn and sinful earth, to accompany and escort the departing spirit of poor, despised, forgotten Lazarus, to the world of happiness and love; to point the way to that delightful region; and to aid his trembling wing to the house and presence of his Father and his God. What monarch, what noble, what gentleman, what plain man would, willingly, have even attended his funeral? Who would have received him, when alive, into his house, powerfully as his sufferings pleaded for relief? Who, much more, would have consented to become his companion? Who, still more, would have acknowledged himself his friend? Yet all this, angels did not disdain.

Let us take to ourselves shame and confusion of face at the remembrance of our pride of feeling and haughtiness of heart. How often do we despise, neglect, insult, and trample under foot the disciples of Christ,-those who, in the sight of God, are far better than ourselves! For what do we despise them? Because, perhaps, their houses, their persons, their dress, their wealth, or their talents are inferior to our own. We might, indeed, sometimes pity them for these reasons, and be justified. But where shall we find an excuse for despising them ?"*

But the most fascinating and radiant lineament in the portraiture of the angelical character, is, their unbounded and affectionate benevolence ;-LOVE, an essential adjunct of their nature,-the atmosphere of their existence,-their nearest approach to the most glorious of the attributes of that Supreme Being denominated the God of Love-the essence of Redemption-the especial provision in the novel and valedictory commandment of the Great Teacher, during the days of His humiliation, when He tabernacled "in the flesh for us men and our salvation," to his persecuted and disconsolate disciples recorded by St. John in his gospel, chap. xiii. 34, emphatically the apostle of love,-the inexhaustible fountain of terrestrial happiness and celestial felicity. The very foundation of meetness for the beatitude of heaven, must be laid in the principle of love, productive of a complete renovation in the moral faculties and sensibilities of humanity.

The grand object which love proposes to accomplish, is the communication of happiness. There is not a more amiable, attractive, or comprehensive idea of the Divine Being any where to be found than that which is exhibited by the apostle in three monosyllables-God is Love. He is the uncreated and eternal source of all felicity, from which flow the varied streams of joy which gladden the heart of angels and archangels, cherubim and seraphim. To manifest the exuberance of His benignity, the Almighty Creator willed into existence the material universe to serve as an immense theatre upon which to display to countless orders of sensitive and intellectual creatures, for their delight and comfort, the diversified blessings of His unlimited and spontaneous beneficence.

The excellence of love, as a principle in the moral and intelligent system, bears a striking analogy to the law of attraction in physical nature. It draws into intimate fellowship and hallowed union all holy intelligences wherever dispersed, throughout the amplitudes of creation. It assimilates and unites man to God, to the angels and archangels-those glittering courtiers of heaven, the beautiful and beatified companions of our adorable Redeemer, Jesus Christ!

Of this distinguished and attractive loveliness of character angels are supremely possessed. "Angels are sincere, gentle, meek, kind, compassionate, and perfectly conformed to that great moral principle communicated in the word of our Lord, which he said: It is more blessed to give than to receive. This sublime excellence, incomparably more precious than gold which perishes, has in them been, from the beginning, debased with no alloy, tarnished with no spot, impaired by no length of years, and changed by no weakness or imperfection. Free from every defect, and every mixture, it has varied with length of years, merely towards higher and higher perfection, and shone not only with undiminished, but with increased beauty and lustre. There is no good which it is proper for angels to do, which they are not habitually prepared to do. There is no kindness capable of being suitably exercised by them which they do not in fact exercise. The more their faculties are enlarged, and the more their knowledge is increased, the more their means of usefulness is multiplied; the more exalted is their excellence, the more disinterested and noble their dispositions; the more intense their benevolence, and the more lovely and beautiful their character; the good which they have already done, has only prepared them to do more and greater good; and the disposition with which it was done has only become stronger by every preceding exertion."

Associated with this elevating and bland distinction, angels combine in their character those magnanimous and sublimer virtues which constitute personal dignity and glory, tempered and refined by consummate humility, as connected with their intense love and undeviating apprehensions of divine truth. Truth, which consists in an account of the character and works of God,-subjects elevated above all height, and extended above all limits; possessed of inherent grandeur and sublimity literally infinite; fitted to awaken in every mind formed with an understanding to perceive, and a taste to relish them, great ideas and exalted conceptions; and calculated to inspire habits of thinking and feeling, of the most dignified nature. To these subjects angels have already devoted themselves throughout a vast period of time, with burning intensity and fervor. Their views have all been formed without error, decay, or weariness; and their relish for the objects of their knowledge has only been strengthened by indulgence. Of course their progress in understanding has been rapid, and their attainments have been very great. Of course, also, their minds have been continually expanded and ennobled by all the conceptions which they have entertained concerning these wonderful subjects.

With all the accumulated knowledge of their vast capacities and early history, angels supremely rejoiced when they announced to our fallen, and sinful, and ruined race, the incarnation of Christ—the mystery of godliness-redemption for a lost world; for on that wondrous and nation-desired event, a multitude of the heavenly host sang Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will to men, Luke ii. 14; whilst our blessed Savior's declaration represents their delight on the recovery of a penitent from his way of sin and misery. "The conversion of sinners is the jubilation of angels-heaven rings with the joy, and this plain sense or meaning of Christ's words, that when they see the ranks and files of lapsed angels filled with new recruits of men and women, penitent for their sins, this is matter of joy, of ecstatical joy to the holy angels of God. For there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth; Luke xv. 10, as if every convert was an addition to their happiness. Whilst they praise God for such an instance of his goodness, they exult in the victory obtained over the powers of darkness, and in the enlargement of the Redeemer's kingdom. They receive the young believer under their care, being commissioned to watch over him for his protection and comfort.*

66 Angels have kind propensions towards men, especially good men, in this world, knowing these are of the same society and church with them; though the Divine Wisdom hath not judged it suitable to our present state of probation there should be an open and common intercourse between them and us. It is, however, a great incongruity that we should have strange, uncouth, shy, frightful or unfrequent thoughts of them in the mean time. We should bear our part in the joys of heaven; and when we are told there is joy there, among the angels of God, for the conversion of such, who are thereby but prepared to come to their assembly, we may conclude there is much for their glorification.†

It is their delight to attend upon the saints. They know one day that they shall live together, and sing together, and rejoice together; they know that the saints shall supply the room of the fallen angels, and when they meet, Oh! the joy that will be betwixt them, knowing what Christ hath done and suffered for them. The mystery of godliness is seen of angels, yea, they are ravished in the very beholding of it, as a new and strange object; they look into, saith Peter,—their whole spirits are taken up with it, as if it were the blessedest sight they could behold, and they are also ravished at the work of our Redemption; how should they but with delight attend the redeemed ones of Jesus Christ.-AMBROSE.

*ROBINSON-Scripture Characters.

"God is love, and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him."-1 John iv. 16. Such is the testimony of the apostle regarding fallen men; but it is at least equally true of the holy angels. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be," the same apostle states, 66 but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is."-iii. 2. The vision of God transforms the character; and what an influence must that vision have upon unfallen angels? It is the present lot of the angels, that they behold the face of our Father in heaven, and it would seem as if the effect of this was to form and perpetuate in them the moral likeness of himself; and that thus a diffused resemblance to the Godhead is kept up amongst all those adoring worshippers, who live in the near and rejoicing contemplation of the Godhead. Mark then, how that peculiar and endearing feature in the goodness of the Deity, how beauteously it is reflected downwards upon us in the revealed attitude of angels! From the high eminences of heaven are they bending a wakeful regard over the men of this sinful world, and the repentance of every one of them spreads a joy and a high gratulation throughout all its dwelling-places. Put this trait of the angelic character into contrast with the dark and lowering spirit of an infidel.

"The infidel, with his mind afloat among suns and systems, can find no place in his already-occupied regards for that humble planet which lodges and accommodates our species; the angels, standing on a loftier summit, and with a mightier prospect of creation before them, are yet represented as looking down on this single world, and attentively marking the every feeling, and the every demand of all its families. The infidel, by sinking us down to an unnoticeable minuteness, would lose sight of our dwelling-place altogether, and spread a darkening shroud of oblivion over all the concerns and all the interests of men; but angels will not so abandon us; and, undazzled by the whole surpassing grandeur of that scenery which is around them, are they revealed as directing all the fulness of their regard to this our habitation, and casting a longing and benignant eye on ourselves and on our children. The infidel will tell us of those worlds which roll afar, and the number of which outstrips the arithmetic of the human understanding—and then, with the hardness of an unfeeling calculation, he will consign the one we occupy, with all its guilty generations, to despair. But he who counts the number of the stars, is set forth to us as looking at every inhabitant among the millions of our species, and the word of the Gospel beckoning to him with the hand of invitation, and on the very first of his return is moving towards him with all the eagerness of the prodigal's father, to receive him back again into that presence from which he had wandered. And as to this world, in favor of which the scowling infidel will not permit one solitary movement, all heaven is represented as astir about its restoration; and there cannot a single son, or a single daughter, be recalled from sin unto righteousness, without an acclamation of joy among the hosts of Paradise.

The expansive range of angelic benevolence extends far beyond the boundaries of human capacity and comprehension. Angels have indeed a mighter reach of contemplation than can be comprehended by mortal ken. "Angels can look down upon this world and all it inherits, as the part of a large family. Angels were in the full exercise of their powers, even at the first infancy of our species, and shared in the gratulations of that period, when at the birth of humanity, all intelligent nature gave a gladdening response, and the morning stars sang together for joy. They loved us with the love which a family on earth bears to a younger sister; and the very childhood of our tinier faculties did only serve the more to endear us to them; and though born at a later hour in the history of creation, did they regard us heirs of the same destiny with themselves, to rise along with them in the scale of moral elevation, to bow at the same footstool, and to partake in those high dispensations of a parent's kindness, and a parent's care, which are ever emanating from the throne of the Eternal on all the members of a duteous and affectionate family. Take the reach of an angel's mind, but, at the same time, take the seraphic fervor of an angel's benevolence along with it, how, from the eminence on which he stands, he may have an eye upon many worlds, and a remembrance upon the origin and successive concerns of every one of them; how he may feel the full flow of a most affecting relationship with the inhabitants of each, as the offspring of our common Father; and though it be both the effect and the evidence of our depravity, that we cannot sympathise with these pure and generous ardors of a celestial spirit; how it may consist with the lofty comprehension, and the sweet breathing love of an angel, that he can both shoot his benevolence abroad over a mighty expanse of planets and of systems, and lavish a flood of tenderness on each individual of their teeming population."* Oh! ye blessed spirits, by virtue of the untarnished perceptions of your cherubic knowledge, and the sympathy of your seraphic benignity; full well ye understand, that affection, is no pretender; grief, no sophist; death, no solemn fallacy; the Bible no romance of cunningly-devised fables;-the warnings of perdition, and the overtures of salvation, no superstitious delusions. Full well ye know that ye have now struck, though with the gentlest touch, an Æolian string in that Harp of Sorrow, which ye found suspended on the weeping willow of afflictive bereavement ! That beloved one, the apparition of whose saintly form, oft I see, when entranced in the reveries of my day-dreams, and during the sleepless vigils of nocturnal vision, resembled ye in the adorning traits of your virtuous dispositions. Blessed spirits! ye were no indifferent observers of the sacredness of that parting hour, when after taking a farewell embrace of the darling object of her maternal solicitude,-the expressive type, and fragrant blossom of the rosy freshness of her unvarying love, prophesying from the loveliness of his infantile character, that he would not be long absent from her bosom -she softly wrapped around me the pure and radiant mantle of her ardent affection, whilst ye hovered around her dying couch and whispered* to her believing spirit, preparing for its anxious flight, the assurance of divine favor, "Fear not, I am with thee,”—awaiting the summons of her Savior, to waft her soul, upon the downy chariots of your swift and golden wings, to the unfading inheritance of the upper skies, as she ascended in faith, bright as the morning star; in hope, serene as a summer's eve; in charity, joyous as the bliss, and seraphic as the love of heaven; singing in strains which, to the sanctified ear of a scriptural anticipation, are more ethereal, harmonious, and enrapturing than were ever warbled by the fabled and expiring melody of the classic and celestial Swan.

*If the notes of distant music wafted on the air to the ear can reach and melt the heart and lift it from earth to heaven, as they often do, why cannot angelic whispers do the same? If the sighing of every evening zephyr can move the strings of the heart, and produce a concord of the tenderest and loveliest feeling, why cannot unseen angelic influences do what is thus done by "the viewless spirit of a lovely sound ?"-SLACK, Ministry of the Beautiful.

"Now, Saviour, now, my soul receive,
Transported from this vale, to live
And reign with thee above;
Where faith is sweetly lost in sight,
And hope in full supreme delight,
And everlasting love."

Beholding, through the medium of the bright mirror of faith, and as reflected in the revealing glass of Inspiration, the resplendent halo of those moral excellencies which encircle the celestial worshippers of the upper sanctuary—those shining ministers of state which surround the sapphire throne of the Majesty on High; well does it behoove us in viewing the contrast of our disobedience, depravity, demerit and degradation, humbly to adopt, in the prostration of admiring devotion, the impulsive exclamation of the Royal Penitent: O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth! What is man that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man that thou visitest him? For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honor.* Psalm viii. 1, 4, 5.

* The present note comprises the general opinion of the most able commentators and divines respecting the literal and spiritual meaning of the fifth verse of this Psalm. He is made but a little lower than the angels;—lower, indeed, because by his body he is allied to the earth, and to the beasts that perish, yet by his soul, which is spiritual and immortal, he may be truly said to be but a little lower than they. He is but for a little while lower than the angels; for the children of the resurrection shall be no longer lower than they. Luke xx. 36. He is endued with noble faculties and capacities. God gave him his beings—has distinguished and qualified him for dominion over the inferior creatures. Man's reason is his crown of glory; let him not profane that crown by disturbing the use of it, nor forfeit that crown by acting contrary to its dictates. He is invested with sovereign dominion over the inferior creatures, under God, and is constituted their lord. This is such a display of the Divine love to us, vile sinners, as cannot be expressed or comprehended, but should be humbly admired and adored. Every time we partake of them, we realize this dominion which man has over the works of God's hands; and it is a reason for our subjection to God, our chief Lord, and his dominion over us."

REMARKS AND STRICTURES.

To hear marriage spoken of by those who have assumed the Christian profession, (for in this matter, we renounce all intercourse with infidels, profligates, and socialists,) as a LOTTERY is an awful outrage upon our natural instincts, a deliberate violence committed upon our reason, and an impious impeachment of the wisdom and benevolence of God, who has circumvallated and garrisoned the domestic constitution by the most efficient provisions of our physical organization and the exquisite mental and moral sensibilities of our nature;—whilst all the discord, and concomitant infelicities which occur in this sacred enclosure have, unquestionably, arisen from those who have gained admission therein, by the imbecility or stratagems of an odious treachery. In the apostolic injunction, Be not unequally yoked, where can be discovered the necessity of the chance or fatalism of a pretended or affirmed sortilege? If through the fatal influence of family pride, the unhallowed lust of passion, the sordid love of money, an immoral compliance with the artificial requisitions of fashionable life, or an unauthorized submission to the urgency of parental pertinacity, (for of all oppressions the most insidious and contemptible is domestic tyranny,) an ill-starred marriage

The text, also, has a particular reference to Jesus Christ, as expounded and illustrated by St. Paul, in Hebrews ii. 6-8, where, to prove the sovereign dominion of Christ, both in heaven and in earth, the apostle shows that he is that Man, here spoken of, whom God has crowned with glory and honor, and made to have dominion over the works of his hand. The greatest favor ever manifested to the human race, and the greatest honor ever put upon human nature, were exemplified in the incarnation and exaltation of the Lord Jesus; these far exceed the favors and honors done us by creation and Providence, though they also are great, and far more than we deserve. In this, every other instance of Divine condescension is eclipsed, all our thoughts are swallowed up, and our contemplations must issue in wonder, love, and praise."

is effected, all the unhappiness and vicious consequences accruing therefrom,—like the unalterable law of cause and effect,—is exclusively attributable to the gross prostitution of that divine ordinance instituted by Jehovah himself, in the garden of Eden, when unpolluted by the stain and crime of man's disobedience, involving all the disastrous results which have flowed therefrom.

"Sacred wedlock! law of heaven,
By wisdom framed, in mercy given;
The spring, whence all the kindred ties
Of parents, children, brethren rise!
Curs'd be the lusts that violate
The honors of the married state;
The Lord himself in wrath severe
Will judge the vile adulterer."

The spirit of the apostolic injunction, likewise, clearly denounces the unnatural and indecorous affinity of blooming womanhood with decrepid senility, originating either in the promptings of mercenary motives, or the unseemly indulgence of amorous propensities. Equally abominable in the sight of a holy God, must be the intentions and conduct of those who think to assume the momentous responsibilities of the ministerial office, with the ostensible or avowed design of converting the pulpit into a stepping-stone for personal aggrandizement and social elevation, through the medium of an advantageous, though insincere, matrimonial alliance; while some have even gone so far as to desecrate the solemn sacrament of the Eucharist for the accomplishment of a similar purpose; neither are those clergymen free from reprehension, who, apparently unimpaired in physical strength and mental faculties, retire to the fashionable residences of watering places and summer resort, from the stated performance of ministerial labors; as soon as they have secured the otium cum dignitate of a petticoat pension.

What an offensive spectacle in the sight of God, Angels, and Christians, is the frequent exhibition of ecclesiastical coxcombs, whether in the adolescence, maturity, or decline, of their ministerial functions, that when they should be wooing a soul, they are evidently more anxious to court the admiration of their persons, manifested in the bestarched cravat, the becurled periwig, preparatory attitudinizing, the studied display of the perfumed cambric, dangling from the trimmed digits of the bejewelled fingers of a bepoulticed hand. The subtilty and malignity of Satan, the magnitude and grievous effects of sin, the priceless boon of Inspiration, the blood-bought gift of Redemption, and the sacred influences of the Holy Ghost cannot tolerate such solemn mockeries!

If, in the foregoing remarks, the writer is considered to have indulged in observations too severe and outre, he would recommend his censurers to consult the sentiments and strictures of that extraordinary theologian, the late Robert Hall, who invariably placed in juxtaposition-side by side-with vulgarity, affectation, buffoonery, pride, vanity, and pharisaism in the sacred desk-Satan, his angels and allies.

The extravagant expense for the ostentation of personal pride and social importance displayed in the fitting up, and auctioneering, for the most fashionable pews, in professing Christian churches, are also very serious abominations, converting the House of God—the house of prayer into a house of merchandise,—a den of thieves.—Matt. xxi. 12, 13.

DESCRIPTION OF THE PLATE. The plate represents the escort of a departed believer to the gate of heaven. The conducting angel, being preceded by the announcing angel, on the banner of whose trumpet are given those passages which constitute the credentials or passport of Faith, and which, upon being presented to the receiving angel, the portals of the city of the heavenly Jerusalem are instantly thrown open for the admission of their charge. Lower down, is a guardian angel, surrounded by happy cherubs, conveying the son of the departed to the Paradise above; upon the drapery of whose ethereal vestment is inscribed that passage upon which is founded the doctrine of infant salvation, for the reception of such juvenile inhabitants amongst the angels of God.

RESIDENCE AND SOCIETY.

In the unwearied and exhilarating progress of our advancing and animating inquiries respecting the spiritual nature, exalted rank, amazing attributes, and beautiful characteristics of celestial intelligences, we have now arrived at an important point of our elevating and delightful theme, requiring the sober and serious consideration of the local or constituted residence of angels, usually denominated Heaven; and which is variously represented in Scripture-as the city of the living God,—the resplendent habitation of the innumerable company of angels,—the magnificent palace of the celestial Jerusalem,-the bright mansions of the incorruptible, unfading, and eternal inheritance of the saints in light, the holy and glorified throne of Redemption and the Godhead, the sacred Mount Zion and upper sanctuary of the Christian church, resounding with the triumphant hallelujahs of the ransomed inhabitants, victorious over

Satan, sin, and mortality,-The august and effulgent SHECHINAH OF ETERNITY.

Various and momentous as are all the revealed communications of the Bible, it is a striking circumstance, eliciting admonitory reflections, that scarcely anything is taught us in Holy Writ concerning any of the worlds included under the general name of Heavens, except the Supreme Heaven. The reason for which, it is not difficult to ascertain, being found in the truthful conviction that whatever information might have been given or knowledge attained respecting them, would, after all, be the mere gratification of curiosity, incapable of being directed to any valuable end, as connected with our advancing holiness, or promotive of our spiritual edification; for, under the fluctuating and deceptive influence of this powerful principle, in all probability we should have been diverted by such communications, if they had been made, from the thoughtful reception of those solemn and glorious verities which ought to occupy our thoughts, as more needful in the attainment of those things which accompany salvation. Few affections of the human mind exert a stronger influence over its conduct than curiosity. Well-directed, and cautiously kept within proper bounds, it is eminently profitable to man, by prompting him unceasingly to useful inquiries, improvements in knowledge, and discoveries in science; but when suffered to wander without restraint, it conducts to mere gratification, hazardous to the real interests and eternal welfare of the soul.

But with the Heaven of Heavens we have a continual and most important concern. This glorious and delightful world is the place to which all our ultimate views are urgently directed by our Maker, God, and Saviour,—the blissful home to which a merciful and gracious Jehovah invites us to look, as our final rest and rescue from trouble and temptation; and the final seat of all the enjoyment which we are capable of attaining. With its illustrious and benevolent inhabitants, we shall, if we are wise, become familiarly acquainted and intimately united, and shall live in the midst of them, through ages which cannot end. Of this world, therefore, and of those happy and dignified beings who dwell therein, it has pleased an All-wise God, in the infinite condescension of his loving-kindness, to furnish us with information beneficial, various, and extensive, unfolding to our view the character of its noble inhabitants and attractive intercourse,-its sublime occupation, its gorgeous scenery, and inconceivable beautitude!

The word heaven is variously applied in different passages of the Bible. It is employed in reference to God, as in Daniel iv. 26. Until thou know, that the heavens do rule. To angels ;-The heavens are not clean in his sight, Job xv. 15; in which passage, some commentators have supposed that an intimation is given of the fall of Lucifer. To the Christian church :-There was war in heaven, Rev. xii. 7,* implying the struggles and conflicts of the primitive saints and of Christianity. To a great height, the cities are great and walled up to heaven;†-to distin-

The casting out of this dragon, was the overthrow of idolatry when the heathen lost the throne. The accusations of the brethren, those abominable, but altogether groundless, calumnies cast by the worshippers and slaves of the dragon upon the Christians and their religion. And the wrath of the dragon or devil, when thus subdued, exerted itself in the violence of some succeeding emperors, the heresies and discords sown among the members, and churches of Christ, and all the miseries consequent on the inundation of barbarous nations which tore in pieces the Roman empire itself. It is certain, also, that Christians, in the time of Constantine, thought the prophecy contained in this chapter was plainly fulfilled, by the great and baneful event of Constantine's advancement to the imperial throne of the Roman empire; the emperor's statue being set over his palace gate, representing him as trampling on a wounded dragon. Even Constantine himself, in his epistle to Eusebius, speaks of his conquest of Licinius, as the downfall of the dragon and the restoration of Christian liberty to all men.

†The people of the East anciently raised up the walls of their city so high, as not being liable to be scaled, they considered themselves perfectly secure from all external invasion. The same simple contrivance, is to this guished glory. How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, Son of the Morning,*—the firmament or expansion over our heads, in which are set the sun, moon, and stars ;—the kingdom prepared before the foundation of the world;-the building not made with hands, eternal in the heavens ;-the inheritance incorruptible, undefiled and that fadeth not away; the heavenly city which hath no need of a candle, nor the light of the sun or the moon to enlighten it, for God and the Lamb are the light thereof, and into which nothing that defileth can enter, being the blest abodes of purity, of knowledge, of triumph, where there are blessed companions and blest employ.

In the Scriptures the epithet Paradise is frequently applied to portray the distinguishing and superabundant felicity of heaven; and it is worthy of particular observation, that the word Eden, which imports extreme pleasure and delight, was often used by the inspired penmen of the Old Testament, to denote places which were either remarkably fruitful in their soil or enchantingly agreeable in their situation; in connection with the striking coincidences of divine Revelation, which opens and shuts with such corresponding and joyous subjects of contemplation. The Bible begins with the Mosaic description of the terrestrial Eden, and closes with the apocalyptic representation of the glories, magnificent grandeur, and exuberant happiness of the celestial Paradise.

Eden was remarkable for a river which issued from it; in like manner St. John describes, in the heavenly Eden, a pure river of the water of life proceeding from the throne of God and the Lamb. Each was adorned by a tree of Life, prolific with fruit, which grew in the midst thereof. These various analogies, as well as other similitudes, are evidently designed to teach us that Jehovah purposed, in the redemption of the second Adam, the Lord from heaven, to restore to his people a more perfect and enduring state of bliss than that which was forfeited by the sad and fatal disobedience day, deemed a sufficient guard from the attack of the marauding Arabs. Up to heaven, was an oriental hyperbole or proverbial expression.

*Kings, princes, and rulers are sometimes represented by the heavenly hosts, and figuratively compared to the sun, moon, and stars. By Lucifer, in the above text, we are to understand, metaphorically, the king of Babylon, who outvied the other potentates of the East, as much as the morning star, by virtue of its peculiar brilliancy, outshines all other constellations in the firmament. The expression, also, doubtless alludes to the fall of Satan, the prince of the apostate angels, described by our Saviour, and recorded by the evangelist, Luke x. 18. I beheld Satan, as lightning, fall from heaven. The title of son of the morning, is common both to the morning star and to an angel; the angels being styled, in Job xxxviii. 7, morning stars. The fall of the apostate angels is not directly recorded in the Old Testament; but it is implied in the distinction which the inspired writers make between good and evil spirits, and is sometimes alluded to by the prophets, when they threaten destruction to proud and violent tyrants, who, in imitation of the pride of the devil, exalt themselves against God and his truth, and are the instruments of Satan in promoting idolatry and wickedness in the world.

of our first parents. In the closing chapters of Revelation St. John appears embarrassed and overpowered when he desired to exhibit the splendor and magnificence, the beatitude and glory of the holy and heavenly city;—its walls are jasper, high, deep, and wide;-its streets and dwelling-places of pure and pellucid gold, whose foundation and pavement are precious stones, with its twelve gates, each a pearl, watched and attended by angels.

In condescension to our limited faculties, and to aid our inadequate conceptions of invisible or spiritual things, St. John reiterates his splendid allusions to the heavenly metropolis, by reference to the holy city of Jerusalem, the pride of the Jews and the glory of the whole earth. And to express its perfect symmetry, excessive beauty, and the complete safety of its inhabitants, it is said to be four square, and to be surrounded by a wall, great and wide. It had three gates on every side, to intimate, that from all quarters of the globe there is a way opened to heaven for such who are suitably qualified to become its denizens, gathered from the east, and the west, the north, and the south, to dwell together, enfranchised with the privileges of the kingdom of God. On these gates were inscribed the names of the twelve tribes of Israel, to signify that none but the true Israel of God will be allowed admission within its sacred precincts; whilst on the twelve precious stones which composed the foundation of the city walls, were engraved the names of the apostles of the Lamb; implying that the church in heaven, like the church on earth, is built upon the foundation of the apostles and the prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone.

The word Paradise occurs three times in the Old Testament, where it is employed to express the high culture of beautiful gardens, fruitful orchards, and enchanting scenery; likewise in the New Testament, in relation to heaven, in the affecting spectacle of our Saviour, during the agonies and ignominy of the crucifixion, when he imparted the gracious promise to the penitent thief on the cross: To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise. The ecstatic declaration of the apostle How that he was caught up into Paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it was not lawful for a man to utter ;—the animating assurance afforded to the faithful warrior in the Christian warfare: To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the Paradise of God.

Not only in Scripture terminology is this appellation employed, as a synonyme to convey the idea of the most exquisite pleasures and consummate beatitude which reign supremely in heaven, but the pagan world and ancient mythology attempted similar representations respecting the heaven of their gods, heroes, statesmen, philosophers, poets, and all those deemed worthy of an apotheosis, as a spot of peculiar and entrancing blessedness, which they situated in some far distant and lovely island, unvisited by mortals, or else their imagination placed it in the Hesperian gardens of their Elysian fields, which their fancy beautified with beds of odoriferous flowers, embowered walks, spicy groves, and shrubberies of aromatic sweetness, quiet valleys and crystal streams, sparkling fountains and unclouded skies, fanned by perfumed zephyrs, upon whose aereal wings floated, in unearthly melody, the harmonious chants of the matins and vespers of the blest.

But we eagerly return from this digressive reference to the dark superstitions of benighted heathenism, the classic philosophy of polished Greece, and the elaborate mythology of martial Rome, to some more appropriate reflections upon the spirituality of the heaven of Christianity; and amongst the ineffable advantages which will attend our introduction into heaven, will be the inconceivable opportunities which will be offered to our renovated perceptions, of a more satisfactory knowledge and deeper insight into the inscrutible mysteries of Divine Providence, and the economy of all-mighty grace. In heaven[*] our knowledge and attainments will brighten and expand in proportion, in glorious correspondency to the inconceivable and amazing advantages of the celestial state. Even in the present probationary and progressive steps of our fallen condition, aided by the astonishing discoveries of divulging science, what rapid advancement has recently been made in our apprehensions of the wonderful and hitherto hidden secrets-the sublime and surprising arcana of the natural world and physical nature. An acquaintance with. the mineral kingdom has imparted to man the power of subduing the earth, and appropriating her productions for his use and comfort. From the science of astronomy, accompanied with an insight into the properties of the magnet, he has derived the ability to traverse the wide and tempestuous ocean, converting it from a separating barrier, into a connecting medium of brotherly intercourse, with the numerous families of the different nations dispersed over the surface of the terraqueous globe. A familiarity with the principles of aerostation, enables him to ascend and float in the subtle element of the circumambient air, and penetrate the clouds, until he becomes invisible in the distant regions of atmospheric space, enveloped in the variegated and elegant curtains of the starry firmament of the solar system; so that, by the auxiliary information of analogy, drawn from the study of prying science, the rich and beauteous provinces of instructive nature, we are assured that when we dwell with celestial intelligences, our spiritualized perceptions will be rendered capable of reaching the loftiest attitudes of angelic sagacity and knowledge; for says our Saviour: The children of the resurrection—the children of God, will be equal to the angels,—on the same equality with them in glory, honor, dignity, felicity, and immortal wisdom.

'The noblest, more important, and by far the most attractive view of the angelical residence, is derived from the consideration of its being the especial dwelling-place of Jehovah, and which in the Scriptures is frequently styled the Heaven of Heavens, the holy Mountain, the House of God, the favorite habitation chosen by Deity, where God displays the manifestations of His glory and effulgence in a manner superior to any other place in the circle of the universe. It is also called by the pre-eminent distinction of the locality, The throne of God, the seat of universal and endless dominion, where the Divine authority is peculiarly exercised and made known, and the splendors of the Divine government exhibited with inconceivable lustre and grandeur.

It is likewise distinguished as being the blissful residence of his most favored creatures-the saints who are redeemed by the blood of his Son, and of the innumerable company of angels which stand round about the throne. As the centre of consummate holiness, radiating virtue, and Divine communications, it appears with transcendant beauty and glory; where the divine principle shines without alloy, and flourishes in immortal youth; where the finishings of Almighty workmanship and the endless diversities of omniscient skill are exhibited in the most exquisite forms, and in the last degrees of refinement and perfection; the ocean from which all the streams of infinite wisdom and goodness proceed, and into which they return, flowing with the unfathomable depth and inexhaustible fullness of joy everlasting, and pleasures for evermore!

The resplendent throne of God may further be considered as the capital of the universe.* "From this glorious centre embassies may be occasionally dispatched to all surrounding worlds, in every region of space. Here, too, deputations from all the different provinces of creation may occasionally assemble, and the inhabitants of different worlds mingle with each other, and learn the grand outlines of those physical operations and moral transactions which have taken place in their respective spheres. Here may be exhibited to unnumbered multitudes, objects of sublimity and glory, which are no where else to be found within the wide extent of creation. Here intelligences of the highest order, who have attained the most sublime height of knowledge and virtue, may form the principal part of the population of this magnificent region. Here the glorified body of the Redeemer may have taken its principal station, as the head of all principalities and powers, and here likewise Enoch and Elias may reside, and according to the general tenor of Scripture, where God's throne is, where Christ in his glorified body is, in this royal city of the King of Kings, and there is also the home of the sainted dead.*

The residence of angels is also denominated, by way of eminent distinction, the third heavens, the holiest of holies,† and partly to be the centre and medium of that solemn worship which the Jewish people were required and enjoined to render to him. Within the

*There is an astronomical idea which may help us to form conceptions of this glorious high throne, which is the peculiar residence of the Eternal; it being highly probable, if not certain, from minute observations on the nature of the law of gravitation, and other circumstances, that all the systems of the universe revolve round one common centre, and that the centre may bear as great a proportion in point of magnitude, to the universal assemblages of systems, as the sun does to his surrounding planets; and since our sun is five hundred times larger than the earth, or all the other planets, and their satellites taken together, on the same scale, such a central body would be five hundred times larger than all the systems and worlds in the universe. Here may be a vast universe in itself-an example of material creation exceeding all the rest in magnitude and splendor, and in which are blended the glories of every other system. If this is in reality the case, it may with most emphatic propriety be termed the Throne of God.—DR. DICK. Philosophy of Religion.

*DR. CHALMER'S Astronomical Discourses.

†The most exact representation of the heavenly world (considered as a place) that was ever given to men, was the ancient tabernacle, formed after the pattern given to Moses in the Mount. That magnificent and divine pavilion was the emblem and the type of heaven itself, and built by Moses partly to be a place of Jehovah's visible residence, as the King of Israel, in which converge and are concentrated all the most glorious manifestations and displays of the divine Majesty; rendering the celestial scenery worthy of the infinite merit and purchase of the Son of God,-worthy of the most enlarged desires, anticipations and hopes of the redeemed,-the amazing theatre in which an eternal providence of progressive knowledge, power and love, and all the diversities of virtuous intelligence, all the forms and hues of Moral Beauty, will brighten in an unceasing gradation, and where the harmonious anthems of gratitude and praise, love and enjoyment, will eternally resound.

This ineffably delightful spot, an apostle has enchantingly represented as the new heavens and the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness;—where God will wipe away all tears from every eye, where there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away; and amongst its various and peculiar privileges will be access to the tree second veil of this tabernacle called the sanctum sanctorum, or holiest of holies, Aaron was forbidden access at all times. Within its sacred enclosure were deposited the golden censer, and the ark of the covenant overlaid with gold, wherein was the golden pot that had manna, and Aaron's rod that budded, and the tables of the covenant, and the cherubim of glory in which God dwelt in the awful cloud that overshadowed the mercy-seat; so in like manner He resides, in the holiest of all in the heavens, as he does not in any other part of the universe. Behold the heaven is his throne and the earth is his footstool. Heaven is the centre of his operations, and perhaps we might say, of his essence.

God, who only gave six days to the work of creation, employed forty days in giving instructions that the tabernacle might be made. For that in which the representation of the world of grace was manifested was by far the most wondrous work. One chapter alone is occupied by Moses in describing the structure of the visible world; more than six in explaining that of the tabernacle; thus we are taught, that the latter is no less to be attended to than the former, since from considering thereof the marvels of Christ are made known to us.-WITSIUS.

of life, denoting a state of immortality. "Blessed indeed are they who do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city."

Notwithstanding our imperfect and inadequate perceptions of the incomprehensible glories of the heavenly state, sufficient has been graciously revealed,* to animate the ravished soul, during her terrestrial sojourn in the tabernacle of this present life of darkness and doubt, dangers and despondency, distress and death, to urge her continually to chant the sonnet of devout aspiration, grateful and adoring praise:

"Who, who would live alway, away from his God;
Away from yon heaven, that blissful abode,
Where the rivers of pleasure flow o'er the bright plains,
And the noon-tide of glory eternally reigns!
Where the saints of all ages in harmony meet,
Their Savior and brethren, transported to greet,
While the anthems of rapture unceasingly roll,
And the smile of the Lord is the feast of the soul!"

*The Christian, however, must propose these questions to himself: "Amidst all this waste of worlds," where is the heaven of his religion? Where is the abode of the body of Christ, which visibly ascended into another place through the firmament above us? The Christian cannot be defrauded of his consolations by the powers of the telescope, nor the loftiest flights of imagination. The God who made the noble universe, gave also Christianity to man, to direct him to an existence in a state of immortality. But if there is a state, or condition, there must also be a place in which we must dwell; and that place we are repeatedly assured, is the same place which the body of Christ now possesses. If St. Stephen was permitted to see the Shechinah, preparatory to his being stoned, his visual faculties shall have been so strengthened that the inconceivable distance between earth and heaven was, as it were, annihilated. St. Stephen, filled with the Holy Ghost, saw, in the flesh, his blessed Redeemer. The heaven of heavens was brought near to man, and the first Christian martyr was enabled to behold it, as a pledge and earnest of his own immortal happiness ; and through him a pledge to all those who by the same faith shall offer

But we hasten to offer a few brief and concluding observations regarding the attractive society and inviting associations of the celestial state; and which will consist of those glorious spirits who have stood fast in their original integrity, have never swerved from the allegiance of their loyalty to the Majesty enthroned upon the illimitable circle of universal empire. The children of the resurrection, the children of God, will hold friendly and intimate intercourse with the purest and most fascinating, the most amiable and lovely intelligences that were ever created, as the representatives of the exuberant beneficience and supreme holiness of Jehovah-whose obedience has never been disturbed by a single emotion of rebellious feeling-whose characters have never been tarnished by one solitary stain of impurity—whose eyes have never been sullied by one momentary tear, and whose hearts have never been seduced by the influence of temptation. As objects of contemplation, angels present to us the delightful spectacle of inherent light, beauty, and greatness. These noble and illustrious beings never indulge in sloth, deceit, wrath, malice, envy, or impiety. "Angels never cheat, corrupt, betray, or oppress. Angels never profane the name of God, perjure themselves, ridicule sacred things, insult the Redeemer, resist the Holy Ghost, nor deny the being, the perfections, the word, or the government of God. Angels never consume their time in idle amusements, or guilty pleasures; never slander each other, never quarrel, never make wars, and never desire or plunder each other's blessings."

In the survey of those beauteous and resplendent excellencies which, like an ethereal and radiant garment, surrounds and adorns the character and conduct of these lovely and affectionate,* immaculate and impeccable inhabitants of the skies, and worshippers in the temple and within the veil of the upper skies, well may Poesy, animated and inspired by such an array of moral virtues, burst forth into the sacred aspiration-

"In such society as this,
My willing soul would stay;
And sit and sing herself away
To everlasting bliss."

Another most cheering, elevating, and unspeakably attractive view of the society of heaven, is presented and urged in the joyous expectation and animating desire of meeting and mingling with the most excellent characters that have ever appeared upon the face of this ruined world, -patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs, and the redeemed, "gathered out of every kindred, and people, and nation, and language, and tongue," purified from every earthly imperfection, divested of all infirmity, and clothed with the lustre of the spiritual body-a glorious community, which, in the comprehensive and descriptive declaration of the Scripture, is styled the general assembly and church of the first born, and the spirits of just men made perfect.

How enrapturing, too, the thought and belief, that we shall there greet in the beauty of holiness, and the worship of the liturgical services of the upper sanctuary, those endeared objects of affection-the desire of our eyes-and the children of our love, who have preceded us to the kingdom of glory, delivered from all the infelicities of those dis-themselves living and acceptable sacrifices to God.-DR. CHALMERS, Astronomical Discoveries.

*There is not a single reason to believe that angels ever exercised, even in one instance, personal resentment against the basest and most guilty child of Adam; or a revengeful thought against the most depraved inhabitant of hell. No provocation is able to disturb the serenity of their minds. No cloud ever overcasts their smiles, or intercepts the clear sunshine of their benevolence.-DR. DWIGHT.

ciplinary and afflictive dispensations incidental to our present state of existence in this sin-disordered world,—to greet them in those bright and celestial mansions, where the exercise of the refined sensibilities of our spiritualized nature will be liable to suffer no disturbance or interruption from the sufferings of pain, the debility of disease, the vexations of disappointment, the sorrows of unexpected vicissitudes and unforeseen woes, the aberrations of a distempered sensorium,* the avarice which annihilates natural affection, the tormenting reproaches of an awakened conscience, those invasions of mental and moral distress, which in this troublous life besiege and entrench the soul, or the heart-rending separation of the inflexible decree of death! How captivating, then, and supporting the anticipation of thus greeting one another in this goodly and harmonious fellowshipt and revealed beatitude of heaven; for Christ has averred, that in that world, the children of God, being the children of the resurrection, shall be iσayyεho, equal or like to the angels,† invested, adorned, and beatified with the same attributes, knowledge, holiness, dignity, and the ineffable enjoyment of the divine favor!‡

* Amongst the sanitary measures for the recovery of those laboring under mental affliction, as the consequence either of disease or grief, the attendance on the services of sabbatical worship and the observance of religious exercises, are found to be the most soothing, and effectively beneficial; assuredly, then, such a cogent demonstration of the adaptation of Christianity to meet the multiform ailments of our physical nature, as well as the moral necessities of the "divinity that stirs within us," it well behooves the philosopher to ponder with admonitory astonishment, and the infidel with warning consternation.

† I believe there shall never be an anarchy in heaven; but as there be hierarchies amongst the angels, so shall there be degrees of priority amongst the saints.-SIR THOMAS BROWNE, Christian Morals.

The bodies of good men, saith St. Augustine, after the resurrection shall be qualia sunt angelorum corpora, such as the bodies of angels; and, also, that they shall be corpora angelica in societate angelorum, fit for society and converse with angels.

This animating conviction and noble aspiration of a biblical faith, is quaintly, yet strikingly represented in the following expressions of the fervid and devout Isaac Ambrose, in his nervous discourses on the Communion and Ministry of Angels: "Adam was kept out of Paradise by cherubims, yet cherubims and seraphims, and all the host of heaven are ready to receive the saints into the glorious city. O! what a joy will be in heaven at the first admittance of these souls! what clasping, closing, kissing, embracing will be at this entrance betwixt saints and angels. Welcome, say the angels, and welcome say the archangels, yea, the principalities triumph, and powers rejoice, and virtues' shine, and thrones glitter, and cherubim give light, and seraphim burn, at the soul's arrival, where they shall live together, and love together, and sing together Jehovah's praise!" To which may be added the corresponding sentiments of the eccentric and pious Skelton: "What a glow of the infinite sweetness of love and friendship will pervade the 'spirits of good men made perfect;' to see those soul's, who perhaps, in this life contended bitterly about the trifles of this world, meeting like 'righteousness and peace, kissing each other,' to see them strike hands, and unite hearts forever. Among this glorious company there is none that doth not contribute largely to the satisfaction and entertainment of the rest. There is no weak reasoning, no biassed judging, no tedious searches after knowledge; no ill-natured ridicule, no trifling, no impertinence; no pride, nor jealousy, nor envy."

Amidst the trials, and temptations, and bereavements of this probationary scene of mortality, how consolatory and sustaining the hope, and stimulating the promise of the living oracles of inspired truth, of an admission into that building of God, the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens:

"Where numerous households meet at last,
In one eternal home."

But the unspeakable majesty, the crowning glory, the splendid magnificence of the residence and society of heaven will consist of the presence of JESUS CHRIST, as seated on the throne of everlasting love and universal empire. In this transcendentally overpowering contemplation of heaven, hope, brightens; faith, adores; and charity,-the favorite and radiant guest of a blissful eternity-burns with fresh accessions of divine ardor. As the reward of Redemption, as the trophies of his victory over death and the grave,— as the purchase of his precious and atoning blood, the adopted children of God, sanctified by the gracious influences of the promised Paraclete, will forever stand around the flaming throne of his sovereignty, irradiate in the dazzling effulgence of the ineffable complacency of the Godhead,—in that resplendent pavilion and sacred temple of celestial regality, which an elegant writer has thus represented :- "Whatsoever heaven is higher than all the rest of the heavens; whatsoever sanctuary is holier than all which are called holies; whatsoever place is of greater dignity in all those courts above, into that place did Christ ascend, where in the splendor of his Deity, he was before he took upon himself our humanity.”

But before dismissing our reflections on this august and mysterious subject, we desire with respectful remonstrance, earnest expostulation and Christian sincerity, prompted by the unswerving loyalty of our faith, to address those who seek to cast Christ down from his excellency. Give a negative to the Deity Christ, and discord is instantly introduced amongst the attributes of Jehovah! Reject the Deity of Christ, and the melting tragedy of the sacrificial and ensanguined summit of Calvary becomes a solemn mockery, and dreadful delusion; extorting with a bitterness which no language can portray, the dolorous lamentation and afflictive announcement of apostolic averment, "We are of all men indeed the most miserable." Deprive Christ of his Deity, and instantly the key stone is displaced out of the arch of salvation which tumbles into inevitable ruin and irrecoverable destruction! If Christ be not divine, then Heaven is annihilated, and creation also deprived of her Maker and Lord, Benefactor and Upholder! The denial of the Deity of Christ involves the awful and petrifying alternative of making God a liar, and violating, by a forbidden idolatry, the second commandment of the decalogue, which was received by the disposition of angels, amidst the blackness and darkness, the thunder and lightnings of the august and terrific scenery enacted upon the smoking summit of the trembling mount of Sinai.*

For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one. If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater; for this is the witness of God which he hath testified of his Son. He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself; he that believeth not God hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son. 1 John v. 7, 9, 10.

TRADITIONARY AND DELINEATIVE.

The Talmudists appear to have regarded, in the theory of their legends, the garden of Eden as an intermediate state, in the light of a residence for the souls of the righteous immediately after death; and also adopted the belief that the bodies of Enoch, Elias, and St. John the Evangelist were translated thither, in order that they might not undergo the process of death and decomposition; and that they will remain there until the end of the world;-making the dimensions of Paradise one hundred and sixty times larger than the terrestrial globe, stating that Paradise and hell were among the seven things which God created before the formation of the material universe.

The Jews retain a tradition that Moses their leader having ascended to Heaven to intercede before God on their behalf, he received from the hands of Jehovah the two tables of stones, carved from the sapphire of the throne of his preciousness, and during his stay there, when Jah gave to him the law and commandments, the wicked of that generation arose and made a golden calf. When Moses returned, bearing the two tables, learning the offences of the people, his hands became heavy, and they fell from him, and were broken. After this serious catastrophe Moses re-ascended to propitiate Jah, on account of the rebellious wickedness of the children of Israel; Rabbinical writers affirming that in his second entrance into heaven, Moses having prayed for the people, and propitiated the displeasure of Jah, received the revelation of the institutions of divine worship, and also heard the dreadful voice of the holy and blessed God.

St. Athanasius poetically described the spicy gales which breathe over the Indian seas, to have come from the neighborhood of Paradise, which God planted in the East; whilst Origen resolved the second chapter of Genesis altogether into an allegory, referring Paradise to the third heaven; transforming the trees into angelic virtues, and its rivers into waters above the firmament. St Augustine also composed a hymn entitled de Gloria Paradisi, glowingly descriptive of the loveliness and luxuriant fruitfulness of the gardens designed and prepared for the blest.

Some suppose Eden to have been the earth in miniature, and to have contained specimens of all natural productions, as they appeared, without blemish, in an unfallen world, in the utmost profusion.

The North American Indians believe that beyond the most distant mountains of their country, there is a great river, and beyond that river a vast territory, and on the other side of that region a world of water, and in that water a thousand islands, abounding with fruitful trees, and transparent streams, and that a thousand buffaloes and ten thousand deer graze on the grassy hills and ruminate in the verdant valleys, and that when they die the Great Spirit will conduct them to this happy and distant land of souls.

No man, it is presumed, ever read the history of our first parents contained in the second chapter of Genesis, without being deeply interested in their state as well as their character. The Paradise allotted to them as their proper residence, has, in a high degree, engaged the attention, and awakened the delight of every reader. Its majestic trees laden with luscious fruits, its fields arrayed in verdure and adorned with variegated flowers, the life which breathed in its fragrant winds and flowed in its crystal rivers, the serenity of its sky, and the splendor of its sunshine, together with the immortality which gilded and burnished all its beauteous landscapes and enchanting scenery, have filled the heart with rapture, and awakened the most romantic visions of the imagination. The poets of the West, and still more those of the East, have, down to the present hour, kindled at the thought of this exhibition of perfection and profusion, production and perfume; and the very name of Eden has met the eye as a gem, in the verse which it adorned. Nay, it has been transferred by God himself to the world of glory, and become one of the appropriate and favorite designations of Heaven, in reference to the attainment of salvation, as the noblest and all-satisfying recompense of reward to the faithful adherents of Christianity. To him that overcometh, saith our Saviour, I will give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the Paradise of God.

The pagans, as well as the ancient philosophers, entertained a strange variety of opinions respecting the locality and constitution of the heavens or firmament, and the occupations of its multitudinous inhabitants. In ancient astronomy, the ethereal heavens were represented as an orb, or a circular region, in which the number of the heavens varied according to the different or apparently independent motions of the celestial bodies. Other philosophers make their enumeration to correspond with that of the seven planets. The region of the fixed stars was denominated the stellar firmament. Ptolemy included in his system nine heavens, to which Alphonso, king of Castile, added a tenth or crystalline heaven, to remedy some irregularity in his astronomical theory, and over which was drawn the empyreal heaven, which was appropriated as the particular residence of Deity. Others, again, admitted into their hypotheses a large plurality of heavens. Eudoxus specifies twenty, Callipus thirty, Regiomontanus thirty-three, Aristotle forty-seven, and Francastor seventy.

Amongst the heathens, heaven was considered as the special residence of their gods, into which no mortals were admitted, after death, unless they were accounted worthy of deification, whilst the souls of good men were assigned to the Elysian fields.

In modern astronomy the term heaven is employed to denote the ethereal expanse in which the stars, planets, comets, &c., are disposed, and called by Moses the firmament, recorded as the work of the second day's creation; whilst recent scientific discoveries have ascertained more correctly the laws which regulate the planetary motions of the solar system, and accordingly exploded the errors of ancient and numerous theories. Plato gives a description of heaven, bearing so close a resemblance to the magnificent representations of Isaiah and St. John, that Eusebius charges the philosopher with plagiary.

DESCRIPTION OF PLATE.-The plate is designed to represent the scriptural residence of angels. In the centre is an hieroglyphic of the Trinity, on each side of which is presented an emblematic figure of the second and third Persons of the Godhead, encircled by adoring angels and worshipping saints, as described by Saint John the apostle :-" And round about the throne were four and twenty seats; and upon the seats I saw four and twenty elders sitting, clothed in white raiment, and they had on their heads crowns of gold. The four and twenty elders fall down before Him that sat upon the throne, and worship him that liveth for ever and ever, and cast their crowns before the throne, saying, Thou art worthy to receive glory and honor and power; for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created." Rev. xiv. 4, 10, 11.

"Princes to his imperial Name,
Bend their bright sceptres down;
Dominions, Thrones, and Powers rejoice,
To see Him wear the crown.
"Archangels sound his lofty praise
Through every heavenly street;
And lay their highest honors down,
Submissive at his feet."-WATTS.

And swell his praise with golden harps,
Attuned to songs divine."-Gregg.

TO NEW EMPLOYMENTS AND PURSUITS.

We have now reached and cheerfully ascend the Pisgah of our interesting and important subject, from whose elevated and sequestered summit, with the eye of our faith undimmed, and the force of our hopes unabated, we are vouchsafed a goodly and animating prospect of that heavenly Canaan which we anticipate, when it shall please the Lord God to speak to us in the summons of death, and withdraw us from the turmoil, vocations, and entanglements of the devious windings of our passage through this wilderness world, being called to worship Him in the eternal rest and unfading beatitude of the promised city and glorious temple of the celestial Jerusalem.

Before we proceed further, however, it may be expedient to advert to the objection which has been mooted, of the improbability of the continued agency and ministrations of angels, because of their non-appearance, in visible forms, since the days of the apostles, and to which objection it is deemed only requisite to reply, that the canon of Scripture being closed, and the last dispensation of Divine purpose having been ushered in by those signs and wonders, instrumentalities and manifestations, whose miraculous interventions were needed to establish the divine origin and permanent continuance of the economy and institution of Christianity-until the "consummation of all things," according to fulfilled, as well as unfulfilled prophecies,—are now withdrawn, as not requiring any additional confirmation of their truth and binding obligations. "To the law and to the testimony, if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." Isaiah viii. 10. If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead. Luke xvi. 31.

During the patriarchal, Mosaic, and prophetical dispensations, Jehovah was pleased to manifest his will, and foreshow his gracious purposes, and foretell his threatened judgments by instructive dreams, informing visions, audible voices, and the apparition of angelic messengers, to awaken the attention, excite the obedience, and confirm the faith of those who put their trust in Him, in relation to the procedures of his providence, and the promises of Almighty grace, during the dawning periods of Christianity, prefigured in the types and shadows of the Aaronic priesthood, until their complete accomplishment in the meridian glory of the present and final economy of divine purpose in the Revelation of Christ Jesus, the Great Antitype, who hath brought life and immortality to light by the gospel; and, therefore, we conclude, that with the age of miracles, the supernatural interposition of the visible appearance of angels is withdrawn, as unnecessary, and contrary to the wisdom of God, in the superfluous exhibition of miraculous operation and confirmatory evidence, beyond the necessities of human reason and the requisite apprehensions of an acquiescent faith.*

No less futile is the suggestion, that the doctrine of angelic ministration is of too speculative a character to produce sufficiently edifying results. The eternal love of God and the blessings of free grace,-the inscrutable decree of the sovereignty of a special and divine election,—justification by faith, together with our adoption as the children of God-the mediation and intercession of Christ, the joys of heaven, and the sanctifying influences of the Holy Ghost—as the essential doctrines of an orthodox Christianity, are not a whit less speculative, as regards the tendency of their practical effects, and especially designed to promote a life of holiness, and a preparation for the worship and employments of the heavenly state.

By such a process of intangible objections, it is evident that we should be deprived of the very vitalities and principles of an evangelical faith, rendering our hopes nothing better than a fleeting shadow, instead of an invaluable substance, a lifeless skeleton, instead of an animated body.

Various have been the opinions of expositors as to the time when the angels commenced their ministrations on this earth; some supposing, that they are exercised as soon as we are quickened into existence, in the womb, founded on the following passages.-Psalm cxxxix. 14-16; Luke i. 41. Others, at the time of birth, of baptism or regeneration. Every supposable case of danger to which infancy and childhood are liable, angels are supposed to watch and provide a suitable protection. The imprudences of mothers, the carelessness of nurses, the generally unguarded and hazardous circumstances to which the young from the earliest dawn of existence are exposed, receive the especial notice and provision of these celestial and benevolent intelligences, as their guardian angels.*

body, and after they are grown to maturity, teach and govern them.

The ancient philosophers, as well as some modern commentators, believe that every individual has appointed unto him a guardian angel that attends upon his welfare through all the different stages of this mortal life; whilst in the Scriptures we find mention of several instances in which angels were sent by divine commission to instruct and protect the favorites of God's special regard, or to act as the executioners of the divine displeasure against all ungodliness of men, or to make known his purposes respecting the dispensations of his mercy to mankind. It was through the instrumentality of an angel that the prediction was given to Hagar respecting the future character and prosperity of Ishmael. The angel Gabriel informed Daniel of a variety of events which would befall the Jewish nation; and also visited with divine messages and announcements, Zacharias, and the Virgin Mary. They were angels that were entertained by the hospitable and venerable patriarch, and who communicated to Abraham the will and gracious purposes of Jehovah respecting the birth of Isaac, and the wonderful events which were to happen to the nations who were to spring from him. Throughout the extraordinary and eventful periods of his pilgrimage, angels constantly appeared to the patriarch Jacob, and conveyed to him counsel, and ministered to his behalf, and that of his family. Angels rescued Lot and his daughters from the destruction of Sodom. An angel of the Lord attended the Israelites during their journeyings in the wilderness; and the moral law was received by the disposition of angels on Mount Sinai.

Joshua, the successor of Moses, was encouraged by the appearance of an angel in the martial character of the captain of the host of the Lord, whilst he was meditating an attack on the city of Jericho (Joshua v. 13, 14); but who, however, by most commentators, has been considered as the Angel-Jehovah. An angel appeared to the valorous Gideon, bidding him deliver the Israelites out of the hands of the Midianites-whilst a mighty angel destroyed in one night an hundred fourscore and five thousand of the veterans of the army of Sennacherib.*

In the New Testament the employments of angels on behalf of those who are chosen of God, by the redemption which is in Christ Jesus, are rendered prominently conspicuous. Are they not all ministering spirits," says St. Paul, "sent forth to minister for them who shall be the heirs of salvation ?" In this passage we are obviously taught, that ministering to the saints, without any distinction or exception of rank or station, is a permanent employment of angels. They conducted Joseph and Mary to Egypt, Philip to the eunuch, and Cornelius to St. Peter, who obtained from the apostle a knowledge of the Gospel, to the salvation of himself, his family, and his friends. They also comforted the apostle and his companions after the resurrection, Paul, immediately before his shipwreck, and the church of Christ universally. Often when the child of affliction are murmuring under the disciplinary dispens tions of God's Providence and Grace, some ministeri angel is on the wing, bearing the succor they require, t comfort they need, and putting to the blush the language their unbelieving hearts.†

One particular employment of angels is to attend the beds of dying saints, and sustain them by the consolations and hopes of faith, preparatory to their entrance on the joys and fruition of heaven. In a peculiar sense, during their trials, temptations, sufferings, and on the eve of their departure from this world of tribulation and woe,

Conjecturally, some special office is assigned to each one of the heavenly host. One indeed may superintend the affairs and prosperity of a kingdom, while another watches the slumbering babe in a cottage cradle,-others are appointed to meet the several necessities of the adopted children of God who are constantly assailed by the opposition of Satan and his angels; thereby hindering their growth in Christian graces, and their advancement in the way of holiness and heaven. ing the souls of the just to the paradise of God, and severing the wicked from the good at the day of judgment.

One of the most solemn and affecting exhibitions of angelic ministration is presented in the dolorous narratives of the Evangelists, which relate the descent of angels to relieve our Savior in the wilderness of Satanic temptation, and during his agony in the garden of Gethsemane. What a mysterious, solemn, and wonderful mission for holy angels to perform, in rendering such services and homage to Him who was the Lord of Angels.

The "innumerable company of angels,"--of the glorious host dispersed throughout the illimitable universe, is clearly intimated by the apostle as beyond all the computation of mortal arithmetic, nevertheless, several references in Scripture will somewhat aid our conceptions in this particular. To Jacob, at Bethel they appeared on the mystic ladder, ascending and descending, in multitudes; and when he returned from Padan-aram, "the angels of the Lord met him," and he called the place "Mahanaim," or the two hosts. They are represented by the Psalmist as constituting many hosts,-Psalm ciii. 21; cxlvii. 2. Micaiah, the prophet, "saw the Lord sitting upon his throne, and all the hosts of heaven standing by him, on his right hand and on his left."-1 Kings xxii. 19. "The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels."—Psalm lxviii. 17. Elisha's servant, when "the Lord opened his eyes and he saw; and behold the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha."-2 Kings vi. 17. Daniel beheld in the vision of God," thousand thousands minister unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stand before him."-Dan. vii. 10. St. John, "I beheld, and I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne, and the number of

Respecting the pursuits of angels in the heavenly state, we can form but a very inadequate conception, in the present life, and must await our arrival in those bright and blessed mansions which Christ has prepared for them that love Him. But from the declarations of Scripture we know that they are deeply occupied in investigating, with intense earnestness, the astonishing developments of the Divine Majesty in the works of creation and providence, and the wondrous economy of grace and salvation. In the celestial temple angels are engaged in the most exalted services, contemplating the perfection, and celebrating the praises of the Great Eternal.

To such ennobling and glorious pursuits who would not aspire, and devoutly prepare with a moral and spiritual meetness, to join the resounding trisagion of the celestial hierarchy.

Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, which is, and is to come. Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, honor, and power, for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created.

TRADITIONARY AND ANECDOTICAL.

The Talmudical traditions and Rabbinical writings, with their characteristic fecundity, abound with singular fictions respecting the guardianship and employment of angels ;-the Jews indulging the vain conceit that the appearance of angels, and their ministrations by the commission of God, were only manifested

* Some of the fathers, with the view of representing the number of the angels compared with mankind, refer to the parable of the ninety-nine sheep left by the shepherd on the mountains, while he went in search of the strayed one, meaning apostate humanity.

in Judea. Regarding the presidency of angels, the Rabbinical writers give the following statement, over the seventy nations into which they say the human family was divided at the confusion and subsequent dispersion of Babel.

"The Lord said to the seventy angels which stood before him, come now, and let us go down, and there let us confound their language, so that a man may not understand the language of his companion. And the word of the Lord was discovered against that city, and with it the seventy nations,—and their respective languages, which each angel respectively wrote with his hand." Another says, "The earth consisted of seven climates, and every climate divided into ten parts. Then was each country and people assigned to its respective prince, and these princes are called gods of the world. Thus were the seventy nations divided amongst the seventy princes; the blessed God taking no part in them, because He is pure. One rabbi assigns to these angels the function of "moving the heavenly bodies; another affirms them to be "the souls of the heavenly bodies;" and another asserts them to be no other than the "stars and planets." Among some of the employments of angels, the rabbies say, that the ark had no rudder, and was steered and guided by them; and that God used their services in calling together "every living thing of all flesh, cattle, and creeping things of all sorts," when God commanded Noah to assemble them for embarkation.

Guardian angels, according to the notions of the Jewish rabbins, perform very important services in favor of men. They say, "Every man has his angel who speaks for him, and prays for him; as it is said (Psalm lxv. 2), "O Thou that hearest prayer;" that is, the prayer of the angel, who is the Mashal or guardian of men. It follows, "Unto thee shall all flesh come." Wherefore, the angels are not allowed to say their hymns above, till the Israelites have said them here below; for all that a man does is imitated by his Mashal, who performs it above, in the same manner in which it is performed here below. A man should never ask his necessaries of God in the Syriac or Chaldaic language. The ministering angels do not attend, to carry any one's prayers before God, who petitions for his necessaries in the Syriac language. This is meant of one single man who prays for himself; by a whole congregation it may be done in all languages, because the presence of God is amongst them.

There are three who weave or make garlands out of the prayers of the Israelites; the first is Achtariel, the second Metraton, and the third Sandalphon. Behold! these three, who make garlands, do not attempt to make garlands of any other prayers; but only of such as are made in the Hebrew tongue.

The rabbies represent the removal of men from the present life as effected by the instrumentality of angels, whom they denominate angels of death. The execution of the mortal sentence, on those who die in the land of Israel is assigned to Gabriel, whom they style an angel of mercy; and those who die in other countries are dispatched by the hand of Samnael, the prince of demons." These two are deputies of Metraton, to whom God daily makes known those who are appointed to die. These deputies do not themselves bring away any souls out of the world; but each of them employs some of his host for that purpose.

The Jewish cabalists single out some particular angels as preceptors to the patriarchs;—to Adam was given Raziel,—to Abraham, Zidekiel,—to Moses, Metraton,—to Elias, Malashiel, -and to David, Gerviel, &c.

Amongst the chief spirits of the Mahometan heaven, such as Gabriel, the angel of revelation,-Israfil, by whom the last trumpet is to be sounded,-and Azrael, the angel of death, there were also a number of subaltern intelligences, appointed to preside over the different stages or ascents into which the celestial world was divided. Thus Kelail governs the fifth heaven, while Sadiel, the presiding spirit of the third, is employed in steadying the motions of the earth, which would be in a constant state of agitation if this angel did not keep his foot planted upon its orb.

Amongst other miraculous interpositions in favor of Mahomet, recorded in the Alcoran, was the appearance of five thousand angels on his side, at the battle of Bedr.

The Grecian academies entertained the belief that spirits behold all the actions of men, and rendered them assistance accordingly. That they, moreover, are acquainted with all our apprehensions, cogitations, and circumstances; and when the soul is delivered from the body, they bring it before the high Judge. That then they are questioned about our good or bad actions, their testimony being much prevalent either to exonerate or aggravate our doom. Porphirius asserts that many spirits or genii have the charge and custody of every man; one having a care of his health-another indulgent over his beauty and features-and another to infuse into him courage and constancy.

The ancient Persians supposed that Ormund appointed thirty angels to preside successively over the days of the month; and twelve greater ones to assume the government of the months, themselves; among whom Bahman (to whom Ormund committed the custody of all animals, except man) was the greatest Mihr. The angel of the seventh month was the spirit which watched over the affairs of friendship and love. Chur had the care of the disk of the sun. Mah was agent for the concerns of the moon. Isphandarmaz was the tutelar genius of good and virtuous women. The Persians, also, had a certain office or prayer for every day of the month, addressed to the particular angel who presided over it, and whom they called Sizouzé.

The subjoined anecdotes are chiefly extracted from Isaac Ambrose's Discourses on the Communion and Ministry of Angels; respecting whom, in a biographical sketch, the following particulars are given :-He was a native of Lancashire, England, and descended from a highly respectable family. In 1621 he matriculated in Brazen-nose College, of the University of Oxford, and took the degree of bachelor of arts. In consequence of some difference of opinion and the laxity of morals, which then prevailed, he seceded from the Church of England, though he invariably retained her form of episcopal worship against the remonstrances of the Independents, with whom he had ecclesiastically connected himself. Having notified to his friends, a few days preceding the time of his death, he was found dead in his chair, in his study, having that morning sent to the printer the last page of his work on Angels. "His character may be comprised in a few expressions. He was holy in life, happy in his death, favored of God, and held in high estimation by all good men. His writings, like those of Baxter, have a vigorous pulse beating in every page, and it would be difficult to select a paragraph in which the author does not appear in earnest for the salvation of his readers. He was one of those excellent divines who distinguished and adorned the turbulent age in which he lived, amidst those ecclesiastical troubles for which it was remarkable; and who, in their combined influences, irradiated the moral gloom which then overspread the land; and it is to their indefatigable exertions that we are indebted for many of the religious blessings which we now enjoy. He was a star of no common magnitude and effulgence in that bright constellation of worthies, who have enriched the world by their writings, bequeathing a noble example to posterity, of whom, indeed, the world was not worthy."

God does, by his angels, preserve and keep good ministers from the hands of their persecutors, as is reported by great divines of unquestionable credit, in the following instance :-" One Grynæus, a German divine, a learned and holy man, coming from Heidelberg to Spire, and going to hear a certain preacher in that city, that did then let fall some erroneous propositions of Popish doctrine, was thereat greatly offended, and presently went to the preacher, exhorting him to abandon his error; the preacher seemed to take it well, and pretended to be desirous of some further discourse with him, and so they parted. Grynæus going to his lodging, reports the passages of the late conference to those that sat at table with him, amongst whom Melancthon was one; he was called out of the room to speak with a stranger newly come into the house, and going forth he finds a grave old man of a goodly countenance, seemly and richly attired, who, in a friendly and grave manner tells him that within one hour there would come to their inn certain officers to apprehend Grynæus, and to carry him to prison, willing him to charge Grynæus with all possible speed to fly, and requiring Melancthon to see that this advantage was not neglected. Instantly Melancthon returned to the company, related the words of this strange monitor, and hasted Grynæus away, who had no sooner taken boat but he was eagerly sought for at his said lodging. No doubt this was an angel which God had sent to deliver this goodly minister from persecution.

Another worthy minister who was sought after by his persecutors, crept into a dark hole in the house, to hide himself, and as soon as he was got in, a spider drew a web over the mouth of the hole. When the searchers came, one of them would have looked in there for the man, where, indeed he was, but the other observing that there was a spider's web over the hole, concluded he could not be there, and therefore they ceased their search. What an artifice of the good man's angel-guardian was this to preserve him? Though persecutors are crafty and cruel, yet our keepers are more cunning than they, and can out-wit them.

Mr. Hawks being burnt to death, was desired by his friends to give them (if he could) some sign, by lifting up his hand, if he found his pains such as were tolerable, and might be borne with patience, and he did so; when his speech was gone, his body burning, and he thought to be dead, he lifted up his hands over his head, all on fire, and clapt them thrice together, which caused a great shout amongst his friends.

Mr. James Bingham, when the flames had half consumed him, cried out in the fire: "O ye papists! ye look for miracles; here now ye may see a miracle; for in this fire I feel no more pain than if I were, on a bed of roses!" If angels could keep Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego in the fiery furnace without any hurt, why might they not keep this holy martyr in the flames without pain, though he died in them? He is a very uncharitable wretch that will not believe he found as he spake. 'Tis, I confess, a wonderful instance, that 'tis usual for God to indulge his martyrs more than ordinary support in fiery trials."

Mr. Holland, the day before his death, on a sudden, while one was reading, said, "O stay your reading. What brightness is this I see? It is my Savior's shine. Now farewell world, welcome Heaven. The day-star from on high has visited my heart." And then turning to the minister who preached his funeral sermon, he said, "I desire you speak this for me, that God deals familiarly with man; I feel his mercy, I see his majesty, whether in the body or out of the body, I cannot tell, God he knoweth ; but I see things that are unutterable."

Many have told the very day and hour of their departure; and, says Bishop Hall, these revelations and ecstacies whence are they? If a man without all observation of physical criticism, shall receive, and give intelligence many days before, what day and hour shall be his last, what cause can we attribute this to but our attending angels? And when joy arises not to such an overflowing height, yet does it frequently begin our heaven on earth, and the fears of death are fully vanquished, and the good man can see it, and feel it coming without any regret.

Angels are with the saints in the very minute of dying, taking away the terribleness of it. There is an aversion in nature to death; but, says Mr. Ambrose, the body's passage through the grave, though it be dark and dismal, yet it is safe and secure.

The grave is but a sleeping-place (they shall rest in their beds), and their soul's angels guard safe to heaven, and thus minister to the saints in death.

"Oh would God, ye saw what I see (said Mrs. Stubbs, on her death bed). Behold, I see infinite millions of angels stand about me, with fiery chariots to defend me, these are appointed of God to carry my soul unto the kingdom of heaven.”

Immediately after the separation of the soul from the body, the angels receive it, and carry it to heaven. They are a convoy for the departing souls of the godly, to bring them to their felicity, though how they do it we cannot understand. They keep them company at least, and they are a guard to them as they pass through the Devil's territories; for the Devil is called the Prince of the power of the air. He, with all his hellish crew, are the inhabitants of that region, and souls in their journey to heaven must pass through the air, and the angels wait upon them as a convoy.

The Devil drags the souls of wicked men to hell, when they die; and angels conduct the souls of good men to heaven. Such honor have all the saints. The poorest and meanest of them will be thus royally attended. Lazarus was a beggar, and he went in state to heaven.

DESCRIPTION OF PLATES.-Plate 1.-The guardian angel, attracted by the simplicity and innocency of childhood, presses his charge close to his side, with his arm around her neck; whilst the child, with a natural and confiding fondness, leans against him. With a dignified and benignant countenance, the angel extends his arm in the attitude of protection, as if warding off approaching danger. Plate 2.-Represents the angelic hosts celebrating the completion of the finished work of creation, “When the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy?"-Job xxxviii. 7. Plate 3.-Represents the final employment of angels in this world, on the arrival of the resurrection morn and the judgment day. Christ "on the throne of his glory," attended by holy angels. On one side is the recording angel, opening the book of life, in which are enrolled the names of the "heirs of salvation." In the space between the judgment seat, and those arising out of their graves, the archangel is sounding the trumpet which summons the assembling universe.

MORAL AND CONCLUSION.

Verbum Domini manet in eternum.

All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness.-2 Tim. iii. 16.

UPON the opening of our divine and delightful subject, we intimated the intention of furnishing a synopsis of some of the confirmatory proofs, and illustrative facts demonstrative and recommendatory of the authenticity, antiquity, literature and inspiration of the Scriptures, to be received as the unimpeachable standard of faith and practice, requiring the entire dissociation of all negative assertions and mental reserves or suppositions, originating either in the unhallowed pride of the human intellect or the Pharaoh-like reluctance of the heart to yield an implicit obedience or acquiescent submission to the authority and precepts, the truths and doctrines contained in Holy Writ.*

* The mass of evidence in favor of the divine inspiration of the Bible is

From the days of the apostles, (when the philosophizing Greeks arrogated to themselves the pompous title of Zopo and p2ooooo, wise men and philosophers,) to the present period, this state of mind and disposition have been the principal source from which have arisen all those heresies which have disfigured the benevolent character and perverted the gracious designs of Christianity, producing the most horrible persecutions, to all that superadded variety of evil in religion, morals and society, engendered by the violence of a sanguinary discord, the pretensions of a pseudo-philosophy, and the blasphemous negations of a presumptuous infidelity, whose name, indeed, is Legion.

Even those who have professed to have received the revelation of the Bible, too frequently employ themselves in endeavoring to help out other systems and formula of beliefs, for which no sanction can be shown, in the obvious bearing and spirit of the Sacred Scriptures, under the disguise of new constructions, rejection of alleged interpolated passages, allegorical explanation of inferences of a directly antagonistical tendency; and for which conduct nothing can be more irrational, inconsistent and injurious to the reception and utility of the Scriptures than to profess to accept them as a divine Revelation, and at the same time to constitute human opinion as the standard by which their declarations are to be tested; virtually invoking the awful consequences of sitting in judgment upon Deity, (who is the acknowledged author of them,) and to determine whether He has declared truth or spoken falsehood! Verily! must not angels wonder to see frail and fallen humanity thus engaged?

As corroborative of the importance and doctrine of the subject which we have discussed, and now deferentially sub-

too great to be set aside by anything short of scientific demonstration. Were the Scriptures to teach that the whole is not equal to its parts, the mind could not, indeed, believe it. But if it taught a truth which was only contrary to the probable deductions of science, science, I say, must yield to the Scriptures; for it would be more reasonable to doubt the probabilities of a single science, than the various and most satisfactory evidence on which revelation rests. I do not believe that the probabilities of any science are in collision with Scripture. But the supposition is made to show how strong are my convictions of the evidence and paramount importance of the Bible.

mit to the candid and serious consideration of the Christian, as well as the philosophic and general reader, we offer the following appropriate and conciliatory remarks of President Dwight :-" In the Scriptures we find an order, or rather a kind of beings described, which were never known, nor imagined by any person who did not derive his acquaintance with them from that book. They are beings who have a character as appropriate as that of man, as far, as finite intelligences can be supposed to differ from each other. Yet the character is complete, entire, and of a piece with itself. Every attribute is suited to every other; all are angelic; all are heavenly. A station is also assigned to them, of a dignity and importance, perfectly fitted to their character, and worthy of being filled by such beings. Employments are also marked out for them, altogether becoming both the station and the character; angelic employments-suited to the Sons of God, the Morning Stars of Heaven. Can it be reasonably supposed that these things were devised by human imagination? Have similar things been ever thus devised? The fancy of man has, in all nations and ages, delighted itself with the employment of fashioning imaginary beings, of a nature superior to ours. What have been its productions? The gods, demons, and genii of ancient, and the elves, sylphs, and fairies of modern times. But how do all these shrink from a comparison with angels? They are little, base, trifling, sordid, and sinful enough to have been copied with a few easy additions from the characteristics of men. But where does this world furnish materials for the composition of an angelical character? What originals has it presented, from which the portrait could be drawn?*

A multitude of writers in the Scriptures, fifteen at least, have described these glorious beings with the most perfect harmony, and without a single discordant idea. In the mean time their descriptions are extensively various, comprising many particulars, and wholly independent of each other. All the writers are in this respect, as well as others, originals. Not one is a copier; not one a plagiary; yet their representations are universally noble, sublime, dignified, beautiful and lovely, beyond anything found in the most perfect writings of uninspired men. To which may be added a similar testimony to the authority of the Bible, from the eccentric, erudite and ironical Gale, in his preface to the "Court of the Gentiles." "But such was the infinite benignity and condescension of sovereign light and love, as that he vouchsafed to irradiate a spot of the lapsed world, even of his holy land and elect seed, with fresh and glorious rays of the light and life conveyed in and by the sacred Revelation. And oh! how bright, how ravishing were those heavens of divine light which shone on Judea? Were not all the adjacent parts illuminated thereby? Yea, did not Greece itself (esteemed the eye of the world) light her candle at this sacred fire? Were not all the Grecian schools hung with philosophic ornaments, or contemplations stolen out of the Judaic wardrobe? Were not Pythagoras's college, Plato's academy, Aristotle's peripatum, Zeno's stoa, and Epicurus's garden all watered by rivulets, though in themselves corrupt, originally derived from the sacred streams of Siloam? Whence had Phenicia, Egypt, Chaldea, Persia, with our occidental parts, their barbaric philosophy, but from the sacred emanations of Zion ?"

Our design in favor of the positive, prophetic, and miraculous evidence of the Inspiration of the Holy Bible, is so ably set forth by Dr. Townsend (whose classical learning and sincere Christianity no man will attempt to question), in the annexed statement, that we make no apology for its insertion or length, assured of the pleasure which its perusal will afford the reader, and his approbation accordingly.

From the period of the dispersion of the Jews among the Egyptians and Babylonians, we find that the Greeks began to have more exalted and refined ideas of a Deity; and that they applied themselves more particularly to that philosophy and literature, which contributed so eminently to raise them to the highest intellectual rank among ancient or modern nations. All the sects and schools of philosophy, in ancient Greece, originated from the Ionic and Italic sects. The Ionic sect was founded by Thales, the Italic by Pythagoras.

Thales was born about the year 640 before Christ, and is remarkable for being the first Grecian who taught a regular system of philosophy, and left a succession of disciples to establish and maintain it. He traveled into Egypt when he was a young man, and resided there several years. If he went into that country when at the age of twenty or twenty-five, and resided there ten or more years (and this period was not beyond that which was usually passed by the students in Egyptian learning), he would have been in Egypt when Jehoahaz, king of Judah, was brought there as a prisoner by Pharaoh Necho. The attention of the curious Greek must have been attracted by the various captives, strangers thus introduced into Egypt; and while he improved himself in those sciences in which the Egyptians excelled, it is highly probable that from conversing with these Jewish captives, he acquired some of those great and truly philosophical notions which he afterwards taught at his native Miletus, and in Greece.

* If then, we find a book which professes to be a revelation from heaven, a system of moral laws which can clearly be shown to be the basis of the moral order of the universe, and which are calculated to secure the eternal happiness of all intellectual beings, it forms a strong presumptive proof, if not an unanswerable argument, that the contents of that book are of celestial origin, and were dictated by Him who gave birth to the whole system of created beings;-a moral demonstration that a power and intelligence superior to the human mind, must have suggested such sublime conceptions and such astonishing ideas, since there are no such prototypes to be found within the range of the human understanding.-DR. DICK, Philosophy of Religion.

The chief of these opinions were, that the world was not eternal, but was made by God the Spirit, out of water, an opinion which seems to have been derived from the Mosaic and Christian doctrine," the Spirit of God moved on the face of the waters;" that the world being God's workmanship, was exceedingly good and perfect; that the universe was filled with invisible spirits, who inspect the actions of men.

Thales was the first of the Greeks who made any philosophical inquiries into the nature and perfections of God; for though, as Gale remarks, Orpheus, Linus, Homer, and Hesiod, had some traditions of God, their value was obscured by a mixture with pagan fables. Thales however delivered his knowledge concerning God in a more plain and simple manner. He first maintained amongst the Greeks that God was the most ancient of beings; and are evidently derived from purer sources than from invented traditions or speculative heathen philosophy. From the Jews alone, therefore, with whom Thales became acquainted in Egypt, could he have received those ideas of God and his Providence, which shine like a meteor through the dark mist of the ignorance and blindness of that superstitious age.

Thales was succeeded by Anaximander, Anaximines, and Anaxagoras, the friend and tutor of Pericles; by Diogenes Apolloniates, and by Archelaus the instructor of Socrates. The various sects which are referred to the Ionic school, are the Socratic, founded by Socrates, among whose disciples and followers are Xenophon, Plato, Euclid, and Alcibiades; the Cyrenaic sect, founded by Aristippus; the Megaric, established by Euclid at Megara; the Eretriac or Elïac school, instituted by Phædo at Elis; the Academic, founded by Plato, whose school, after his death, was divided into the old, middle, and new academies; the Peripatetic, founded by Aristotle; the Cynic, by Antisthenes; the Stoic, by Zeno. These sects continued till the time of Christ; and when St. Paul visited Athens, he found the Greeks still engaged in disputes, and inquiries into the mysteries and difficulties of philosophy. Although the purest and most refined speculations of the best and most celebrated of these philosophers fall far short of the principles and morality inculcated by the Christian dispensation, they still served to advance the progress of Christianity, or rather they tended to diminish the superstitious reverence paid to the pagan deities. The commonest people became at least sensible that their philosophers only adhered to the religious ceremonies of the established superstition, from mere compliance with popular custom; and the reflecting part of the community were divided, in a state of doubt and uncertainty: Socrates, in particular, declared that a teacher from heaven was necessary to impart instruction to mankind.

Moral philosophy may be considered as a light to the dark and ignorant age in which it flourished; but when compared with Christianity, it is little less than the very darkness it so partially illuminated. Philosophy, at the height of its splendor, displayed only the corruption, the folly, and the degradation of the human mind when deprived of revelation. It was like the taper in a charnel house at midnight, which disperses the darkness of the tomb, and shows to the sickening spectator how melancholy is the sight of humanity, when bereaved of life and spirit.

Though the accounts of Pythagoras are mingled with fable there is abundant authority to induce us to believe that this philosopher conversed likewise with the Jews of the dispersion, at Tyre, in Phoenicia, and probably at Mount Carmel, where it is said his walk was long shown. It is certain that he was in Egypt, and many suppose he was taken prisoner into that country either by Nebuchadnezzar, or by Cambyses. From Egypt he either went or was taken to Babylon, where again he must have acquired an intimate knowledge of the Jews; and in this latter place he is said to have had for an instructor Zabratus, or Nazaratus—whom the learned Selden supposes to have been Ezekiel-and Prideaux, Zoroaster. The exact period of the birth of Pythagoras is not certainly known. The accounts of his life, now extant, are uncertain and contradictory; that which appears most probable and satisfactory informs us, that at the age of eighteen he consulted Thales at Miletus, who recommended him to visit Egypt.

From Miletus he proceeded to Tyre (the place of his nativity, though educated at Samos); from thence he travelled to Egypt, with letters to Amasis from Polycrates, tyrant of Samos. He quitted Egypt for Babylon, where he continued twelve years, and conversed with Zabratus or Nazaratus. He is then supposed to have returned to his own country, and to have been at that time about fifty-six years of age.

In the year 563 before Christ, the whole country of Judea was still desolate-not having recovered from its last ravage by Nebuzzaradan. In this year Nebuchadnezzar was restored from his lycanthropy, and the Jews were rising into distinction in the Persian empire. Leaving Judea and its refugees, whom he might have found both at Tyre and Carmel, Pythagoras proceeded to Egypt. He would there meet with many of the Jews who had fled with Jeremiah from Judea, nineteen years preceding. From them, as well as from the natives, he would learn the fulfilment of that prophet's predictions respecting Apries. This and other circumstances exciting his curiosity, he at last visited Babylon, where he is supposed to have arrived in the year 541, and two years before the death of Beltshazzar. During his residence of twelve years in Babylon, Pythagoras must have been a spectator of the wonderful events recorded in the Book of Daniel. The greatest statesman of the day in Babylon was a Jew. As the time and manner of Ezekiel's death are unknown; and as in this year, Ezekiel, if alive, would not be more than fifty-three years of age; it is by no means improbable that he might have conversed, as tradition asserts, with that prophet. Pythagoras must have been informed of the decree of Cyrus, before Christ 536, for the return of the Jews, and he must have been acquainted with prophecies thereby fulfilled; it is not improbable that he was a wondering spectator of their departure for their own lands. At Babylon he undoubtedly saw the school or universities established by the Jews; for he introduced into his own country institutions which were characterized by regulations similar to those adopted by the Jews.

Struck and astonished at all he read or heard or saw of this persecuted and favored people, we cannot be surprised that he should have engrafted many of the purer truths of morality on his system of philosophy.

Pythagoras quitted Babylon in 529, the same year that Cyrus died. It is probable his departure was accelerated by the cruel and tyrannical government of Cambyses, his successor. In this year the Greek philosopher returned home; and dissatisfied with the political state of affairs at Samos, he taught his new system called the Italic philosophy, in the towns of Magara Grecia. The philosophy of Pythagoras, so far as it is known, may be described as a mixture of Persian, Grecian, and Egyptian superstitions, interwoven with Jewish doctrines, institutions, and customs. The numerous coincidences between his enactments and those of the Jews, are found in the similarity of discipline established in his schools and colleges; in his distinction between the perfect or the initiated, and the service the Τεεοs and the νεodutos, or the n and p of the Jews; in the covenant among the members of his colleges, in the use of salt as a sign of union or agreement, as well as some others.

The doctrines of Pythagoras must have tended to remove many of the evils of polytheism and idolatry. He acknowledged but one God, the Creator of the world. He had some idea of the sacred name of the Petragammaton of the Jews, which he revealed as a mystery to his disciples. He described the Deity in the very words of the Hebrew Scriptures, as the *, the To òv, the self-existent. He taught by this definition that God was infinite and eternal; a truth which human reason, unassisted by divine revelation, has never yet discovered. He likewise instructed his disciples in the doctrine of a peculiar providence, particularly over good men-the necessity of pure worship-the immortality of the soul-the incorporeality of the Deity.

His morality evidently sprung from a purer source than from the profane worship of pagan deities; his golden verses (if they are certainly his) are evidently transcripts of the Mosaic precepts; and virtuous will be the life, and tranquil the death of that man who habitually observes the precepts they contain, and thrice reviews the actions of the day, before he resigns himself to rest at night.

The Italic sect flourished till the end of the reign of Alexander. It gave rise to the Eleatic, the Heraclitean, the Epicurean, and the Phyrrhonic sects, whose doctrines, however, differ materially from those enforced by Pythagoras himself. When the best pagan philosophy, considered as a system, is compared with Christianity, the observations already made on the speculations of Thales are equally applicable. But when we consider this philosophy as a virtuous effort of the human mind to penetrate through the darkness and superstition by which it was surrounded; and gaining by these efforts, and the light borrowed from revelation, more pure ideas of morality, and more just notions of a Deity, we are called upon to acknowledge that philosophy was beneficial to man, and that those who acquiesced in the doctrines of Pythagoras, and received the better part of his system, must have been wiser and purer than their more ignorant or prejudiced countrymen. That the Greeks, therefore, were indebted to their intercourse with the Jews for the origin of their philosophy, is highly probable; it is, therefore, no less probable, that their literature may be partly traced to the same source. From the temperance Pythagoras uniformly practised, it is probable that his life was extended to a late period. He is supposed to have perished in consequence of a political disturbance in the seventieth olympiad, about the year 563 before Christ. If this tradition be correct, he must at this time have entered his eighty-third or eighty-fourth year.

Eschylus, the founder of the Greek drama, in its present form, would have been at that time about twenty-five years of age; and though we are not acquainted with the particulars of his early life, we may naturally conclude that one so eminent would have carefully instructed himself in all the philosophy and learning of his age. A Pythagorean in principle, many of his sentiments are the same as those taught in the golden verses of Pythagoras. We very justly conclude, therefore, that the great tragedian was either personally acquainted with, and a disciple of the Samean; or that he was well versed in the system promulgated by that philosopher. Like many of his countrymen he gave offence to the people, by deviating from received opinions. In the mythology of Eschylus, Dr. Gray observes, there is frequent reference to principles originating in revelation.

In the passage cited by Eusebius, he describes the Supreme God as a being who is carefully to be distinguished from mortals, having nothing resembling the body of man. At one time he declares, that God shines forth in unapproachable fire; at another, he invests Him in the elements, appearing in the wind, the thunder, and the lightning! He represents the ocean, the rocks, and the fountains as ministering to the Supreme Being; the hills, and the earth, the depths of the sea, and the summit of the mountains, as trembling at His presence. The piercing eye of God he describes as overlooking all things, for the glory of the highest God is powerful. His celebrated scene in Persia, in which the shade of Darius is summoned by Atossa, is very similar to the account of the appearance of Samuel to Saul, as related in the narrative of the Witch of Endor. Many of the Christian fathers have asserted that the character of "Prometheus" could not have been drawn, unless the author of the drama had been acquainted with the Sacred Writings, or with at least many of the prophetic books, of which it exhibits the most decisive evidence in several of its passages. It is probable that the Sacred Writings were partly made known to him by his tutor, and contemporary, Pythagoras. Similarity of desciption only, with identity of expression, would demonstrate this point; these, it is true, might be mere coincidences; but where the same personifications are used, we may justly conclude, that the resemblance is not accidental. In Jeremiah xlvii. 6, we meet with this bold personification—“O thou sword of the Lord, how long will it be ere thou be quiet? put up thyself into thy scabbard, rest, and be still. How can it be quiet, seeing the Lord hath given it a charge against Ashkelon?" The same metaphor is adopted by Eschylus. Also, "Thus saith the Lord God, I will spread my net over him, and he shall be taken in my snare," and the same expression is employed in other portions of Scripture to describe a state of inextricable difficulty, of distress, or ruin. The same metaphor is applied by Eschylus to describe the destruction of Troy. The tragedian who followed Æschylus, although perhaps inferior to him in sublimity, maintained an exalted nobleness of moral sentiment. A higher tone seems to have been given to the public mind in Greece, which cannot entirely be attributed to their political institutions, or the incessant agitation and restlessness of mind induced by their party dissensions. We must refer this intellectual elevation to a more intellectual source; to the spirit of their philosophy, morality, and poetry, which was partially derived from the purer fountains of the Hebrew Scriptures, and the peculiar object of Providence, in thus communicating to the Greeks, through the dispersion and captivity of the Jews, some knowledge of a purer creed was shown in subsequent ages, when that language was selected to impart the knowledge of the Scriptures to the world. The universality of the Greek language may be attributed to the general interest excited by the Greek Drama, the splendid composition of the poets, and the more exalted speculations of their philosophers. The pagan nations did not, it is true, eat of the fruit of the tree of life, yet they were blessed with some few of its leaves, and the very "leaves of that tree which are for the healing of the nations." Bishop Watson finely and strikingly remarks: "To read the prophecies of Daniel with attention, intelligence and an unbiassed mind, is sufficient to convert an unbeliever from Deism to Christianity." They were declared several hundred years before the birth of Christ; they extend through many ages; and have ever been considered as the foundation of all modern history; revealing the successive rise and fall of the four great monarchies of the world; the establishment of the Messiah's kingdom upon earth; his death and sufferings; and passing from earth to heaven, they terminate only in eternity.

The psalms present every possible variety of Hebrew poetry. They may all, indeed, be termed poems of the lyric kind, that is, adapted to music, but with great variety in the style of composition. Thus some are simply odes, giving a narrative of facts, either of public history or private life, in beautiful and figurative language. Others, again, are ethic or didactic, "delivering great maxims of life, or the precepts of religion, in solemn, but for the most part, simple strains. To this class we may refer the hundred and nineteenth, and other alphabetical psalms, which are so called, because the initial letters of each line or stanza follow the order of the alphabet. Nearly one-seventh part of the psalms are elegiac or pathetic compositions on mournful subjects. Some are enigmatic, delivering the doctrines of religion in enigmatic sentences contrived to strike the imagination forcibly, and yet easy to be understood; while a few may be referred to the class of idyls or short pastoral poems. But the greatest part, according to Bishop Horsley, is a sort of dramatic ode, consisting of dialogues between certain persons sustaining certain characters. In these dialogue psalms, the persons are frequently the Psalmist himself, or the chorus of priests and Levites, or the leaders of the Levitical band, opening the ode with a poem declarative of the subject, and very often closing the whole with a solemn admonition drawn from what the other persons say. The other persons are, Jehovah, sometimes as one, sometimes as another of the three persons; Christ in his incarnate state, sometimes before, sometimes after his resurrection; the human soul of Christ, as distinguished from the divine essence. Christ, in his incarnate state, is personated sometimes as a priest, sometimes as a king, sometimes as a conqueror; and, in those psalms in which he is introduced as a conqueror, the resemblance is very remarkable between this conqueror in the Book of Psalms, and the warrior on the white horse in the Book of Revelations, who goes forth with a crown on his head, and a bow in his hand, conquering and to conquer; and the conquest in the Psalms is followed, like the conquest in the Revelations, by the marriage of the conqueror. These are circumstances of similitude, which, to any one versed in the prophetic style, prove beyond a doubt that the mystical conqueror is the same personage in both.

In praise of the Psalms, all the fathers of the church are unanimously eloquent. Athanasius styles them an epitome of the whole Scriptures; Basil, a compendium of all theology; Luther, a little Bible, and the summary of the Old Testament; and Melancthon, the most elegant writing in the whole world. How highly the Psalter was valued subsequent to the Reformation, we may easily conceive by the very numerous editions of it which were executed in the infancy of printing, and by the number of commentators who have undertaken to illustrate its sacred pages. Carpzor, who wrote a century ago, enumerates

One particular employment of angels is to attend the beds of dying saints, and sustain them by the consolations and hopes of faith, preparatory to their entrance on the joys and fruition of heaven. In a peculiar sense, during their trials, temptations, sufferings, and on the eve of their departure from this world of tribulation and woe,

Conjecturally, some special office is assigned to each one of the heavenly host. One indeed may superintend the affairs and prosperity of a kingdom, while another watches the slumbering babe in a cottage cradle,-others are appointed to meet the several necessities of the adopted children of God who are constantly assailed by the opposition of Satan and his angels; thereby hindering their growth in Christian graces, and their advancement in the way of holiness and heaven. ing the souls of the just to the paradise of God, and severing the wicked from the good at the day of judgment.

One of the most solemn and affecting exhibitions of angelic ministration is presented in the dolorous narratives of the Evangelists, which relate the descent of angels to relieve our Savior in the wilderness of Satanic temptation, and during his agony in the garden of Gethsemane. What a mysterious, solemn, and wonderful mission for holy angels to perform, in rendering such services and homage to Him who was the Lord of Angels.

The "innumerable company of angels,"--of the glorious host dispersed throughout the illimitable universe, is clearly intimated by the apostle as beyond all the computation of mortal arithmetic, nevertheless, several references in Scripture will somewhat aid our conceptions in this particular. To Jacob, at Bethel they appeared on the mystic ladder, ascending and descending, in multitudes; and when he returned from Padan-aram, "the angels of the Lord met him," and he called the place "Mahanaim," or the two hosts. They are represented by the Psalmist as constituting many hosts,-Psalm ciii. 21; cxlvii. 2. Micaiah, the prophet, "saw the Lord sitting upon his throne, and all the hosts of heaven standing by him, on his right hand and on his left."-1 Kings xxii. 19. "The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels."—Psalm lxviii. 17. Elisha's servant, when "the Lord opened his eyes and he saw; and behold the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha."-2 Kings vi. 17. Daniel beheld in the vision of God," thousand thousands minister unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stand before him."-Dan. vii. 10. St. John, "I beheld, and I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne, and the number of

Respecting the pursuits of angels in the heavenly state, we can form but a very inadequate conception, in the present life, and must await our arrival in those bright and blessed mansions which Christ has prepared for them that love Him. But from the declarations of Scripture we know that they are deeply occupied in investigating, with intense earnestness, the astonishing developments of the Divine Majesty in the works of creation and providence, and the wondrous economy of grace and salvation. In the celestial temple angels are engaged in the most exalted services, contemplating the perfection, and celebrating the praises of the Great Eternal.

To such ennobling and glorious pursuits who would not aspire, and devoutly prepare with a moral and spiritual meetness, to join the resounding trisagion of the celestial hierarchy.

Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, which is, and is to come. Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, honor, and power, for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created.

TRADITIONARY AND ANECDOTICAL.

The Talmudical traditions and Rabbinical writings, with their characteristic fecundity, abound with singular fictions respecting the guardianship and employment of angels ;-the Jews indulging the vain conceit that the appearance of angels, and their ministrations by the commission of God, were only manifested in Judea. Regarding the presidency of angels, the Rabbinical writers give the following statement, over the seventy nations into which they say the human family was divided at the confusion and subsequent dispersion of Babel.

"The Lord said to the seventy angels which stood before him, come now, and let us go down, and there let us confound their language, so that a man may not understand the language of his companion. And the word of the Lord was discovered against that city, and with it the seventy nations,—and their respective languages, which each angel respectively wrote with his hand." Another says, "The earth consisted of seven climates, and every climate divided into ten parts. Then was each country and people assigned to its respective prince, and these princes are called gods of the world. Thus were the seventy nations divided amongst the seventy princes; the blessed God taking no part in them, because He is pure. One rabbi assigns to these angels the function of "moving the heavenly bodies; another affirms them to be "the souls of the heavenly bodies;" and another asserts them to be no other than the "stars and planets." Among some of the employments of angels, the rabbies say, that the ark had no rudder, and was steered and guided by them; and that God used their services in calling together "every living thing of all flesh, cattle, and creeping things of all sorts," when God commanded Noah to assemble them for embarkation.

Guardian angels, according to the notions of the Jewish rabbins, perform very important services in favor of men. They say, "Every man has his angel who speaks for him, and prays for him; as it is said (Psalm lxv. 2), "O Thou that hearest prayer;" that is, the prayer of the angel, who is the Mashal or guardian of men. It follows, "Unto thee shall all flesh come." Wherefore, the angels are not allowed to say their hymns above, till the Israelites have said them here below; for all that a man does is imitated by his Mashal, who performs it above, in the same manner in which it is performed here below. A man should never ask his necessaries of God in the Syriac or Chaldaic language. The ministering angels do not attend, to carry any one's prayers before God, who petitions for his necessaries in the Syriac language. This is meant of one single man who prays for himself; by a whole congregation it may be done in all languages, because the presence of God is amongst them.

There are three who weave or make garlands out of the prayers of the Israelites; the first is Achtariel, the second Metraton, and the third Sandalphon. Behold! these three, who make garlands, do not attempt to make garlands of any other prayers; but only of such as are made in the Hebrew tongue.

The rabbies represent the removal of men from the present life as effected by the instrumentality of angels, whom they denominate angels of death. The execution of the mortal sentence, on those who die in the land of Israel is assigned to Gabriel, whom they style an angel of mercy; and those who die in other countries are dispatched by the hand of Samnael, the prince of demons.” These two are deputies of Metraton, to whom God daily makes known those who are appointed to die. These deputies do not themselves bring away any souls out of the world; but each of them employs some of his host for that purpose.

The Jewish cabalists single out some particular angels as preceptors to the patriarchs;—to Adam was given Raziel,—to Abraham, Zidekiel,—to Moses, Metraton,—to Elias, Malashiel, -and to David, Gerviel, &c.

Amongst the chief spirits of the Mahometan heaven, such as Gabriel, the angel of revelation,-Israfil, by whom the last trumpet is to be sounded,-and Azrael, the angel of death, there were also a number of subaltern intelligences, appointed to preside over the different stages or ascents into which the celestial world was divided. Thus Kelail governs the fifth heaven, while Sadiel, the presiding spirit of the third, is employed in steadying the motions of the earth, which would be in a constant state of agitation if this angel did not keep his foot planted upon its orb.

Amongst other miraculous interpositions in favor of Mahomet, recorded in the Alcoran, was the appearance of five thousand angels on his side, at the battle of Bedr.

The Grecian academies entertained the belief that spirits behold all the actions of men, and rendered them assistance accordingly. That they, moreover, are acquainted with all our apprehensions, cogitations, and circumstances; and when the soul is delivered from the body, they bring it before the high Judge. That then they are questioned about our good or bad actions, their testimony being much prevalent either to exonerate or aggravate our doom. Porphirius asserts that many spirits or genii have the charge and custody of every man; one having a care of his health-another indulgent over his beauty and features-and another to infuse into him courage and constancy.

The ancient Persians supposed that Ormund appointed thirty angels to preside successively over the days of the month; and twelve greater ones to assume the government of the months, themselves; among whom Bahman (to whom Ormund committed the custody of all animals, except man) was the greatest Mihr. The angel of the seventh month was the spirit which watched over the affairs of friendship and love. Chur had the care of the disk of the sun. Mah was agent for the concerns of the moon. Isphandarmaz was the tutelar genius of good and virtuous women. The Persians, also, had a certain office or prayer for every day of the month, addressed to the particular angel who presided over it, and whom they called Sizouzé.

The subjoined anecdotes are chiefly extracted from Isaac Ambrose's Discourses on the Communion and Ministry of Angels; respecting whom, in a biographical sketch, the following particulars are given :-He was a native of Lancashire, England, and descended from a highly respectable family. In 1621 he matriculated in Brazen-nose College, of the University of Oxford, and took the degree of bachelor of arts. In consequence of some difference of opinion and the laxity of morals, which then prevailed, he seceded from the Church of England, though he invariably retained her form of episcopal worship against the remonstrances of the Independents, with whom he had ecclesiastically connected himself. Having notified to his friends, a few days preceding the time of his death, he was found dead in his chair, in his study, having that morning sent to the printer the last page of his work on Angels. "His character may be comprised in a few expressions. He was holy in life, happy in his death, favored of God, and held in high estimation by all good men. His writings, like those of Baxter, have a vigorous pulse beating in every page, and it would be difficult to select a paragraph in which the author does not appear in earnest for the salvation of his readers. He was one of those excellent divines who distinguished and adorned the turbulent age in which he lived, amidst those ecclesiastical troubles for which it was remarkable; and who, in their combined influences, irradiated the moral gloom which then overspread the land; and it is to their indefatigable exertions that we are indebted for many of the religious blessings which we now enjoy. He was a star of no common magnitude and effulgence in that bright constellation of worthies, who have enriched the world by their writings, bequeathing a noble example to posterity, of whom, indeed, the world was not worthy."

God does, by his angels, preserve and keep good ministers from the hands of their persecutors, as is reported by great divines of unquestionable credit, in the following instance :-" One Grynæus, a German divine, a learned and holy man, coming from Heidelberg to Spire, and going to hear a certain preacher in that city, that did then let fall some erroneous propositions of Popish doctrine, was thereat greatly offended, and presently went to the preacher, exhorting him to abandon his error; the preacher seemed to take it well, and pretended to be desirous of some further discourse with him, and so they parted. Grynæus going to his lodging, reports the passages of the late conference to those that sat at table with him, amongst whom Melancthon was one; he was called out of the room to speak with a stranger newly come into the house, and going forth he finds a grave old man of a goodly countenance, seemly and richly attired, who, in a friendly and grave manner tells him that within one hour there would come to their inn certain officers to apprehend Grynæus, and to carry him to prison, willing him to charge Grynæus with all possible speed to fly, and requiring Melancthon to see that this advantage was not neglected. Instantly Melancthon returned to the company, related the words of this strange monitor, and hasted Grynæus away, who had no sooner taken boat but he was eagerly sought for at his said lodging. No doubt this was an angel which God had sent to deliver this goodly minister from persecution.

Another worthy minister who was sought after by his persecutors, crept into a dark hole in the house, to hide himself, and as soon as he was got in, a spider drew a web over the mouth of the hole. When the searchers came, one of them would have looked in there for the man, where, indeed he was, but the other observing that there was a spider's web over the hole, concluded he could not be there, and therefore they ceased their search. What an artifice of the good man's angel-guardian was this to preserve him? Though persecutors are crafty and cruel, yet our keepers are more cunning than they, and can out-wit them.

Mr. Hawks being burnt to death, was desired by his friends to give them (if he could) some sign, by lifting up his hand, if he found his pains such as were tolerable, and might be borne with patience, and he did so; when his speech was gone, his body burning, and he thought to be dead, he lifted up his hands over his head, all on fire, and clapt them thrice together, which caused a great shout amongst his friends.

Mr. James Bingham, when the flames had half consumed him, cried out in the fire: "O ye papists! ye look for miracles; here now ye may see a miracle; for in this fire I feel no more pain than if I were, on a bed of roses!" If angels could keep Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego in the fiery furnace without any hurt, why might they not keep this holy martyr in the flames without pain, though he died in them? He is a very uncharitable wretch that will not believe he found as he spake. 'Tis, I confess, a wonderful instance, that 'tis usual for God to indulge his martyrs more than ordinary support in fiery trials."

Mr. Holland, the day before his death, on a sudden, while one was reading, said, "O stay your reading. What brightness is this I see? It is my Savior's shine. Now farewell world, welcome Heaven. The day-star from on high has visited my heart." And then turning to the minister who preached his funeral sermon, he said, "I desire you speak this for me, that God deals familiarly with man; I feel his mercy, I see his majesty, whether in the body or out of the body, I cannot tell, God he knoweth ; but I see things that are unutterable."

Many have told the very day and hour of their departure; and, says Bishop Hall, these revelations and ecstacies whence are they? If a man without all observation of physical criticism, shall receive, and give intelligence many days before, what day and hour shall be his last, what cause can we attribute this to but our attending angels? And when joy arises not to such an overflowing height, yet does it frequently begin our heaven on earth, and the fears of death are fully vanquished, and the good man can see it, and feel it coming without any regret.

Angels are with the saints in the very minute of dying, taking away the terribleness of it. There is an aversion in nature to death; but, says Mr. Ambrose, the body's passage through the grave, though it be dark and dismal, yet it is safe and secure.

The grave is but a sleeping-place (they shall rest in their beds), and their soul's angels guard safe to heaven, and thus minister to the saints in death.

"Oh would God, ye saw what I see (said Mrs. Stubbs, on her death bed). Behold, I see infinite millions of angels stand about me, with fiery chariots to defend me, these are appointed of God to carry my soul unto the kingdom of heaven.”

Immediately after the separation of the soul from the body, the angels receive it, and carry it to heaven. They are a convoy for the departing souls of the godly, to bring them to their felicity, though how they do it we cannot understand. They keep them company at least, and they are a guard to them as they pass through the Devil's territories; for the Devil is called the Prince of the power of the air. He, with all his hellish crew, are the inhabitants of that region, and souls in their journey to heaven must pass through the air, and the angels wait upon them as a convoy.

The Devil drags the souls of wicked men to hell, when they die; and angels conduct the souls of good men to heaven. Such honor have all the saints. The poorest and meanest of them will be thus royally attended. Lazarus was a beggar, and he went in state to heaven.

DESCRIPTION OF PLATES.-Plate 1.-The guardian angel, attracted by the simplicity and innocency of childhood, presses his charge close to his side, with his arm around her neck; whilst the child, with a natural and confiding fondness, leans against him. With a dignified and benignant countenance, the angel extends his arm in the attitude of protection, as if warding off approaching danger. Plate 2.-Represents the angelic hosts celebrating the completion of the finished work of creation, “When the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy?"-Job xxxviii. 7. Plate 3.-Represents the final employment of angels in this world, on the arrival of the resurrection morn and the judgment day. Christ "on the throne of his glory," attended by holy angels. On one side is the recording angel, opening the book of life, in which are enrolled the names of the "heirs of salvation." In the space between the judgment seat, and those arising out of their graves, the archangel is sounding the trumpet which summons the assembling universe.

MORAL AND CONCLUSION.

Verbum Domini manet in eternum.

All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness.-2 Tim. iii. 16.

UPON the opening of our divine and delightful subject, we intimated the intention of furnishing a synopsis of some of the confirmatory proofs, and illustrative facts demonstrative and recommendatory of the authenticity, antiquity, literature and inspiration of the Scriptures, to be received as the unimpeachable standard of faith and practice, requiring the entire dissociation of all negative assertions and mental reserves or suppositions, originating either in the unhallowed pride of the human intellect or the Pharaoh-like reluctance of the heart to yield an implicit obedience or acquiescent submission to the authority and precepts, the truths and doctrines contained in Holy Writ.*

From the days of the apostles, (when the philosophizing Greeks arrogated to themselves the pompous title of Zopo and p2ooooo, wise men and philosophers,) to the present period, this state of mind and disposition have been the principal source from which have arisen all those heresies which have disfigured the benevolent character and perverted the gracious designs of Christianity, producing the most horrible persecutions, to all that superadded variety of evil in religion, morals and society, engendered by the violence of a sanguinary discord, the pretensions of a pseudo-philosophy, and the blasphemous negations of a presumptuous infidelity, whose name, indeed, is Legion.

Even those who have professed to have received the revelation of the Bible, too frequently employ themselves in endeavoring to help out other systems and formula of beliefs, for which no sanction can be shown, in the obvious bearing and spirit of the Sacred Scriptures, under the disguise of new constructions, rejection of alleged interpolated passages, allegorical explanation of inferences of a directly antagonistical tendency; and for which conduct nothing can be more irrational, inconsistent and injurious to the reception and

* The mass of evidence in favor of the divine inspiration of the Bible is too great to be set aside by anything short of scientific demonstration. Were the Scriptures to teach that the whole is not equal to its parts, the mind could not, indeed, believe it. But if it taught a truth which was only contrary to the probable deductions of science, science, I say, must yield to the Scriptures; for it would be more reasonable to doubt the probabilities of a single science, than the various and most satisfactory evidence on which revelation rests. I do not believe that the probabilities of any science are in collision with Scripture. But the supposition is made to show how strong are my convictions of the evidence and paramount importance of the Bible.

DR. EDWARD HITCHCOCK, Religion of Geology.

Adam no sooner fell, but philosophy fell with him, and became a common strumpet for carnal reason to commit frolic with, and oh! how have the lascivious wits of lapsed human nature, ever since, gone a whoring after vain philosophy.-GALE, Preface, Court of the Gentiles.

utility of the Scriptures than to profess to accept them as a divine Revelation, and at the same time to constitute human opinion as the standard by which their declarations are to be tested; virtually invoking the awful consequences of sitting in judgment upon Deity, (who is the acknowledged author of them,) and to determine whether He has declared truth or spoken falsehood! Verily! must not angels wonder to see frail and fallen humanity thus engaged?

As corroborative of the importance and doctrine of the subject which we have discussed, and now deferentially submit to the candid and serious consideration of the Christian, as well as the philosophic and general reader, we offer the following appropriate and conciliatory remarks of President Dwight :-" In the Scriptures we find an order, or rather a kind of beings described, which were never known, nor imagined by any person who did not derive his acquaintance with them from that book. They are beings who have a character as appropriate as that of man, as far, as finite intelligences can be supposed to differ from each other. Yet the character is complete, entire, and of a piece with itself. Every attribute is suited to every other; all are angelic; all are heavenly. A station is also assigned to them, of a dignity and importance, perfectly fitted to their character, and worthy of being filled by such beings. Employments are also marked out for them, altogether becoming both the station and the character; angelic employments-suited to the Sons of God, the Morning Stars of Heaven. Can it be reasonably supposed that these things were devised by human imagination? Have similar things been ever thus devised? The fancy of man has, in all nations and ages, delighted itself with the employment of fashioning imaginary beings, of a nature superior to ours. What have been its productions? The gods, demons, and genii of ancient, and the elves, sylphs, and fairies of modern times. But how do all these shrink from a comparison with angels? They are little, base, trifling, sordid, and sinful enough to have been copied with a few easy additions from the characteristics of men. But where does this world furnish materials for the composition of an angelical character? What originals has it presented, from which the portrait could be drawn?*

A multitude of writers in the Scriptures, fifteen at least, have described these glorious beings with the most perfect harmony, and without a single discordant idea. In the mean time their descriptions are extensively various, comprising many particulars, and wholly independent of each other. All the writers are in this respect, as well as others, originals. Not one is a copier; not one a plagiary; yet their representations are universally noble, sublime, dignified, beautiful and lovely, beyond anything found in the most perfect writings of uninspired men. To which may be added a similar testimony to the authority of the Bible, from the eccentric, erudite and ironical Gale, in his preface to the "Court of the Gentiles." "But such was the infinite benignity and condescension of sovereign light and love, as that he vouchsafed to irradiate a spot of the lapsed world, even of his holy land and elect seed, with fresh and glorious rays of the light and life conveyed in and by the sacred Revelation. And oh! how bright, how ravishing were those heavens of divine light which shone on Judea? Were not all the adjacent parts illuminated thereby? Yea, did not Greece itself (esteemed the eye of the world) light her candle at this sacred fire? Were not all the Grecian schools hung with philosophic ornaments, or contemplations stolen out of the Judaic wardrobe? Were not Pythagoras's college, Plato's academy, Aristotle's peripatum, Zeno's stoa, and Epicurus's garden all watered by rivulets, though in themselves corrupt, originally derived from the sacred streams of Siloam? Whence had Phenicia, Egypt, Chaldea, Persia, with our occidental parts, their barbaric philosophy, but from the sacred emanations of Zion ?"

Our design in favor of the positive, prophetic, and miraculous evidence of the Inspiration of the Holy Bible, is so ably set forth by Dr. Townsend (whose classical learning and sincere Christianity no man will attempt to question), in the annexed statement, that we make no apology for its insertion or length, assured of the pleasure which its perusal will afford the reader, and his approbation accordingly.

* If then, we find a book which professes to be a revelation from heaven, a system of moral laws which can clearly be shown to be the basis of the moral order of the universe, and which are calculated to secure the eternal happiness of all intellectual beings, it forms a strong presumptive proof, if not an unanswerable argument, that the contents of that book are of celestial origin, and were dictated by Him who gave birth to the whole system of created beings;-a moral demonstration that a power and intelligence superior to the human mind, must have suggested such sublime conceptions and such astonishing ideas, since there are no such prototypes to be found within the range of the human understanding.-DR. DICK, Philosophy of Religion.

From the period of the dispersion of the Jews among the Egyptians and Babylonians, we find that the Greeks began to have more exalted and refined ideas of a Deity; and that they applied themselves more particularly to that philosophy and literature, which contributed so eminently to raise them to the highest intellectual rank among ancient or modern nations. All the sects and schools of philosophy, in ancient Greece, originated from the Ionic and Italic sects. The Ionic sect was founded by Thales, the Italic by Pythagoras.

Thales was born about the year 640 before Christ, and is remarkable for being the first Grecian who taught a regular system of philosophy, and left a succession of disciples to establish and maintain it. He traveled into Egypt when he was a young man, and resided there several years. If he went into that country when at the age of twenty or twenty-five, and resided there ten or more years (and this period was not beyond that which was usually passed by the students in Egyptian learning), he would have been in Egypt when Jehoahaz, king of Judah, was brought there as a prisoner by Pharaoh Necho. The attention of the curious Greek must have been attracted by the various captives, strangers thus introduced into Egypt; and while he improved himself in those sciences in which the Egyptians excelled, it is highly probable that from conversing with these Jewish captives, he acquired some of those great and truly philosophical notions which he afterwards taught at his native Miletus, and in Greece.

The chief of these opinions were, that the world was not eternal, but was made by God the Spirit, out of water, an opinion which seems to have been derived from the Mosaic and Christian doctrine," the Spirit of God moved on the face of the waters;" that the world being God's workmanship, was exceedingly good and perfect; that the universe was filled with invisible spirits, who inspect the actions of men.

Thales was the first of the Greeks who made any philosophical inquiries into the nature and perfections of God; for though, as Gale remarks, Orpheus, Linus, Homer, and Hesiod, had some traditions of God, their value was obscured by a mixture with pagan fables. Thales however delivered his knowledge concerning God in a more plain and simple manner. He first maintained amongst the Greeks that God was the most ancient of beings; and are evidently derived from purer sources than from invented traditions or speculative heathen philosophy. From the Jews alone, therefore, with whom Thales became acquainted in Egypt, could he have received those ideas of God and his Providence, which shine like a meteor through the dark mist of the ignorance and blindness of that superstitious age.

Thales was succeeded by Anaximander, Anaximines, and Anaxagoras, the friend and tutor of Pericles; by Diogenes Apolloniates, and by Archelaus the instructor of Socrates. The various sects which are referred to the Ionic school, are the Socratic, founded by Socrates, among whose disciples and followers are Xenophon, Plato, Euclid, and Alcibiades; the Cyrenaic sect, founded by Aristippus; the Megaric, established by Euclid at Megara; the Eretriac or Elïac school, instituted by Phædo at Elis; the Academic, founded by Plato, whose school, after his death, was divided into the old, middle, and new academies; the Peripatetic, founded by Aristotle; the Cynic, by Antisthenes; the Stoic, by Zeno. These sects continued till the time of Christ; and when St. Paul visited Athens, he found the Greeks still engaged in disputes, and inquiries into the mysteries and difficulties of philosophy. Although the purest and most refined speculations of the best and most celebrated of these philosophers fall far short of the principles and morality inculcated by the Christian dispensation, they still served to advance the progress of Christianity, or rather they tended to diminish the superstitious reverence paid to the pagan deities. The commonest people became at least sensible that their philosophers only adhered to the religious ceremonies of the established superstition, from mere compliance with popular custom; and the reflecting part of the community were divided, in a state of doubt and uncertainty: Socrates, in particular, declared that a teacher from heaven was necessary to impart instruction to mankind.

Moral philosophy may be considered as a light to the dark and ignorant age in which it flourished; but when compared with Christianity, it is little less than the very darkness it so partially illuminated. Philosophy, at the height of its splendor, displayed only the corruption, the folly, and the degradation of the human mind when deprived of revelation. It was like the taper in a charnel house at midnight, which disperses the darkness of the tomb, and shows to the sickening spectator how melancholy is the sight of humanity, when bereaved of life and spirit.

Though the accounts of Pythagoras are mingled with fable there is abundant authority to induce us to believe that this philosopher conversed likewise with the Jews of the dispersion, at Tyre, in Phoenicia, and probably at Mount Carmel, where it is said his walk was long shown. It is certain that he was in Egypt, and many suppose he was taken prisoner into that country either by Nebuchadnezzar, or by Cambyses. From Egypt he either went or was taken to Babylon, where again he must have acquired an intimate knowledge of the Jews; and in this latter place he is said to have had for an instructor Zabratus, or Nazaratus—whom the learned Selden supposes to have been Ezekiel-and Prideaux, Zoroaster. The exact period of the birth of Pythagoras is not certainly known. The accounts of his life, now extant, are uncertain and contradictory; that which appears most probable and satisfactory informs us, that at the age of eighteen he consulted Thales at Miletus, who recommended him to visit Egypt.

From Miletus he proceeded to Tyre (the place of his nativity, though educated at Samos); from thence he travelled to Egypt, with letters to Amasis from Polycrates, tyrant of Samos. He quitted Egypt for Babylon, where he continued twelve years, and conversed with Zabratus or Nazaratus. He is then supposed to have returned to his own country, and to have been at that time about fifty-six years of age.

In the year 563 before Christ, the whole country of Judea was still desolate-not having recovered from its last ravage by Nebuzzaradan. In this year Nebuchadnezzar was restored from his lycanthropy, and the Jews were rising into distinction in the Persian empire. Leaving Judea and its refugees, whom he might have found both at Tyre and Carmel, Pythagoras proceeded to Egypt. He would there meet with many of the Jews who had fled with Jeremiah from Judea, nineteen years preceding. From them, as well as from the natives, he would learn the fulfilment of that prophet's predictions respecting Apries. This and other circumstances exciting his curiosity, he at last visited Babylon, where he is supposed to have arrived in the year 541, and two years before the death of Beltshazzar. During his residence of twelve years in Babylon, Pythagoras must have been a spectator of the wonderful events recorded in the Book of Daniel. The greatest statesman of the day in Babylon was a Jew. As the time and manner of Ezekiel's death are unknown; and as in this year, Ezekiel, if alive, would not be more than fifty-three years of age; it is by no means improbable that he might have conversed, as tradition asserts, with that prophet. Pythagoras must have been informed of the decree of Cyrus, before Christ 536, for the return of the Jews, and he must have been acquainted with prophecies thereby fulfilled; it is not improbable that he was a wondering spectator of their departure for their own lands. At Babylon he undoubtedly saw the school or universities established by the Jews; for he introduced into his own country institutions which were characterized by regulations similar to those adopted by the Jews.

Struck and astonished at all he read or heard or saw of this persecuted and favored people, we cannot be surprised that he should have engrafted many of the purer truths of morality on his system of philosophy.

Pythagoras quitted Babylon in 529, the same year that Cyrus died. It is probable his departure was accelerated by the cruel and tyrannical government of Cambyses, his successor. In this year the Greek philosopher returned home; and dissatisfied with the political state of affairs at Samos, he taught his new system called the Italic philosophy, in the towns of Magara Grecia. The philosophy of Pythagoras, so far as it is known, may be described as a mixture of Persian, Grecian, and Egyptian superstitions, interwoven with Jewish doctrines, institutions, and customs. The numerous coincidences between his enactments and those of the Jews, are found in the similarity of discipline established in his schools and colleges; in his distinction between the perfect or the initiated, and the service the Tεεos and the vεodutos, or the n and p of the Jews; in the covenant among the members of his colleges, in the use of salt as a sign of union or agreement, as well as some others.

The doctrines of Pythagoras must have tended to remove many of the evils of polytheism and idolatry. He acknowledged but one God, the Creator of the world. He had some idea of the sacred name of the Petragammaton of the Jews, which he revealed as a mystery to his disciples. He described the Deity in the very words of the Hebrew Scriptures, as the *, the To òv, the self-existent. He taught by this definition that God was infinite and eternal; a truth which human reason, unassisted by divine revelation, has never yet discovered. He likewise instructed his disciples in the doctrine of a peculiar providence, particularly over good men-the necessity of pure worship-the immortality of the soul-the incorporeality of the Deity.

His morality evidently sprung from a purer source than from the profane worship of pagan deities; his golden verses (if they are certainly his) are evidently transcripts of the Mosaic precepts; and virtuous will be the life, and tranquil the death of that man who habitually observes the precepts they contain, and thrice reviews the actions of the day, before he resigns himself to rest at night.

The Italic sect flourished till the end of the reign of Alexander. It gave rise to the Eleatic, the Heraclitean, the Epicurean, and the Phyrrhonic sects, whose doctrines, however, differ materially from those enforced by Pythagoras himself. When the best pagan philosophy, considered as a system, is compared with Christianity, the observations already made on the speculations of Thales are equally applicable. But when we consider this philosophy as a virtuous effort of the human mind to penetrate through the darkness and superstition by which it was surrounded; and gaining by these efforts, and the light borrowed from revelation, more pure ideas of morality, and more just notions of a Deity, we are called upon to acknowledge that philosophy was beneficial to man, and that those who acquiesced in the doctrines of Pythagoras, and received the better part of his system, must have been wiser and purer than their more ignorant or prejudiced countrymen. That the Greeks, therefore, were indebted to their intercourse with the Jews for the origin of their philosophy, is highly probable; it is, therefore, no less probable, that their literature may be partly traced to the same source. From the temperance Pythagoras uniformly practised, it is probable that his life was extended to a late period. He is supposed to have perished in consequence of a political disturbance in the seventieth olympiad, about the year 563 before Christ. If this tradition be correct, he must at this time have entered his eighty-third or eighty-fourth year.

Eschylus, the founder of the Greek drama, in its present form, would have been at that time about twenty-five years of age; and though we are not acquainted with the particulars of his early life, we may naturally conclude that one so eminent would have carefully instructed himself in all the philosophy and learning of his age. A Pythagorean in principle, many of his sentiments are the same as those taught in the golden verses of Pythagoras. We very justly conclude, therefore, that the great tragedian was either personally acquainted with, and a disciple of the Samean; or that he was well versed in the system promulgated by that philosopher. Like many of his countrymen he gave offence to the people, by deviating from received opinions. In the mythology of Eschylus, Dr. Gray observes, there is frequent reference to principles originating in revelation.

In the passage cited by Eusebius, he describes the Supreme God as a being who is carefully to be distinguished from mortals, having nothing resembling the body of man. At one time he declares, that God shines forth in unapproachable fire; at another, he invests Him in the elements, appearing in the wind, the thunder, and the lightning! He represents the ocean, the rocks, and the fountains as ministering to the Supreme Being; the hills, and the earth, the depths of the sea, and the summit of the mountains, as trembling at His presence. The piercing eye of God he describes as overlooking all things, for the glory of the highest God is powerful. His celebrated scene in Persia, in which the shade of Darius is summoned by Atossa, is very similar to the account of the appearance of Samuel to Saul, as related in the narrative of the Witch of Endor. Many of the Christian fathers have asserted that the character of "Prometheus" could not have been drawn, unless the author of the drama had been acquainted with the Sacred Writings, or with at least many of the prophetic books, of which it exhibits the most decisive evidence in several of its passages. It is probable that the Sacred Writings were partly made known to him by his tutor, and contemporary, Pythagoras. Similarity of desciption only, with identity of expression, would demonstrate this point; these, it is true, might be mere coincidences; but where the same personifications are used, we may justly conclude, that the resemblance is not accidental. In Jeremiah xlvii. 6, we meet with this bold personification—“O thou sword of the Lord, how long will it be ere thou be quiet? put up thyself into thy scabbard, rest, and be still. How can it be quiet, seeing the Lord hath given it a charge against Ashkelon?" The same metaphor is adopted by Eschylus. Also, "Thus saith the Lord God, I will spread my net over him, and he shall be taken in my snare," and the same expression is employed in other portions of Scripture to describe a state of inextricable difficulty, of distress, or ruin. The same metaphor is applied by Eschylus to describe the destruction of Troy. The tragedian who followed Æschylus, although perhaps inferior to him in sublimity, maintained an exalted nobleness of moral sentiment. A higher tone seems to have been given to the public mind in Greece, which cannot entirely be attributed to their political institutions, or the incessant agitation and restlessness of mind induced by their party dissensions. We must refer this intellectual elevation to a more intellectual source; to the spirit of their philosophy, morality, and poetry, which was partially derived from the purer fountains of the Hebrew Scriptures, and the peculiar object of Providence, in thus communicating to the Greeks, through the dispersion and captivity of the Jews, some knowledge of a purer creed was shown in subsequent ages, when that language was selected to impart the knowledge of the Scriptures to the world. The universality of the Greek language may be attributed to the general interest excited by the Greek Drama, the splendid composition of the poets, and the more exalted speculations of their philosophers. The pagan nations did not, it is true, eat of the fruit of the tree of life, yet they were blessed with some few of its leaves, and the very "leaves of that tree which are for the healing of the nations." Bishop Watson finely and strikingly remarks: "To read the prophecies of Daniel with attention, intelligence and an unbiassed mind, is sufficient to convert an unbeliever from Deism to Christianity." They were declared several hundred years be fore the birth of Christ; they extend through many ages; and have ever been considered as the foundation of all modern history; revealing the successive rise and fall of the four great monarchies of the world; the establishment of the Messiah's kingdom upon earth; his death and sufferings; and passing from earth to heaven, they terminate only in eternity.

The psalms present every possible variety of Hebrew poetry. They may all, indeed, be termed poems of the lyric kind, that is, adapted to music, but with great variety in the style of composition. Thus some are simply odes, giving a narrative of facts, either of public history or private life, in beautiful and figurative language. Others, again, are ethic or didactic, "delivering great maxims of life, or the precepts of religion, in solemn, but for the most part, simple strains. To this class we may refer the hundred and nineteenth, and other alphabetical psalms, which are so called, because the initial letters of each line or stanza follow the order of the alphabet. Nearly one-seventh part of the psalms are elegiac or pathetic compositions on mournful subjects. Some are enigmatic, delivering the doctrines of religion in enigmatic sentences contrived to strike the imagination forcibly, and yet easy to be understood; while a few may be referred to the class of idyls or short pastoral poems. But the greatest part, according to Bishop Horsley, is a sort of dramatic ode, consisting of dialogues between certain persons sustaining certain characters. In these dialogue psalms, the persons are frequently the Psalmist himself, or the chorus of priests and Levites, or the leaders of the Levitical band, opening the ode with a poem declarative of the subject, and very often closing the whole with a solemn admonition drawn from what the other persons say. The other persons are, Jehovah, sometimes as one, sometimes as another of the three persons; Christ in his incarnate state, sometimes before, sometimes after his resurrection; the human soul of Christ, as distinguished from the divine essence. Christ, in his incarnate state, is personated sometimes as a priest, sometimes as a king, sometimes as a conqueror; and, in those psalms in which he is introduced as a conqueror, the resemblance is very remarkable between this conqueror in the Book of Psalms, and the warrior on the white horse in the Book of Revelations, who goes forth with a crown on his head, and a bow in his hand, conquering and to conquer; and the conquest in the Psalms is followed, like the conquest in the Revelations, by the marriage of the conqueror. These are circumstances of similitude, which, to any one versed in the prophetic style, prove beyond a doubt that the mystical conqueror is the same personage in both.

In praise of the Psalms, all the fathers of the church are unanimously eloquent. Athanasius styles them an epitome of the whole Scriptures; Basil, a compendium of all theology; Luther, a little Bible, and the summary of the Old Testament; and Melancthon, the most elegant writing in the whole world. How highly the Psalter was valued subsequent to the Reformation, we may easily conceive by the very numerous editions of it which were executed in the infancy of printing, and by the number of commentators who have undertaken to illustrate its sacred pages. Carpzor, who wrote a century ago, enumerates upwards of one hundred and sixty; and, of the subsequent modern expositors of this book, it would perhaps be difficult to procure a correct account. "The Psalms," as Bishop Horne, their best interpreter in our language, has remarked with equal piety and beauty, "are an epitome of the Bible, adapted to the purposes of devotion. They treat occasionally of the creation and formation of the world; the dispensations of providence, and the economy of grace; the transactions of the patriarchs; the exodus of the children of Israel; their journey through the wilderness and settlement in Canaan; their law, priesthood, and ritual; the exploits of these great men, wrought through faith; their sins and captivities; their repentances and restorations; the sufferings and victories of David; the peaceful and happy reign of Solomon; the advent of the Messiah, with its effects and consequences, his incarnation, birth, life, passion, death, resurrection, ascension, kingdom, and priesthood; the effusion of the Spirit; the conversion of the nations; the rejection of the Jews; the establishment, increase, and perpetuity of the Christian church; the end of the world; the general judgment; the condemnation of the wicked, and the final triumph of the righteous with their Lord and King. These are the subjects here presented to our meditation. We are instructed how to conceive of them aright, and to express the different affections, which, when so conceived of, they must excite in our minds. They are for this purpose adorned with figures, and set off with all the graces of poetry; and poetry itself is designed yet further to be recommended by the charms of music, thus consecrated to the service of God; that so delight may prepare the way for improvement, and pleasure become the handmaid of wisdom, while every turbulent passion is calmed by sacred melody, and the evil spirit is still dispossessed by the harp of the son of Jesse. This little volume, like the paradise of Eden, affords us in perfection, though in miniature, everything that groweth elsewhere, "every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food," and, above all, what was there lost, but is here restored the tree of life in the midst of the garden. That which we read as matter of speculation, in the other Scriptures, is reduced to practice when we recite it in the Psalms; in these, repentance and faith are described; but in those they are acted; by a perusal of the former, we learn how others served God, but, by using the latter, we serve him ourselves. “What is there necessary for a man to know," says the pious and judicious Hooker, "which the Psalms are not able to teach? They are to beginners an easy and familiar introduction, a mighty augmentation of all virtue and knowledge in such as are entered before, a strong confirmation to the most perfect among others. Heroical magnanimity, exquisite justice, grave moderation, exact wisdom, repentance unfeigned, unwearied patience, the mysteries of God, the sufferings of Christ, the terrors of wrath, the comforts of grace, the works of Providence over this world, and the promised joys of that world which is to come, all good necessarily to be either known, or done, or had, this one celestial fountain yieldeth. Let there be any grief or disease incident unto the soul of man, any wound or sickness named, for which there is not, in this treasure-house, a present comfortable remedy at all times ready to be found."

Many of the Psalms, which bear the royal prophet's name, were composed on occasions of remarkable circumstances in his life, his dangers, his afflictions, his deliverances. But of those which relate to the public history of the natural Israel, there are few in which the fortunes of the mystical Israel are not adumbrated; and of those which allude to the life of David, there are none in which the son of David is not the principal and immediate subject. David's complaints against his enemies are Messiah's complaints, first of the unbelieving Jews, then of the heathen persecutors, and of the apostate faction in later ages. David's afflictions are Messiah's sufferings. David's penitential supplications are Messiah's, under the burden of the imputed guilt of man. David's songs of triumph and thanksgiving are Messiah's songs of triumph and thanksgiving, for his victory over sin, and death, and hell. In a word, there is not a page of this Book of Psalms, in which the pious reader will not find his Savior, if he reads with a view of finding him.

In the language of this divine book, therefore, the prayers and praises of the church have been offered up to the throne of grace, from age to age, and it appears to have been the manual of the Son of God in the days of his flesh; who, at the conclusion of his last supper, is generally supposed, and that upon good grounds, to have sung a hymn taken from it; who pronounced on the cross, the beginning of the twenty-second Psalm, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? and expired with a part of the thirty-first Psalm in his mouth: "Into thy hands I commit my spirit." Thus He, who had not the spirit by measure, in whom were hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, and who spake as never man spake, yet chose to conclude his life, to solace himself in the greatest agony, and at last to breathe out his soul, in the Psalmist's form of words, rather than his own. "No tongue of man or angel," as Dr. Hammond justly observes, "can convey a higher idea of any book, and of their felicity who use it aright."

The Psalms have been thus classified according to their several subjects, as adapted to the purpose of private devotion under the following divisions: 1st. Prayers, for pardon of sin,-when deprived of the opportunity of the public exercise of religion-when deprived of consolation under the pressure and despondency of external afflictions and internal grief-supplications for divine assistance under conscious integrity of heart, and the justice of the suppliant's cause-expression of confidence and trust in God under trials—prayers of intercession on behalf of the people of God-with others suited to their experience under every variety of trouble and distress. 2d. Psalms of thanksgiving for mercies vouchsafed to particular persons and the Israelites in general. 3d. Psalms of praise and adoration displaying the attributes of God, including the acknowledgment of his goodness, mercy, care, and protection of good men, with reference to the power, majesty, and glory of God. 4th. Instructive Psalms, describing the happiness of good, and the misery of bad men. 5th. Psalms especially prophetical. 6th. Historical Psalms.

The Bible, then, as the bulwark of civil and religious freedom-as the Magna Charta of divine principles and privileges, guaranteeing the reversion of our immortal hopes and title to the inheritance "incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away ;"-as the water of life distilled through the crystal conduits of revelation, each and all claim from our reason a reverential and grateful reception of Holy

Writ, as the only admitted standard of faith and practice.* What infatuation! what impiety! to renounce this sacred Book; which, after the similitude of a celestial lighthouse, a gracious Jehovah has established on the Rock of Ages, and in the manifold wisdom and grace of God, placed along the shining banks of immortality, whose reflected beams, espied by the telescope of faith, will safely pilot the frail bark of mortality, tempest-tossed upon the crested billows of adversity, and amidst the dangerous and deceitful shoals of temptation as it nears the haven of eternal rest, and enters the harbor of the delectable city of the heavenly Jerusalem!

*With such purposes and such feelings have I perused the books of the Old and New Testaments-each book as a whole, and also as an integral part. And need I say that I have met everywhere more or less copious sources of truth and power and purifying influences; that I have found words for my inmost thoughts, songs for my joy, utterances for my hidden griefs, and pleadings for my shame and feebleness? In short, whatever finds me, bears witness for itself, that it has proceeded from a Holy Spirit, even from the same Spirit, which remaining in itself, yet regenerateth all other powers, and in all ages entering into holy souls, maketh them friends of God and prophets Wisd. vii.-COLERIDGE, Con. Inq. Spirit.

If our good-hearted philosopher, in his Hydriotaphia, could speak of man amidst corruption and decay, as "splendid in ruins, and pompous in the grave," how much more ennobling a view is the Christian permitted to take of him, in connection with the declarations revealed and contained in the volume of Inspiration,—as the candidate for immortality—the heir of salvation-the child of the resurrection, and the adopted son of God, destined to be made equal to the angels, those glorious beings who have never fallen from the high and original righteousness of that radiant condition in which they were created.

In the aphoristic expostulation of the royal Preacher—Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: With what adoring gratitude and reverential humility does it behoove us to receive the redemption which is in Christ Jesus. But for the mediation, the atonement, and the intercession of Christ, seated on the right hand of the Majesty on High, we should have been hopelessly deprived of all those present benefits and prospective privileges for our bodies and souls,* in time and eternity, which flow directly from the passion of His agony, the merits and ransom of His death, when He offered himself up as a sacrifice to satisfy Divine justice! But for the atonement of Christ, angels would have never ministered to us amidst our necessities and distresses-would never have attended us through the dark valley of the shadow of death,-and then on the downy chariots of their soft and silvery pinions escort us into the presence of their God and our God, their Savior and our Savior!

In this my present unpretending attempt, I now bid ye, blessed angels, a courteous but reluctant and too abrupt a farewell; receiving, as the mantle of your departure, this gracious exhortation-this animating benediction, for my candid readers; happy, thrice happy they, who, in setting out on the uncertain voyage and agitated sea of this mortal life, having weighed the anchor of a Christian hope, have decided to take for their polar light, the guiding star of Bethlehem ;* for their compass, the magnetic attractions of the cross; for their chart the discoveries of a divine revelation; with their canvass spread, for the propitious gales of spiritual influences to waft and speed them heavenward, in their perilous course; wisely turning a deaf ear to the syren songs of temptation, and avoiding the more fatal under-currents and vortices of carnal lusts, shall escape making "shipwreck of faith and a good conscience" upon the dangerous rocks and deceitful shoals of fatal pleasures ;—and after having, by prayerful vigilance, resolutely encountered every hurricane of woe, and bravely outrode every tempest of tribulation, shall be safely launched on the unruffled ocean of a glorious eternity, over whose boundless surface no storms will ever arise, and the duration of whose unalloyed felicity shall be commensurate with the illimitable expanse of its shoreless extent, and the seraphic fervor of whose adoration will correspond with the crystal holiness of the transparent waters of its unfathomable depth !

* The visible world, so magnificent and so beautiful, is a temple worthy of God, the Creator; the spiritual world described in the pages of the Scriptures is a temple equally worthy of God, the Redeemer. Both equally demonstrate the mercy and love of the same all-wise Providence to the bodies and the souls of men.-DR. TOWNSEND, Introduction to the Old and New Testament.

* Once on the raging seas I rode;
The storm was loud, the night was dark;
The ocean yawn'd, and rudely blow'd
The wind, that toss'd my found'ring bark.
Deep horror, then, my vitals froze;
Death-struck, I ceas'd the tide to stem;
When suddenly a star arose-
It was the star of Bethlehem.
It was my guide, my life, my all,
It bade my dark forebodings cease;
And through the storm and danger's thrall,
It led me to the port of peace.
Now safely moor'd, my perils o'er,
I'll sing first in night's diadem,
For ever, and for evermore-
The star!-the star of Bethlehem.

BIBLICAL AND CURIOUS.

In the last century, all the manuscripts that could be obtained of the Bible were collated with the greatest care, and collections of the various readings have been published to the world. But amongst all the various readings, both of the Old and New Testaments, none have been found to affect any point of doctrine or moral practice; so that the sacred volume has been handed down to our time, in such a state, as to demand from all its friends a grateful acknowledgment of the divine providence in its preservation.

There are not wanting proofs of the most scrupulous care of the Hebrew text on the part of the Jews: they have counted large and small sections, the verses, the words, and even the letters, in some of the books. Father Simon says he had seen a manuscript of Perpignan, which contained the following computation :

	Great sections.	Small sections.	Verses.	Words.	Letters.
Genesis,	12	43	1,534	20,713	78,100
Exodus,	11	33	1,209		63,467

Numbers,	10	33	1,288	16,707	62,529
Deuteronomy,	11	31	955	16,304	54,892

They have likewise reckoned which is the middle letter of the Pentateuch, which is the middle clause of each book, and how many times each letter of the alphabet occurs in all the Hebrew Scriptures.

The most notable editions of the Bible are those which have been issued under the titles of the Wickliffe, about the year 1370, Tindal and Coverdale's, about 1527 and 1535; Matthew's, about 1537; Cranmer's, 1539; The Bishop's, 1569, and King James's, prepared by a conclave of the most able scholars and eminent divines in Hampton Court, in the year 1603, which is the present authorized version, and though upwards of two centuries have elapsed since it first appeared, and during this interval, notwithstanding many passages in particular books have been variously elucidated by learned men, with equal felicity and ability, perspicuity and excellence, their united labors have contributed to give the present translation a high and distinguished place in the judgment of the Christian world, wherever the English language is spoken and studied.

The middle chapter, and the shortest in the Bible, is the 117th Psalm; the middle verse is the 8th of the 118th Psalm; the 21st verse of the 7th chapter of Ezra, in the English version, contains all the letters of the alphabet; the 19th chapter of the 2d Kings, and the 37th chapter of Isaiah are alike.

The Old Testament comprises 39 books, 929 chapters, 23,214 verses, 592,493 words, 2,728,100 letters. The New Testament 27 books, 260 chapters, 181,253 verses, 838,380 letters, making a total of Independently of all considerations of its religious advantages, no book has conduced more than the Bible to the high cultivation and moral advancement of the human mind. The labor bestowed by so many of the learned, upon the just interpretation of this inestimable book, is of itself an attestation of its worth, and countenances the supposition, that Divine Providence has appointed it for the attainment of great designs.

The Bible, To Bißλov, is the name applied by way of eminence to the collection of sacred writings, otherwise called in Holy Scripture the Old and New Testament. "This volume to which both Jews and Christians respectively appeal; the former, to the Old Testament Scripture exclusively; the latter, to the Old and New Testament combined, which is emphatically termed the Bible. It comprises a great number of narratives and compositions written by inspired persons, at distant periods, in different languages, and on various subjects. Collectively, they claim to be a Divine Revelation, that is, a discovery afforded by God to man of Himself, or of his will beyond what He has vouchsafed to make known by the light of nature or reason."

Bishop Horne forcibly and beautifully remarks: "The Scriptures are the appointed means of enlightening the mind with true and saving knowledge. They show us what we were, what we are, and what we shall be. They show us what God has done for us, and what He expects us to do for him. They show us the adversaries we have to encounter, and how to encounter them with success. They show us the mercy and justice of God, the joys of Heaven, and the pains of Hell. Thus will they give to the simple an understanding of such matters as philosophy, for whole centuries, taught in vain."

ABRAHAM'S WIFE; tradition respecting her beauty.

THE rabbies have invented the following singular account of Abraham's conveyance of Sarah into Egypt. "He put her into a chest, and locked the cover of the same upon her face, jealous of her beauty being noticed. When he was come to the toll or custom-house, they said, 'Pay us custom,' and he said, 'I will pay the custom.' They said to him, 'Thou carriest clothes;' and he said, 'I will pay for the clothes.' They said to him, 'Thou carriest gold;' and he answered them, ‘I will pay for my gold.' They said to him further, 'Thou carriest the finest silk;' then he said to them, 'I will pay for the finest silk.' Farther, they said to him, 'Thou carriest pearls;' and he said to them, 'I will pay for the pearls,' and he was willing to pay custom as if he had carried such valuable things. But they said unto him, 'It cannot be, but thou must open, and show us what is within.' And when he had opened the chest, the whole land of Egypt was brightly illumined by the lustre of Sarah."—Allen.

ADAM'S designation of the Animals in Paradise allegorized.

The beasts of the field which God brought to Adam, in order that he might give them names, are the unreasonable motions of the flesh. Fowls of the air, are idle thoughts, and empty speculations. The garden of Eden the spiritual purity of the mind and the region of heavenly truth into which Paul was wrapt.-HEYWOOD.

There is a tradition that our first parents were forty days in Paradise.

CHRIST, his nativity, intercession, gracious and miraculous operations spiritualized;-Nature's recognition of her Deity;-and parallelisms illustrating the Mosaic and Christian dispensations.

Unexpressible is the Sacrament of the nativity of our Lord the God of life, which we ought rather to believe than examine. A virgin conceived and brought forth, which nature affordeth not; use knew not; reason was ignorant of; understanding conceived not. This, at which heaven wondered; earth admired; the creature, was stupefied, what human language is able to deliver! Therefore, the Evangelist, as he opened the conception and birth in a human phrase, so he shut it up in a divine secret. And, this he did to show, that it is not lawful for a man to dispute that which he is commanded to believe. And, again, how can there be the least damage unto modesty when there is interested a Deity? when an angel is the messenger; faith, the bridesmaid; chastity, the contract; virtue, the espouser; conscience, the priest; God, the cause; integrity, the conception; virginity, the birth; a maid, the mother? Let no man, therefore, judge that thing after the manner of man which is done by a divine sacrament; let no man examine a celestial mystery by earthly reason, or a secret novelty, by that which is frequent and common. Let no man measure that which is singular, by example; nor derive contumely from piety; nor run into danger by his rashness, when God has promised salvation by his goodness. What was the necessity that Mary the blessed virgin should be espoused unto Joseph? but, either because that mystery should be concealed from the devil; and so the false accuser should find no cavil against her chastity, being affianced unto an husband; or else that after the infant was born, he should be the mother's conductor into Egypt and back again. For Mary was the untouched, the unblemished, the immaculate mother of the only begotten Son of God ;-the almighty Father and Creator of all things.—of that Son who, in heaven, was without a mother;-on earth, without a father;-in heaven, (according to his Deity) in the bosom of his Father; on earth, (according to his humanity,) in the lap of his mother.-HEYWOOD.

Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!

Philosophy, therefore, if it required a lesson in humanity, may come to school here. The feeling which prompted these words touched the highest culminating point of human nature, where divinity itself begins.-SIR THOMAS BROWNE.

The fountain with which Paradise was watered is Christ: of the four rivers into which it is often parted, Pison is prudence; Gihon, temperance; Tigris (Hiddekel), fortitude; Euphrates, justice.

That of three things the world has great cause to wonder-of Christ's resurrection after death,-of his ascension to heaven in the flesh, and that by his Apostles, being no better than fishermen, the whole world should be converted. There be four miraculous imitators made by Christ-a fisherman, to be first shepherd of his flock-a persecutor, to be first master and teacher of the Gentiles-a publican, to be the first evangelist--a thief, that first entered heaven.

Would we be acquainted with the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, we must make application not to angels, for they are themselves learners, but to Christ himself.-AMBROSE.

As in the earthly Paradise there were four rivers which watered the whole earth; so in Christ, who is our Paradise, we may find four fountains; the first is the fountain of mercy, to wash away our sins by the waters of remission; the second is the fountain of wisdom, to quench our thirst with the waters of discretion; the third is the fountain of grace, to water the plants of good works with the springs of devotion; and the fourth is the crystal fountain of everlasting life whose refreshing waters issue from the mount of the heavenly Zion.

The heavens knew him, which lent him a bright star to light him into the world. The sea knew him, which against its own nature, made itself passable for his feet. The earth knew him, which shook and trembled at his passion. The sun knew him, which hid its face, and withdrew his beams from beholding so execrable an object as the crucifixion. The stones and buildings knew him, which split and rent themselves asunder. The grave and hell knew him, the one, by yielding up the dead; the other, by witnessing his descension.

The Jews reckoned up five several marks of divine favor which distinguished the first temple, and were wanting in the second. The ark of the covenant and the mercy seat which was upon it; the Shechinah or the divine presence; the Urim and Thummim; the holy fire upon the altar; and the spirit of prophecy. Now the absence of those several things was abundantly supplied by the presence of that Divine Person of whom each of them was in some measure typical. Christ may be called the ark, as he was the material representative of the Deity, in whom was deposited the perfect law of God. Like the cedar of which the ark was composed, Christ was incorruptible; and the golden crown of divinity and glory was upon him, as it was upon the ark. Angels attended him in his humiliation, and desired to penetrate the mystery of his incarnation, as the cherubim bent over the mercy seat; so is Christ the meeting place between God and man. Christ was the Shechinah, for he dwelt in the tabernacle among men, the true glory of the Shechinah. The Urim and Thummim were not required when the Messiah was on the earth. He only has given those clear oracular answers, which shall ever instruct the world; the others were but typical of that union of light and perfection which met in Him alone. Never but in him were united perfect knowledge and perfect holiness. He is the Great High Priest, who has spoken with the mouth of God. The holy fire was not necessary, it was but typical of that eternal flame of devotion, and purity, and love, which God requires, and Christ exemplified. The spirit of prophecy was not wanted, for on him rested the spirit without measure. He was the prophet like unto Moses, in bringing in a new dispensation; though greater than Moses, for he was perfect in himself, and grace and truth are better than the law. Christ united in himself all these ornaments of the first temple, and He excelled them all, inasmuch as the substance is superior to the shadow. These things, it is true, made the first temple glorious; but the glory of the second temple was indeed greater than that of the first; when Christ uniting all the realities of which the first temple were but typical, presented himself in the second temple, to the admiring and wondering crowd as the true Messiah, the expected Hope and Savior of Israel.

Socinius and his followers believed in the actual translation of Jesus to some celestial region in the interval between his baptism and his entrance upon his public ministry.

CREATION; allegorized.

"That God has taught us by the course he took in framing and fashioning the world, how we must proceed to become a new creation or a new heaven and a new earth, renewed both in soul and body. In the first day, he made the light; therefore the first thing of the new man ought to be the light of knowledge, for saith St. Paul, 'he that cometh to God must know that he is.' On the second day, he made the firmament, so called because of its steadfastness; so the second step in man's new creation must be firmamentum fidei-the sure foundation of faith. On the third day, the seas and trees bearing fruits; so the third step in the new man is, that he become waters of relenting tears, and that he bring forth fruit worthy of repentance. On the fourth day, God created the sun, that whereas on the first day there was light without heat, now on the fourth day there is light and heat joined together; so the fourth step in the new creation of the new man is, that he join the heat of zeal with the light of knowledge; as in the sacrifices, fire and salt were coupled. The fifth day's work was of fishes to play in the seas, and fowls to fly and soar towards heaven; so the fifth step, in a new creature, is to live and rejoice in a sea of troubles, and fly by prayer and contemplation heavenward. On the sixth day, God made man; now all those things before named being performed by Him, man, is a new creature. They are all thus like a golden chain concatenated into several links by Saint Peter." Add to your light of knowledge, the firmament of faith; to your faith, seas of repentant tears; to your tears, the fruitful trees of good works; to your good works, the hot sunshine of zeal; to your zeal, the winged fowls of prayer and contemplation; and so Ecce omnia facta sunt. Behold all things are made new!-HEYWOOD.

DECALOGUE; fetched from heaven by Moses, and the opposition he encountered from angelic interference.

Moses is represented by the Cabalists as having received the law, not as is commonly believed by Christians, by the condescension of the divine Majesty, on Mount Sinai; but by actually ascending into heaven to fetch it. And ample details have been given of the opposition he experienced from numerous and mighty angels, and the means by which he overcame that opposition and surmounted other difficulties and obstacles in his progress through the celestial regions.

DEITY; hieroglyphically represented.

Divers nations, but especially the Egyptians, made certain hieroglyphics to express the sole supremacy of the Deity. First, by the stork, which is a bird that hath no tongue; and God created all things in a temperate and quiet silence: inferring from this that man ought not to speak of him too freely or rashly, nor to search too narrowly into his hidden attributes. They interpreted His infinity by a circle, which hath neither beginning nor an end. So likewise by the eye; for as in all other creatures, so especially in man the eye is of his other members, the most beautiful and excellent, as the moderator and guide of our affections and actions; so God is the bright eye of the world who by the apostle James is called the Father of men, unto whose eyes all thoughts be naked and open, who looketh upon the good and bad, and searches into the reins of either.-HEYWOOD.

DEVIL; the method and ceremony of the homage performed; and the fealty paid to him, according to the ritual of witchcraft.

First, the magician or witch is brought before the tribunal of Satan, either by a familiar spirit or else by a magi or hag of the same profession, who sits crowned upon a majestic throne, surrounded by a host of other devils, who attend upon him in the capacity and dignity of lords, barons, and princes, richly appareled in the vestments of Tartarean paraphernalia. The palace or parliament-house of his satanic majesty is represented as built of beautiful marble, and the walls of which are hung with gorgeous drapery interwoven with gold and silver and purple covered arras, and designed to augment the pomp of his regality and imperial state. Satan, from his royal seat, casts his eyes round about, as if ready to incline his benign ear, by way of encouragement, to any suitor that may be presented. A devil, of venerable aspect, now steps forth and saith, "Most potent lord and master, great patron of the spacious universe, in whose hands are all the riches and treasures of the earth, and all the goods and gifts of the world, this person I present before thine imperial throne, to follow thy standard, and to fight under the patronage of thy great name and power; who is ready to acknowledge thee to be god and creator of all things, and none but thee. It shall be thy clemency, O most sovereign lord, to vouchsafe this man (or woman) the grace of thy benign aspect and receive him (or her) unto thy patronage and favor." To which Satan, with a grave countenance and loud oration answereth, “I cannot but commend this thy friend, who so cordially hath committed himself (or herself) unto our safe guard and trust; whom as our client and favorite we accept, and promise to supply him with all felicity and pleasure, both in this present life and the future." This done, the miserable wretch is commanded to renounce his faith, baptism, the eucharist, and all other holy things, and to confess Lucifer his only lord and governor; which is done with many infernal and execrable ceremonies not befitting to be here mentioned. Then is the certificate of initiation and reception written with the blood of the left thumb. After which the devil marks him either in the brow, neck or shoulders, but commonly in the more secret parts, with the stamp or character of the foot of a hare, a black dog, or a toad, or some such figure by which he brands him (as the custom was of old, to stamp their slaves and captives whom they bought for money in the market-places) to become his perpetual slave and vassal; and this the wicked spirit doeth, as desirous to imitate God in all things; who in the Old Testament marked his chosen people with the seal of circumcision, to distinguish them from the gentiles, and in the New Testament, with the sign of the cross, which succeeded that of circumcision (according to the testimony of the fathers). And as the devil is always adverse to his creator, so he will be worshipped with contrary rites and ceremonies. Therefore, whenever magicians, and witches, present themselves unto him, they worship him with their faces from, and their backs towards him, and sometimes standing upon their heads with their heels upwards, but what is most beastly and abominable of all the requisition of their homage and fealty, the devil presents unto them his forked tail to kiss; which divers magicians have confessed. Those who put themselves under any certain constellation by which to produce curious and prodigious effects, whereby the work is taken from the creator and attributed unto the creature; and all those operations of conjuration, incantation, abjuration, murmuration, together with those conventicles and nightly assemblies of sorcerers, and other diabolical inventions, have the great devil himself for their author and abettor.-HEYWOOD.

Some of the ancient writers on Sorcery, have affirmed that every magician and witch after they have passed through the ordeal of performing homage to the devil, immediately a familiar spirit is appointed to attend them, and whom they styled Magister, Martinellus, and that he is sometimes visible with them, in the shape of a dog, a rat, an Ethiope, &c. That Simon Magus had a black dog tied to him with a chain, which, if any man attempted to speak to him, with whom he did not desire any communication, he instantly sprang at him, and the offender was soon devoured.

The knowledge of devils makes them familiar with the virtues of herbs, plants, stones, minerals, &c. They understand the nature of all creatures, birds, and beasts. They possess excellent skill in all the arts and sciences. By their influence they operate on the four elements, stars and planets; are acquainted with the cause of meteors, and can produce miraculous alterations and wonderful effects in the air.-BURTON, Anatomy.

The ancient, as well as the more recent sophists, enumerate the following kinds of devils, their particular orders, and point out their respective presidencies Fiery spirits or devils, have control over blazing stars, fire drakes, ignes fatui, &c. The aerial, keep their quarters in the air, and control tempests, thunder, lightnings, &c. The water-devils, preside over naiads or water-nymphs, oceans, rivers,

&c. The terrestrial, supervise lares, genii, wood-nymphs, fairies, robin-good-fellows, forests, &c. The subterranean, are commonly seen about mines, produce earthquakes, are conversant with the centre of the earth and volcanoes, and torture the souls of men till the day of judgment. Their egress and regress are about Etna, Lipari, Mons Hecla in Iceland, Vesuvius, Terra del Fuego, &c., because many shrieks and fearful cries are continually heard thereabouts, and familiar apparitions of dead men, ghosts, goblins, &c.—BURTON, Passim.

FANATICISM; its natural character and practical effects.

The fanatic will live on better terms with angels and with seraphs, than with his children, servants or neighbors, or he is one who, while he reverences the thrones, dominions, and powers of the invisible world, vents his spleen in railing against all "dignities and powers of the earth."-ISAAC TAYLOR.

FIRMAMENT; morally considered.

If, with Seneca, we contemplate aright in imagination the magnitude and beauty of the orbs of heaven, we shall look down, with a noble indifference, on the earth as a scarcely distinguishable atom, and say, "Is it to this little spot that the great designs and most glorious desires of man are confined? Is it for this, that there is such disturbance of nature, so much carnage, and so many ruinous wars? O! folly of deceived men, to imagine great kingdoms in the compass of an atom, to raise armies to divide a point of earth with their swords! It is just as if the ants should divide their mole hills into provinces, and conceive a field to be several kingdoms, and fiercely contend to enlarge their borders and celebrate a triumph in gaining a foot of earth, or a new province to their empire. In the light of heaven, all sublunary glories fade away, and the mind is refined and ennobled, when with the eye of faith, it penetrates within the veil and descries the splendor of the heaven of heavens.

FUTURE STATE; its necessity, reality, equality, promise, and moral influence.

It is indeed a wide ocean, said the abbé, full of waves and dangers, storms and tempests; and like the Atlantic before the adventurous Genoese first crossed it, no one comes back to tell us what is beyond. But as to the eye of Columbus, enlightened by true genius, it was self-evident that to harmonize with the known world in which he dwelt, there must be another continent beyond the broad western sea; so to the eye of the religious man, enlightened by revelation, it is self-evident, that beyond the scenes of time, there must be another world to equalise all that is unequal in this.-ANONYMOUS.

If there be men dignified by the name of philosophers who can hold that the present scene of being, with all its moral evil, and physical suffering, is to be succeeded by no better or happier state of existence, just because "all things have continued as they were" five or six thousand years; their inferences respecting the future state, would not have been less conclusive, or the revealed declaration of the scripture less true, had they based it on a period, even an hundred times more extended.-HUGH MILLER.

"Plato, thou reason'st well,
Else whence this pleasing hope, this fond desire,
This longing after immortality!
Or whence this secret dread, and inward horror—
Of falling into naught? Why shrinks the soul
Back on herself, and startles at destruction?
'Tis the divinity that stirs within us,
'Tis heaven itself that points out an hereafter
And intimates eternity to man."—ADDISON.

The doctrine of a future state is not merely a speculative proposition to serve as a subject of metaphysical investigation or to be admitted merely to complete a system of philosophy or theological belief. It is a truth of the highest practical importance which ought to be interwoven with the whole train of our thoughts and actions. Yet how many are there even of those who bear the Christian name, who are incessantly engaged in boisterous disputes respecting the nature of faith, who have never felt the influence of that faith which realizes to the mind, as if actually present, the glories of the invisible world. If we really believe the doctrine of immortality, it will manifest itself in our thoughts, affections and pursuits. It will lead us to form a just estimation of the value of all earthly enjoyments. For in the sight of eternity all secular pursuits in which men now engage appear but vanity, and all the dazzling objects which fascinate these eyes, as fleeting shadows. A realizing view of an eternal state dissipates the illusion which the eye of sense throws over the pageantry and splendors of this world, and teaches us that is transitory and fading, and that our most exquisite pleasures will ere long be snatched from our embrace. For not a single mark of our sublunary honors, not a single farthing of our boasted treasures, not a single trace of the beauty of our persons, can be carried along with us to the regions beyond the grave. It will stimulate us to set our affections on things above, and to indulge in heavenly contemplations, for "where our treasure is, our hearts will be also." Rising superior to the delights of sense, and the boundaries of time, we will expatiate at large, on those boundless regions which “eye hath not seen," and contemplate in the eye of reason and revelation those scenes of felicity and grandeur which will burst upon the disembodied spirit when it has dropped its earthly tabernacle in the dust. Again, if we believe the doctrine of immortality, we will be careful to avoid those sins which would expose us to misery in the future world, and to cultivate those dispositions and virtues which will prepare us for the enjoyment of eternal felicity. Between virtue and vice, sin and holiness, there is an essential and eternal distinction, and this distinction will be fully and visibly displayed in the eternal world. He whose life is a continued scene of vicious indulgence, and who has devoted himself to “work all manner of uncleanness with greediness,” becomes by such habits a vessel of wrath fitted for destruction," and from the very constitution of things there is no possibility of his escaping the misery of the future state, if his existence be prolonged. Whereas, he who is devoted to the practice of holiness, who loves his creator with supreme affection and his neighbor as himself, who adds to his "faith virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, brotherly kindness and charity," is by the possession and exemplification of such graces, rendered fit for everlasting communion with the Father of Spirits, and for delightful association with all holy intelligences, that people his immense empire. The belief in a future state, also, will excite us to the exercise of contentment and reconcile our minds to whatever privations or afflictions, providence may allot us in this world. "For the sufferings of the present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which is to be revealed." If we believe that the whole train of circumstances connected with our present lot is arranged by wisdom and benevolence, every thing that befalls us here must have a certain bearing on the future world, and have a tendency to prepare us for engaging in its exercises, and for relishing its enjoyment. We will not rest satisfied with vague and confused conceptions of celestial bliss; but will endeavor to form as precise and definite ideas, on this subject, as the position of our sublunary condition will permit. We will search the oracles of divine revelation and the discoveries of science, and endeavor to deduce from both, the sublimest conceptions we can form of the glories of that "inheritance which is incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, which is reserved in heaven for the faithful."

GOD; understood by the works of nature and the volume of Inspiration.

Saith an old divine: we come by two ways to the knowledge and apprehension of God, by his works and by his word; by his works we learn to know there is a God, and by his word we come to know what God is. His works teach us to spell, his word to read. The first are his back parts, by which we behold Him afar off, the latter represent Him to us more visibly, and as it were "face to face." For the word is a book consisting of three leaves, and every leaf printed with many letters, and every letter containeth in itself a lecture. The leaves are heaven, the air, and the earth, with the water: the letters engraved are every angel, star and planet; the letters in the air, every meteor and fowl; those in the earth and water, every man. beast, plant, flower, mineral, fish, &c. All these, set together, spell unto us-That there is a God.

I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of

Jacob, in a special sense, not merely as their creator and preserver, which he is to all men, but as their governor, protector, supplier and friend, not of the dead, which are non-entities. In Scripture, that God is one God, and that we are his people, are correlative propositions.

The works of creation, and every thing around us, manifest the presence of God, -his radiant, life-giving circle. It is neither pantheism nor poetry alone, but the truth of nature exemplified in the variations of the seasons.

These, as they change, Almighty Father, these
Are but the varied God; the rolling year
Is full of thee. Forth in the pleasing spring
Thy beauty walks, thy tenderness and love."

Every germ that is evolving, every flower that blooms, presents to us the moving presence of God. Whenever we conceive of the operations of the laws of nature in the world, or disconnected from the power of His immediate presence, at the place where such operations exhibit themselves, we practically deny his omnipresence. It is a beautiful and instructive story of the traveller, amid the emergencies of a journey in the destitution of a desert, attracted by a flower, growing upon a stone in the arid waste, exclaiming, God is here! The blooming flower was the manifestation of his presence.

"Should fate command me to the utmost verge,
Of the great earth, to distant barbarous climes;
Rivers unknown to song; where first the sun
Gilds Indian mountains, or his setting beams
Flame on the Atlantic Isles, 'tis naught to me,
Since God is ever present, ever felt,
In the void waste, as in the city full;
And where he vital breathes there must be joy."

IMMORTALITY; Symbolized by the Tomb.

It remains for death to exhibit the glory of life. It was a beautiful superstition, that of ever-burning lamps in tombs. To seek for such, imaged well the practice of the Christian, who beholds immortality in the grave.-SLACK.

JACOB'S LADDER; its prophetic and spiritual meaning.

The Rabbins have a conceit respecting the ladder which Jacob beheld in his dream, "set upon the earth, and the top of it reaching to heaven, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon it," which they say represents the rise and fall of the four great monarchies; the seventy steps agreeing with the seventy years captivity in Babylon, or two and fifty steps representing the time of the reign of the four Assyrian kings.

In Jacob's ladder figur'd this we see,
(Which ladder Christ himself profest to be),

Of which the foot being fixt upon the ground,
The top to heaven. Thus much to us doth sound,
That in this scale, at such large distance set,
The heaven and earth at once together met.
So Christ's humanity from earth was given,
But his divinity He took from heaven;
As from earth, earthy; as from heaven divine;
Two natures, in one person, thus combine.
HEYWOOD.

JEWS; touching the prophecies relative to their present condition, and the prospective restoration to their former possession of the divine favor, and return of their national glory.

In the midst of all changes,-the vicissitudes of time,-the revolution of kingdoms, and the downfall of empires, the Jew abides the same in every particular, the same as when God led him out of Egypt, with one creed, one language, one liturgy, one sorrow, one hope, he is found in every corner of the globe, a severed fragment of that exquisite design which the Lord shall again arrange, as of old, to be the beauty and glory of the whole earth.-CHARLOTTE ELIZABETH.

JOSEPH; traditionary statement respecting his burial and the journeyings of his coffin.

Rabbi Nathan affirms that Joseph was buried in the mausoleum of a certain king of Egypt, and that Moses stood near that royal cemetery and said, Joseph, the time is arrived in which God swore that he would deliver Israel; the time is come also for Israel to fulfill the oath which thou didst impose upon them; if thou show thyself, well; but, if not, we are released from our obligation. That Joseph's coffin instantly advanced; and that Moses took it, and carried it off with him, and that during all the year that Israel passed in the wilderness, the coffin of Joseph and the ark of the Lord marched side by side.-ALLEN.

JUDGMENT DAY; its necessity, equity, and moral influence.

This is the day that must make good that great attribute of God,-his justice; that must reconcile those answerable doubts that torment the wisest understandings and resolve those seeming inequalities, and respective distributions in this world, to an equality and recompensive justice in the next. This is that one day that shall include and comprehend all that went before it; wherein, as in the last scene, all the actors must enter to complete and make up the catastrophe of this great piece. This is the day whose memory hath only power to make us honest in the dark, and to be virtuous without a witness. Ipsa sui pretium virtus sibi, that virtue is her own reward, is but a cold principle to maintain our variable resolutions in a constant and settled way of goodness.-SIR T. Browne.

MAGIC; its author and history.

Some authors have supposed the art of magic was devised before the flood, by the Devil, who communicated the invention to the giants, by whom Cham, the son of Noah, was instructed in the science of sorcery. For this abomination, with the consequences of all manner of iniquities arising therefrom, was the deluge brought upon the world, and which, after the flood, was taught by Cham to his son, Misraim, who conveyed it to the Egyptians, Babylonians and Persians, and from them imparted to the other nations of this terraqueous globe.

Other writers on magic derive the words from Theurgia or white-magic, Goetia or black-magic, or the black-art, otherwise called necromancy. The effect of the first, they imputed to good angels; and the evils of the latter they ascribed to demons; affirming the one to be lawful, and the other unlawful.

Tertullian traces all the chief luxuries of female attire, the necklaces, armlets, rouge and the black powder for the eye lashes, to the researches of fallen angels into the inmost recesses of nature, and the discoveries they were in consequence enabled to make of all that could embellish the beauty of their earthly favorites.

MESMERISM; a characteristic and medical anecdote.

REMARKS. The daring follies and satanic delusions of the present day are not entitled to the merit or charm of novelty, as regards either their source, principles, designs, peculiarities or practices; being in spirit-in facto-precisely the same as those which existed during the dark and sanguinary period when witchcraft prevailed in England. Fortune-telling is now exploded, and entirely confined to the simplicity of silly and ignorant girls; pronounced by law a misdemeanor, and punishable upon the indictment of obtaining money under false pretences.

During the reigns of the Charles's, and the interregnum of the Protectorate, these abominations were rife. Modern Millerism corresponds to the Millenium of the Fifth-Monarchy-Men; whilst other similar vagaries, which have recently startled or seduced the imbeciles of the passing hour, are merely modified to meet the advanced stage of the scientific knowledge of a progressive civilization; putting on the disguise of new names and assuming the different dress of a changed appearance, to distinguish them from such as originated in the dark, superstitious and disastrous times of English history, when the corrupting influence of courtly intrigues, commingled with the subversive errors of a headlong fanaticism, and those heretical dogmas which provoked the outbreak "the confusion worse confounded"- of those sanguinary and sectarian conflicts which have ever attended the unyielding hostilities, fierce and violent struggles of religious denominations for the ascendency to supreme authority, or the tyranny of despotic power, so dishonoring to the benevolent character of a Catholic Christianity, as well as abhorrent to those essential principles which involve the inalienable and sacred rights of civil and religious liberty, whose safe and solid base alone affords a sure foundation upon which to erect the various and stately superstructures of social, political, and ecclesiastical institutions; rendered most durable and attractive when built according to the glorious order of a divine architecture, and adorned by the chaste ornaments of those plastic and apostolic rules, taught and perfected only in the school of Christ.-G. C.

By the spirits called Lares, or household gods, many men have been driven into strange melancholies. Amongst others I will cite one least common. A young man had a strong imagination that he was dead, and did not only abstain from the use of meat and drink, but importuned his parents that he might be carried into his grave and buried before his flesh was quite putrefied. By the counsel of physicians, he was wrapped up in a winding sheet and laid upon a bier, and so carried toward the church upon men's shoulders. But, by the way, two or three pleasant fellows, suborned to that purpose, meeting the hearse, demanded aloud of them that followed it, whose body it was there coffined and carried to burial? They said it was such a young man's, and told them his name. Surely (replied one of them), the world is very well rid of him, for he was a man of a very bad and vicious life, and his friends may rejoice he hath rather ended his days thus, than at the gallows. Which the young man hearing, and vexed to be so injured, roused himself up upon the bier, and told them that they were wicked men to do him that wrong, which he had never deserved, and told them, that if he were alive, as he was not, he would teach them to speak better of the dead. But they proceeding to deprave him, and give him much disgraceful and contemptible language, he not being able to endure it, leapt from the hearse and fell about their ears with such rage and fury that he ceased not buffeting with them till quite wearied, and by his violent agitation the humors of his body altered, he awakened as out of a sleep or trance, and being brought home and comforted with wholesome diet, he within a few days recovered both his pristine health, strength and understanding.*

"Time is, that I, being a young man, writ of Magical Art three books in one volume, sufficiently large, which I entitled of Hidden Philosophy; in which wheresoever I have erred through the vain curiosity of youth, now in my better and more ripe understanding I recant in this palinode. I confess I have spent much time in these vanities, in which I have only profited thus much, that I am able to was enticed to proceed over its rugged and unpolished pages even after the fatigue and lateness of business—from occasionally meeting with a brilliant sentiment and diamond thought. The volume is an omnium gatherum of astrology, astronomy, cosmogony, mythology, philosophy, sorcery, theology, talmudic traditions, pagan fables, puritanical research and literature. And I am further induced to insert (using modern orthography) the additional remarks of the author respecting himself, as they embrace an admirable moral, and present a pointed and warning rebuke to such whose propensity to waste their time and indulge their fancies and mar their usefulness in the absurdities and wonders of supernaturalism bear an inverse ratio to their belief in the mysteries and truths and requisitions of the Bible.-G. C.

MESSIAH; Traditions relating to the Blessings and Celebration of Christ's Kingdom.

The felicities and glories which will usher in the government of the Messiah is to be celebrated by a royal festival, to which all Israelites will be invited, and seated every one beside a golden table. As all other kings and princes on the occasion of a public festival are accustomed to entertain their guests with spectacles and games; so this banquet of the Messiah is to be introduced by a sportive exhibition. He will amuse the company with a battle between Behemoth and Leviathan, as it is written, "Thus shall the beasts of the field play." Job i. 20. The various feats of Behemoth will be highly gratifying to the Messiah. "These also shall please the Lord better than an ox or bullock that hath horns and hoofs." Psal. lxix: 31. But Leviathan shall advance to the contest armed with his scales, as with a breastplate and coat of mail dreadful to behold. The battle will be fierce; but the combatants being equally matched, neither will be victorious. They will both fall exhausted with fatigue. Then Messiah with a drawn sword shall stab and slay them both. "In that day the Lord, with his sore and great and strong sword shall punish Leviathan the piercing serpent, even Leviathan that crooked serpent." Isaiah xxvii. 1. These huge animals, together with Bar Juchine the enormous bird, are then to be spitted and laid to the fire, and all requisite preparations to be made for the splendid banquet, as it is written: "And on this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees, of fat things full of marrow, of wine on the lees well refined. Isaiah xxv. 6. Having provided three courses of flesh, fish and fowl; the rabbies have supplied this sumptuous feast of the Messiah with the customary appendages. The dessert will consist of the most delicious fruits, the produce of the garden of Eden, including some of the fruit taken from the tree of life; the choicest and most exquisite wines of the vintage of Paradise, prepared immediately after the creation, and preserved in Adam's wine-cellar ever since, expressly for this glorious occasion. "In that day sing ye unto her, a vineyard of red wine, I the Lord do keep it." Isaiah xxvii. 2, 3. "In the hand of the Lord there is a cup, and the wine is red, it is full of mixture, and he poureth out of the same." Psalms lxxv. 8. "Since the beginning of the world men have not heard, nor perceived by the ear, neither hath the eye seen, O God, besides thee, what he hath prepared for him that waiteth for him.” Isaiah lxiv. 4. At the conclusion of the feast Messiah is represented as filling a cup, over which, according to usual custom, a grace will be pronounced; that the company giving glory to God will beseech him to undertake the office; resembling that of the cup-bearer that God will offer it Michael, Michael to Gabriel, Gabriel to Abraham, Abraham to Isaac, Isaac to Moses, Moses to Joshua; that all these declining the office as being unworthy of such high honor, will at last assign it to David; declaring it will be proper for an earthly king to perform this service to the King of Heaven,-that David will say, "Well! then I will give thanks and this office becomes me as it is said," "I will take the cup of salvation and will call upon the name of the Lord." Psalms cxvi. 13. And that this cup will contain two hundred and fourteen gallons, as it is said, "My cup runneth over." Psalms xxiii. 5. The luxuries and provisions remaining on the table will be distributed amongst the guests, who will expose them to sale at the market-place at Jerusalem; that of the part of the skin of Leviathan will be made tabernacles, pavilions or awnings for the just; and that the rest will be spread upon the walls of Jerusalem, diffusing a light to the extremities of the world; as it is written, “And kings shall come to the brightness of thy rising." Isaiah lx. 3. The banquet will be succeeded, and the festival concluded by music and dancing; God entertaining the just, with music and dancing, and will himself sit in the midst of them, in the garden of Eden, and every one will point to him with an outstretched finger. "And it shall be said in that day, Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him; we will be glad, and rejoice in his salvation." Isaiah xxv. 9.-ALLEN.

RESURRECTION; Physically Explained and Illustrated; and Symbolized by Funereal Trees, Ornamental Flowers, and Perennial Shrubs.

During the life of any animal its particles are in a state of ceaseless change; the organism of to-day is not that of yesterday. When this removal of particles ceases to take place, according to vital laws, the organism decays. But who shall say that the power which brought them together decays also? All that we know is, that we no longer see the same process conducted; but that does not prove annihilation. All action that we are acquainted with produces reaction; and perhaps, if life operates on matter, matter operates on life. This action may, for aught we know, be needful for the development of the soul; but the necessity of that precise mode of it which takes place in what we call a living organism, is only for a time. Death is only one of change, and change has its relation to Time; it is a relation, not an absolute existence. The opponents of the natural evidence of immortality, appeal to the triumph of death in the lower world; but they know not what those triumphs are, nor to what extent they go. Nature is the art of God. It seems a constant plan of nature to build exquisite structures with worthless and often loathsome materials. The brilliant plant and the phosphorescent light spring from putrescence; and among the decay of expectations and the mangled relics of happiness, hope blossoms and shows at once a flower and a star. That in strewing their tombs the Romans affected the rose; the Greeks the amaranthus and myrtles; that the funeral pyre consisted of sweet fuel, cypress, fir, larix, yew, and trees perpetually verdant, lay silent expressions of their surviving hopes; wherein Christians which deck their coffins with bays, have found a more elegant emblem; for that tree seeming dead will restore from the root, and its exsuccous leaves assume their verdure again. Whether the planting of the yew in church yards hold not its original from ancient funeral rites, or as an emblem of the Resurrection, from its perpetual verdure, may also admit conjecture. If in the decretory term of the world, we shall not all die, but be changed according to received translation; the last day will make but few graves; at least quick resurrection will anticipate lasting sepulchres; some graves will be opened before they be quite closed, and Lazarus be no wonder. When many that feared to die shall groan that they can die but once; the dismal state is the second and living death, when life puts despair on the damned; when men shall wish the covering of mountains, not of monuments, and annihilation shall be courted.-SIR THOMAS BROWNE.

Death is as necessary to the constitution as sleep. We shall rise refreshed in the morning-DR. FRANKLIN.

SAINT PAUL'S traditional descent into Hell.

Adam de Ross thus sings of St. Paul's descent into hell. The Archangel Michael performs the office of guide to the apostle. "My good son," says he to him, "follow me without fear and without suspicion." God commands me to show to thee the gnashing of teeth, the pangs and the anguish which sinners undergo. Michael goes first; Paul follows, repeating psalms. At the gate of hell grows a tree of fire; from its branches hang the souls of misers and scandal-mongers. The air is full of flying imps, who drag the wicked to the furnace. The two travellers pursue their way through the desolate regions. The archangel explains to the apostle the torments inflicted for different crimes; from the bosom of an immense forge a vast wave, in which burning furnaces roar and sparkle, issue rivers of molten metals, in which demons are disporting. The further the envoys of heaven penetrate into the bowels of the earth the more terrible become the torments, and St. Paul is filled with pity. They arrive at the mouth of a pit, sealed with the seven seals. The archangel removes the seals, and pushes back the apostle, till the pestilential vapor exhaled from the pit has passed off. From the bottom of this pit ascend the moan of the greatest sinners. St. Paul inquires how long their punishment shall last. "One hundred and forty thousand years," replies St. Michael, "though I am not quite sure of it." The apostle begs the archangel to implore the Almighty to mitigate the punishment of these reprobate spirits. Their prayers, joined by those of other compassionate angels, are granted. God ordains that in future the tortures shall be suspended from Saturday till Monday morning. St. Brandan, in his voyage to the terrestrial paradise, had obtained the same favor for Judas.--CHATEAUBRIAND.

SATAN; his subtlety, temptations and delusions.

The devil would persuade me that the brazen serpent was no miracle, but merely operated by sympathy; and to the misapplication of our studies would resolve all phenomena into natural causes. Thus the devil played at chess with me, and yielding a pawn thought to gain a queen from me, taking advantage of my honest endeavors; and whilst I labored to raise the structure of my reason, he strived to undermine the edifice of faith.-SIR THOMAS BROWNE.

The time when the fall of Satan and his angels took place is generally imagined to have preceded the creation of the world; and some have accounted for it by the supposition that the arch-fiend and his angels, being informed of God's purpose to create man after his own image, and to dignify his nature by Christ's assuming it, and thinking their glory to be thus eclipsed, coveted the happiness of man, and so revolted; and with this opinion that of the Mahometans has some affinity, who are taught that the devil, who was once of those angels who are nearest God's presence, and named Azazel, forfeited Paradise for refusing to worship or pay homage to Adam at the command of God. But whatever was the occasion or mode by which it was manifested, pride seems to have been the leading sin, and it ultimately terminated in rebellion and apostacy.

Lipara. Vulcan's art doth nothing in this internal militia; wherein not the armor of Achilles, but the armature of St. Paul, gives the glorious day, and triumphs, not leading up to the capitol, but into the highest heavens.

Let not fortune, which hath no name in Scripture, have any in thy divinity. Let Providence, not chance, have the honor of thy acknowledgment, and be thy Edipus in contingencies. Mark well the paths and windings thereof; but be. not too wise in the construction or sudden in application. The hand of Providence often in abbreviatures, hieroglyphics, and short characters which, like the Laconicism on the wall, are not to be made out but by hint or key from that spirit which indited them.

We fall not from virtue, like Vulcan, in a day. We are not left without parentheses of consideration, thoughtful rebukes, and merciful interventions to recall us unto ourselves.

It is the heaviest stone that melancholy can throw at a man, to tell him he is at the end of his nature; and there is no future state to come; unto which this seems progressional, and otherwise made in vain. But man is a noble animal,-splendid in ashes, pompous in the grave, solemnizing nativities and deaths with equal lustre, not omitting ceremonies of bravery in the infancy of his nature.

Enjoy the whole world in the hermitage of thyself. Thus the old ascetic Christians formed a paradise in a desert, and with little converse on earth, held a conversation in heaven; thus they astronomized in caves, and though they beheld not the stars, had the glory of heaven before them.

Opinion rides upon the neck of reason; and men are happy, wise or learned, according as that empress sets them down in the register of reputation.

Some negroes who believe in the resurrection think that they shall rise white. Even in this life regeneration may imitate resurrection; our black and various tinctures may wear off, and goodness clothe us with candor. Good admonitions knock not always in vain. There will be signal examples of God's mercy, and the angels must not want their charitable rejoicings for the conversion of lost sinners.

The universe is one grand miracle.

The great advantage of this mean life is thereby to stand in a capacity of a better; for the colonies of heaven must be drawn from earth, and the sons of the first Adam are only heirs unto the second.

I cannot contemn a man for ignorance, but behold him with as much pity as I do Lazarus. It is no greater charity to clothe his body, than apparel the nakedness of his soul.-SIR THOS. BROWNe.

The poets considered wisdom and virtue the two wings by which we aspire and attain unto the knowledge of God.

A dialogue between two infants in the womb concerning the state of this world, might handsomely illustrate our ignorance of the next; whereof methinks, we yet discourse in Plato's den, and are but embryo philosophers.

As the Son is begotten of the Father, and the Holy Ghost proceedeth both from one and the other; in like manner is the will engendered of the understanding and memory. And as the three persons of the Trinity are but one God, so these three powers, understanding, will, and memory, and faculties of the mind, make but one soul.

Age is the sauce of a wise man, and a wise man is the meat of age, for not by age, but by travel and industry, wisdom is obtained.

The serpent that tempted Eve had the face of a woman, quod similia similibus applaudant. That like might be pleasing to like.

HEYWOOD.

The worlds of matter and of spirit are full of analogies. Indeed matter is only Divine thoughts visible and tangible to human sense. SLACK.

Pyramids, arches, obelisks, were but the irregularities of vainglory and the wild enormities of ancient magnanimity. But the most magnanimous resolutions rest in the Christian religion, which trampleth upon pride, and sits upon the neck of ambition; humbly pursuing that infallible perpetuity into which all others must diminish their diameters and be poorly seen in the angles of contingency.

Evenus, an elegiac poet of Pharos, was the first it is said, that enunciated the proverb that "Habit was second nature.”

It were better to have no opinion of God at all, than such an opinion as is unworthy of Him,-for the one is unbelief, the other contumely.-LORD BACON.

SILENCE; Figuratively Recommended.

Nature has afforded us double eyes and ears to behold all objects and listen to all voices and sounds; but to warn us that we should be sparing in our speech, she hath afforded man but one tongue, and that portalled with lips, and portcullised with teeth, near to which are placed the five senses, to signify to us that we ought to speak nothing rashly, without their counsel and advice, with the help of the faculties of the soul, which are reason and understanding, which have their residence in the brain.

Silence is a gift without price, and a treasure without enemies.

SIMILITUDES; Moral, Devotional, and Allegorical.

What the pilot is in the ship; what the charioteer is in the chariot; what the leader of the song is in the chorus or anthem; what the law is in the city; the same is God in the world. God, if thou respecteth his force! is the most able; if his features! He is the most beautiful; if His life! immortal; if his virtue! He is the most excellent.-HEYWOOD'S HIERARCHIE.

We have for the sea, the world; for the ship, the church; for our mast, the cross; for the sails, repentance; for our pilot, Christ; for the wind, the Holy Ghost.-ST. CHRYSOSTOM.

Where nature fills the sails the vessel goes smoothly on; and when judgment is the pilot, the insurance need not be high. When industry builds upon nature, we may expect pyramids.

But as eagles when they rest, and the lions when they walk; the one plucks in his talons, the other his claws to keep them sharp, as loath to dull them till they meet their prey; so it is not fit we should trouble our heads, or exercise our wits upon things impertinent, but rather reserve them for things only behoofull and necessary.

Avarice, the offspring of usury and extortion, makes the nobleman mortgage his estates, the lawyer pawn his Lyttleton, the physician sell his Galen, the soldier his sword, the merchant his ship, and the world its peace and happiness. She is drawn in a chariot with four wheels, which are called pusillanimity, inhumanity, contempt of God, and forgetfulness of death. The beasts harnessed to it are tenacity and rapacity, which are guided and governed by the cruel charioteer named a greedy-desire-of-having.

Men's miseries, calamities, and ruins are the devil's banqueting dishes.

That in the spiritual building, the foundation below is placed in humility, the breadth thereof is disposed in charity, the height thereof is erected in good works, and is tiled and covered by Divine protection, and perfected in the length of patience.-HEYWOOD.

Nearly every part of the world has its representative in the human frame; for the head is heaven, of which the eyes are the stars; we consist of four elements; in the womb we are curled up into a ball; and when we stretch out our arms, a line drawn around us would be a circle.

SOUL: Jewish Traditions respecting it, together with a variety of Curious and Mythological particulars, and Classical Allusions ;-its Nature, Transmigrations, Modifications and Destiny.

All the souls of the Israelites, it is said, were contained in the soul of the first man, and were made ready on the entrance of every Israelite into this world. The number of souls of the Israelites are calculated to amount to six hundred thousand, and therefore the soul of the first man consisted of that number twisted together like so many threads. Of these six hundred thousand souls that there is never one man wanting, which shows them to be a model of the upper chariot, in which are to be found six hundred thousand sciences. Another rabbinical work gives the following luminous statement.

"The number of souls is six hundred thousand; and the law is the root of the souls of the Israelites, and every verse in the law was six thousand explanations, and every soul is formed particularly out of one explanation.

It is also necessary to be known, according to the doctrine of the Cabalist, says Menasseh, that at the beginning of the world souls were created by God in pairs, consisting each of a male and female; and therefore they affirm that marriage is either a reward or punishment, according to the works which a man has done. For if a man is deserving, and accounted worthy, he obtains his original consort; the person with whom he was created is bestowed upon him as a reward. But if otherwise, he is punished by being united to a person of uncongenial disposition and manners; with whom he is doomed to live in almost continual strifes, contentions and other similar miseries. As there is one mansion for the residence of those souls who never yet descended into the world, there is said to be another, for the reception of those who have departed out of this life, and on the decease of the body have returned to their source and origin."

The following passage professes to describe the manner in which a soul is received on its arrival in the latter of these places. When a soul first enters Paradise, particularly if beloved or related to any that are there, it is immediately welcomed by them with pleasant countenances; and as the people of this world delighting to hear news from distant parts, put many questions to strangers concerning them; so do the righteous, who are already in Paradise, welcome the arrival of their friends and kindred, and ask them concerning the affairs of this world.

The doctrine of the metempsychosis, or that one soul animates several bodies in succession, has been generally adopted by the Jews for many ages, and is professed by them to the present day. The revolution of souls from one body to another, says Menasseh, is a matter of justifiable faith throughout our whole community. Nor are there more than one or two rabbies who deny or reject it. But there is another very great party of the Sages of Israel who believe it; and they maintain it to be a fundamental or principle of the law, and as we are bound to hearken to the words of these teachers, so we are to embrace their faith, without doubt or hesitation. The rabbies seem not to be very eminent for their gallantry or courtesy to the ladies. "The soul of a woman goes into a man for reward," says Menasseh, "but the soul of a man passes into a woman for punishment such a punishment comes to pass on account of some heavy sin. The Cabbalists, also, believe that souls are removed out of bodies of one kind into bodies of another kind. The soul of a man passes into a beast if he has committed one more sin than he has performed good works. Some of the builders of Babel are declared to have entered cats and monkeys; and some are said to migrate into noxious reptiles and insects. The soul of a governor who proudly exalts himself above his people, into a bee. The soul of a cruel and wicked tax-gatherer, for his cruelty to the poor, into a raven in which he was recognized by a sagacious rabbi.

The souls of the righteous, whose conversation is with the law, into a fish. Other souls migrate into vegetables. For certain crimes a soul migrates into the leaf of a tree, sometimes passing from leaf to leaf, through several leaves. The soul of him who utters slanders passes into a stone. Rabbi Isaac Luria went on a time into the city of Tiberias; and passing by the great school of Rabbi Jochanan, who was then living, he showed his disciples a stone in the wall and said to them, "Into that stone has entered a soul that cries to me to pray for her; and this is the mystery of the words, For the stone shall cry out of the wall."—Hab. ii. 11. The soul of him that sheds blood goes into the water; the height of the punishment being in cataracts.

Some souls are said to transmigrate into water-mills. The Jews, doubtless, borrowed the tenet from the Gentiles. It is known to have been widely diffused in the heathen world, from the Druids of Gaul and Britain, to the Brahmins of India. The Egyptians, according to Herodotus, are the first who asserted the doctrine that the soul of man is immortal, but that when the body decays it enters into some other animal which is then born; and that after having passed through all the different species of beasts, fishes, and birds, it again enters into a new born human body, and that the revolution is accomplished in three thousand years.

Know, curious reader, says Menasseh, that there are souls that migrate after a different manner, which among the Cabbalists is called Ibbur, or impregnation. The souls of the righteous, without any impairment of themselves, impregnated other souls; darting out sparks for the aid of the generality, or any particular person, of their times, and in this respect resemble candles, suffering no diminution from others being lighted by them. Some have said that the soul of Seth was pure and unspotted, and was, on account of Israel, conveyed to Moses, to qualify him for the delivery of the law. The souls which pass through the mystery of Ibbur, may return or depart at any time. The souls of Moses and Aaron came through the Ibbur to the soul of Samuel, and through Ibbur another spirit entered into Caleb, which strengthened and guided him in the right way, that he might not join the report of the spies.

Pythagoras asseverated to his disciples, that as a peculiar privilege, vouchsafed to him by Mercury, he had been first Æthalides, the reputed son of Mercury; then Euphorbus, who was slain by Menelaus at the siege of Troy, next Hermotimus.

"Even I, who these mysterious truths declare,
Was once Euphorbus in the Trojan war."

The soul of this philosopher is also represented as having been once embodied in a female named Alce, possessing surprising beauty, but divested of all chastity. Empedocles, an advocate of this Pythagorean dogma, started the notion of transmigration into vegetables, pointing out the degrees of preference due to different migrations, having declared that he had previously existed in human bodies, male and female, and also, to have been a bird, a fish, and a shrub. Among vegetables his predilection was for the laurel; among animals, for the lion; but honored mankind by saying that migration into a human body was most desirable of all.

Plato supposed the human soul to be an emanation from the divinity, Divina particulum aure, and that after the purification of various transmigrations it was again re-absorbed into the divine essence. The souls of those that have made their belly their god, and loved nothing but indolence and impurity, into the bodies of asses. Those who loved only injustice, rapine and tyranny, animated wolves, hawks and falcons. Those remarkable for popular and civil virtues, migrate into bees and ants, and again return into human bodies. Various Authors.

The Druids believed in the immortality of the soul, and its transmigration into different objects; and the clouds as palaces for its reception when it departed from the bodies of their warriors and great men.

The Mexican or American Indians indulged in similar fancies respecting the immortality and metamorphosis of the soul. Their chiefs who died in battle, and their wives who expired in childbirth, ascended up to the house of the sun, as the Lord of Glory; every day hailing his beam with demonstrations of joy, and the animation of vocal and instrumental music. After four years, these souls animated clouds, birds, or descended to the earth again. Those who were struck with lightning or died of diseases, and children sacrificed to Thalve, went to a place called Talocan, the paradise of that God. Those guilty of heinous crimes went to Mitchau or hell.-CHESTER.

Some of the ancient philosophers affirmed that spirits were of divers qualities, and operated upon men according to their different dispositions. Those of an ethereal or fiery temperament stirred up to contemplation. Those that were aerial to the business and common affairs of life.

The watery to pleasures; the earthy to base and grovelling avarice; the martial to fortitude; the jovial to prudence; the lunary to fertility of offspring; the voluptuous to licentiousness; the mercurial to policy and wisdom; the saturnine from all things that be evil. Such was the Socraticum Demonium, or genius of Socrates.—HEYWOOD.

They also indulge the conceit that the soul, together with the body, is derived from some seminal principles; others, that God created and infused souls into bodies when they are formed in the womb; others, that God framed them, first, when He created all things, and now assigns them to us, according to his pleasure.

The ancients used music at their funerals, to excite or quiet the affections of their friends, according to different harmonies. But the sweet and symbolical hint was the harmonical nature of the soul, which, delivered from the body, went again to enjoy the primitive harmony of heaven, from whence it first descended, which, according to the progress traced by antiquity, came down by Cancer and ascended by Capricornus. That they sucked in the last breath of their expiring friends, was surely a practice of no medical institution, but a loose opinion that the soul passed that way, and a fondness of affection, from some Pythagorical foundation, that the spirit of one body passed into another, which they wished might be their own.

As the doctrine of the certain existence of another world is one of the chief truths to be enforced upon man, a visible ascension into heaven has taken place in the three stages of development of the great scheme of Redemption. Enoch, Elijah, and Christ, proved to the world, by their ascension to heaven, the truth of the immortality of the soul, and that its future happiness is the object which God has constantly in view under every mode of appealing to his creatures.

I believe that the whole frame of a beast doth perish, and is left in the same state after death as before it was materialed into life; that the souls of men know neither contrary or corruption; that they subsist beyond the body and out-live death by the privilege of their proper natures, and without a miracle; that the souls of the faithful as they leave will take possession of heaven; that those apparitions and ghosts of departed persons are not the wandering souls of men, but the unquiet walks of devils, prompting and suggesting unto us mischief, blood, and villainy, instilling and stealing into our hearts; that the blessed spirits are not all at rest in their ground, but wander solicitous of the affairs of the world, but that those phantasms appear often, and do frequent cemeteries, charnel-houses, and churches, it is because those are dormitories of the dead, where the devil, like an insolent champion, beholds with pride, the spoils and trophies of his victory over Adam.

This is that dismal conquest we all deplore, that makes us so often cry, O! Adam, quid fecisti! I thank God I have not those strait ligaments or narrow obligations to the world as to dote on life, or be convulsed and tremble at the name of death.-SIR THOS. BROWNE.

The soul is an inseparable portion of the great universal mind; in other words of Brahma,—like the being from whom it emanates, it is therefore indestructible. It knows no distinction of time, it is free, immutable and eternal. The mind cannot pierce it; water cannot drown it. The earth cannot absorb it.

It is beyond the reach of the elements, invulnerable, invisible, universal, subsisting in all places and at all times, and victorious over death.-Sacred Books of the Brahmins.

Our inquiries respecting the nature of the soul must be bound over to religion, for otherwise they will be open to many errors. For since the substance of the soul was not deduced from the mass of heaven and earth, but immediately from God, how can the knowledge of the reasonable soul be derived from philosophy? It must be drawn from the same inspiration from whence its substance first flowed.-LORD BACON.

WOMEN; prototypes of the absurd and unsexing order of modern Socialism.

Lastheniæ, of Mautinea, and Axiotheo, of Phylsia, were two female disciples of Plato, who habited themselves like men, because they ridiculously conceived that that unnatural manner of dress best suited the dignity of pagan philosophy.

PROEMIA L.

But, oh! the exceeding grace
Of God Most High, that loves his creatures so,

And all his works with mercy doth embrace,
That blessed Angels he sends to and fro,—
How oft do they their silver bowers leave,
To come to succor us, that succor want!
And all for love, and nothing for reward:
Oh! why should God in heaven to man have such regard!
Man he made, and for him built
Magnificent this world, and earth his seat,
Him Lord pronounc'd; and, oh! indignity!
Subjected to his service Angel-wings,
And flaming ministers to watch and tend
Their earthly charge.

When Thou, attended gloriously from heaven,
Shalt in the sky appear, and from Thee send
The summoning Archangels to proclaim
Thy dread tribunal! forthwith from all winds
The living, and forthwith the cited dead
Of all past ages, to the general doom
Shall hasten.

INTRODUCTION

The first Mandaean book which came into my hands was a small volume of two hundred and thirty-eight pages in a poor handwriting. It was presented to me by an old Mandaean silversmith a year or two after the first world war. This volume inspired me with curiosity, and later, when I had read Lidzbarski's translations and had studied Nöldeke's Mandäische Grammatik, I found that it contained prayers for the minor ablutions, the daily office (the 'niania) and the masiqta prayers.

An early visit to 'Amarah resulted in the acquisition of a damaged and imperfect copy of the entire codex, I mean prayers considered canonical and still used by priests. A head priest (a ganzibra) copied into it some of the missing pages, and to these I added others when I had had access to other MSS. Complete copies of the collection are hard to come by, for they are in constant use.

It was not until many years later, in the spring of 1954, that I persuaded the owner of a prayerbook, himself a ganzibra, to give me his in exchange for a money gift, for sacred manuscripts are never bought. This codex, No. 53 of my collection, is in a good hand and from it very little was missing. That little I was able to supplement from D.C. 3 and other fragments of the liturgical prayers that I had acquired or seen. It is this manuscript which is photographed and reproduced for the present volume, and into it, regardless of desecration, I have pasted numbering to correspond with the numbers in the translation, following throughout the arrangement of the prayers in the original.

Of the canonical prayers used for centuries by the priests fragments had reached Europe. In 1867 Euting transcribed the Qulasta (a word which means "collection") from manuscripts in Paris and London, and this provided Lidzbarski with the greater part of his Mandäische Liturgien published in Berlin in 1920. Whilst this volume contains all the baptism prayers and masiqta prayers, it represented only about a third of the complete book possessed by Mandaean priests. Important sections, such as the Blessed Oblation prayers and the Coronation prayers are missing.

In presenting the full version I ventured to re-translate into English, and sometimes to differ from the translations made by Lidzbarski. His was a brilliant and scholarly achievement. However, the possession and study of a number of texts unknown to him and, above all, a personal knowledge of Mandaean rites as I have seen them performed and explained by celebrants, elucidate some obscurities although, indeed, far too many still exist, for the language used by gnostics is purposely archaic, symbolic and intended to mystify. Translation often limps when forced into literal rendering of obscure passages. I have been helped by the perusal of ritual texts. These, forbidden to the Mandaean layman, contain traditional teaching about the symbolism and true meaning of the ancient rites during which prayers are recited.

That an ancient gnostic sect should have survived into our time is remarkable: that so many of their writings, their magical texts, their secret doctrine in the ritual scrolls and their liturgical literature has been preserved, is little short of a miracle.

The sect is dying out rapidly: priests are few and old and the numbers of the faithful dwindle year by year. I feel it a privilege to have been brought so nearly into contact with a religion which may before long become extinct.

THE CANONICAL PRAYERBOOK OF THE MANDAEANS

My Lord be praised!

In the name of the Great First Other-Worldly (lit. "strange") Life! From far-off [1] worlds of light that are above all works may there be healing, victory, soundness, speech and a hearing, joy of heart and forgiving of sins for me, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš through the strength of Yawar-Ziwa and Simat-Hiia!

I

In the name of the Life and in the name of Knowledge-of-Life (Manda-ḏ-Hiia) and in the name of that Primal Being who was Eldest and preceded water, radiance, light and glory, the Being who cried with His voice and uttered words. By means of His voice and His words Vines grew and came into being, and the First Life was established in its Abode.

And He spoke and said, "The First Life is anterior to the Second Life by six thousand myriad years and the Second Life anterior to the Third Life by six thousand myriad years and the Third Life more ancient than any 'uthra by six thousand myriad years. And any 'uthra is older than the whole earth and older than the Seven Lords of the House [2] by seven hundred and seventy thousand myriad years. There is that which is infinite.

At that time there was no solid earth and no inhabitants in the black waters. From them, from those black waters, Evil was formed and emerged, One from whom a thousand thousand mysteries proceeded and a myriad myriad planets with their own mysteries.

The Seven were wroth with me, were outraged and said, "The man who set out and came towards us hath not bound a circlet [3]) about his head!" Then I turned my face toward my Creator who created me, the celestial Lord of Greatness, and I said to Him, "O my Creator who created me, (O) Lord of lofty Greatness! As I went (my ways) the Seven were wroth with me and said, 'The man who went and came towards us hath not bound a circlet about his head!'."

[1] Yatiria (masc. plu.) could refer either to "the Life" (plu.) or to "worlds". The meaning of yatiria ("many", "exceeding", "surpassing", "many", "far-off", "strange" etc.) is vague. Elsewhere in this book I vary the translation, which is uncertain.

[2] "the House" = the earthly world.

[3] In all later texts klila (lit. "circlet") and here probably "crown", means always "wreath".

Then that Lord of Lofty Greatness took a circlet of radiance, light and glory and set it on my head; He laid on me His hand of Truth [1]) and His great right hand of healings and said to me, "Upon thee shall rest something of the likeness of Sam-Gufna and of Sam-Gufaian and of Sam-Pira-Hiwara (Sam-the-White-Fruit?), whose radiance gleams and whose appearance beams, for they are holy and believing beings in the Place of Light and in the everlasting[2]) Abode."

And Manda-ḏ-Hiia, the valorous 'uthra, taught, revealed and said "Every Naṣoraean man who is righteous and believing, on arising from sleep, must take a white turban symbolising the great mystery of radiance, light and glory and shall recite this prayer thereon. And he shall twist it round his head and repeat the prayer secretly. It will be his praise in the house of the great Celestial Father. And all persons [3]) who behold him will be subdued in his presence: any persecutor, or one who inciteth to wrath, will stand before him in fear, terror and trembling, (their knees) knocking together. And for me, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš, who have prayed this prayer and (these) devotions, there will be forgiving of sins and I shall be pure in all my words. And Life is victorious.

Illumined and illuminating is [4]) Zihrun, the great Mystery of radiance, light and glory, from whom Manda-ḏ-Hiia emanated and was divulged, and from whose very Self noble sons of the mighty and sublime Life proceeded. He created 'uthras at his right and his left and installed them in their own škintas. 1) And they gave out light and were effulgent in their own raiment and gloried in the knowledge that their Father had transplanted them from the House of Life. And it is incumbent 2) on a pupil to honour his Master like his parents, (so) the 'uthras rose on (their?) thrones of radiance, light and glory and took off the crowns on their heads and placed them on the thrones of radiance, light and glory, saying, "A teacher is superior to parents! Rise, our Father, in praise, and lay on me Thy hand of truth and Thy great right hand of healings!" And Life be praised!

[1]) Kušṭa = Right, Troth, Truth, Sincerity, "a pact" "oath" etc. It is the name given to the rite of giving the hand in pact, and is personified. The hand-ceremony is linked with a kiss.

[2]) Taqna has a double meaning (a) lustrous, gleaming (b) enduring, durable, constant (particularly when in antithesis to baṭla in daura baṭla, "the abode that comes to nought".

[3]) Almia ("world") is also "persons".

[4]) Zhir umzahra also = "secure and assured". A play on words.

[This prayer is the opening 3) prayer of "In the name of that First Being"]

In the name of the Life!

Life created Yawar-Ziwa 4), son of Light-of-Life, Hamgai-Ziwa son of Hamgagai-Ziwa. Illumined and illuminating is the Great Mystery of Radiance, Zihrun, a Crown of radiance, light and glory from whom a flow of living water streamed out to the škintas. For he is the revealer (lit. opener) of radiance and light and displayeth his treasure 5) which emanated from him, to eager 'uthras. All worlds adore and praise the mighty First Life in its Indwellings, and Life is victorious.

As the 'uthras stand in their škintas they adore and praise the Great Place in the Light which is eternal, and praise Manda-ḏ-Hiia and speak with him. When the 'uthras are standing in their škintas they adore and praise that Tarwan-Nhura. To what shall they

---

1) Škinta ("dwelling", "indwelling", "shecinah") is also a word used for the cult-hut, the sanctuary.

2) Lit. "granted to", "permitted to".

3) Or "loosing". The word šrita is applied both to "conscrating and "deconsecrating" in ritual.

4) Yawar (act. part. YUR or 'UR) = dazzling (i.e. blinding with light).

5) D.C. 3 has l'uṣria, D.C. 53 ul'uṣria as in M.L. p. 7). Lidzbarski inserts den Schatz to make the sentence grammatically correct. The omission of u, as in D.C. 3, makes the insertion unnecessary. 'Uṣria also means (perhaps here also) "his mind", "his thought", "minds".

dedicate the wreath upon their heads and upon what shall they hang it? They dedicate it to the Tree of Radiance and hang it (thereon).

And Life be praised!

[This is the prayer of dedication of "Life created Yawar-Ziwa]

In the name of the Great Life!

Let there be light, let there be light! Let there be the light of the Great First Life! There shone forth wisdom, vigilance and praise of the First Mana [1]) which came from its place. He who twineth the wreath is Yufin-Yufafin: the bringer of the wreath is 'It-'Nṣibat-'utria. 'It-Yawar son of 'Nṣibat-'utria set on the wreath. He brought it and placed it upon the head of the implanted mana which was transplanted from guarded (?) [2]) manas. The wreath flames and the leaves of the wreath flame! Before the Mana there is light, behind the Mana glory, and at either side of the Mana radiance, brilliance and purity. And at the four corners of the House and the seven sides of the firmanent silence, bliss and glory prevail (lit. are found). And Life be praised!

A crown of ether-light shone forth dazzlingly from the House of Life. 'Uthras brought it from the House of Life and the mighty First Life established it in His škintas. He who setteth it up shall be set up and he who uplifteth it shall be raised up into the world of light and he who establisheth it into the enduring Abode. Ye are established and uplifted to the place (in which) righteous (beings) are established.

And Life be praised.

[This is the prayer of "loosing" [3]), "Let there be Light". These three prayers "In the name of that Primal Being", "Life created Yawar-Ziwa" and "Let there be light" read near thy crown [4]) and place it on thy head. And read "Manda created me" over the myrtle-wreath and put it on thy head above thy crown. And twine a myrtle-wreath for thy staff and hold it with thy crown. And when thou goest to the jordan read "Answer me, Father, answer me!]

[1]) Mana = "mind", "intelligence": also "garment or robe", "vessel".

[2]) Mania smiria "manas kept in reserve?" The language is so high-flown that any precise meaning attached to such an expression is probably incorrect.

[4]) The priest's "crown" is a fillet of woven white silk.

In the name of the Great Life!

There shall be healing for me, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš! Strengthened and enhanced [1] is the great mystery of radiance, light and glory which resteth on the mouth of the Great Life! for from it came into being and was manifest [2] Knowledge-of-Life (Manda-ḏ-Hiia) who knew and interpreted the thoughts of the First Life, which are wondrous.

And Life be praised!

[Read this prayer and hold thy pandama [3]) for thy baptism.]

Incense that is fragrant, incense that is fragrant! yea, for the mighty, first, sublime Life from worlds of light, the Ineffable above all works! for the ancient Radiance and for the Primal Light, for the Life which emanated from Life and for Truth (Kušṭa) that was pristine, from the beginning.

Incense that is fragrant, incense that is fragrant! yea, for Yukabar-Ziwa who was mighty in his radiance, and came in his light and his glory (as) messenger [4] to the first righteous elect (people). He crossed over the worlds and came and rent the firmament and revealed himself.

Incense that is fragrant, incense that is fragrant! yea, for Yuzaṭaq-Gnosis-of-Life, source of Life, who interpreteth silence and giveth hope and taketh [5] the prayers of spirits and souls of righteous and believing men, the virtuous and wellpleasing, into the Place of Light and into the Eternal Abode.

[1] The difficulty is the word Haial (see M.L. p. 11, n. 1). Kbar = "enhanced", "increased", but haial remains doubtful. The prayer is repeated, p. 32.

[2] Read ḏ-hua upta as in D.C. 3.

[3] I.e. the long end of the turban when folded over the lower part of the face, to prevent breath, spittle or mucus from defiling sacraments. Cf. the Avestan paitidana (mouth-veil), Pahlevi padam, Pazand penōm and the modern Zoroastrian padān.

[4] Sumerian aš-gan-da "minister, messenger", Accadian ašgandu. The name given to the helper or server at Mandaean rites.

[5] Read uahid as in D.C. 3 and M.L.

Incense that is fragrant, incense that is fragrant! yea, for the Father of 'uthras, the Ancient, Lofty, Occult and Guarded, the Man who is high (yet) remaineth deep and hidden. He seeth and understandeth that which the worlds and generations do in the worlds of darkness.

Incense that is fragrant, incense, that is fragrant! yea for the dwelling of Life and the planting of 'uthras. Incense that is fragrant, incense that is fragrant! yea, for the dwelling of four beings, sons of Perfection. Incense that is fragrant, incense that is fragrant! yea for the Dwelling of Abathur. Incense that is fragrant, incense that is fragrant! yea, for the dwelling of Hibil, Šitil and Anuš [1]), sons of a living, brilliant, healthy and steadfast stock, beings not removed by sword, nor burnt by flames of fire, nor drowned in water-floods; whose (very) sandal-straps on their feet are unwetted by water. They sought and found, went to judgment and were vindicated, spoke and were heard. They are complete, lacking in nought; perfect are they and not imperfect. They came from a pure place and go to a pure place.

Incense that is fragrant, incense that is fragrant! yea, for the lives of the men who were our ancestors, of righteous and believing men who rendered up (their souls) and departed from their bodies; and of those who yet live in their bodies. They testified and the door of Sin will be shut to them and the door of light open to them and they will be knit together in the union of Life, in which there is no separation. [2]) Pray ye for us from there, and we will pray from here for you! All fruits perish; all sweet odours vanish, (but) the perfume of Life is established for ever and unto world's end upon those who love His name of Truth.

Those souls who descend to the jordan and are baptised shall be without sins, trespasses, follies, mistakes and evil deeds: they will rise and behold the great Place of Light and the Eternal Abode. And praised be the Great Life in light. And Life is victorious.

[This saying, "Incense that is fragrant, yea for the First Life" recite over both incense and sandalwood and put them before thee on the jordan-bank in a new incense-pan. And make a fresh fire on the copper [3]) incense-pan - (these) are aids of all order which ye carried, put (lit. "performed") at the jordan. Then read the baptismal "We acknowledged" "Praises" "Thee, Life," "I sought to raise eyes" (Prayer 77) and "Raising eyes".]

Raising [1] my eyes and lifting up my countenance [2] toward the Place which is all portals of radiance, light, glory, beauty, repute and honour and to the Abode which is all beams of light; I adore, laud and praise the Mighty, Strange (other-worldly) Life, and the Second Life and the Third Life; and Yufin-Yufafin, Sam-Mana-Smira, and the Vine which is all Life and the great Tree which is all healings. I adore, laud and worship the precious and guarded Place, the secret and guarded manas and the Lord of Greatness from the Secret Place and, from the Hidden Place, the pihta [3], need(?) [4], truth and faith.

I worship, laud and praise Sam-Smira, the great radiancy of the First Life, son of the Great Primal Life who thought and was manifest, seeking His own: His shecinah resteth on waves of water. The assembly of souls which proceeded from Him, on the Last Day, when they leave their bodies, will rejoice in Him, will embrace Him and will rise up and behold the outer Ether and the everlasting Abode.

I worship, laud and praise the multitudinous Radiancies and great mighty Lights: I worship, laud and praise Piriawis, the great Jordan of the First Life which is all healings. I worship, laud and praise the pure Yušamin who abideth on treasures of the waters and upon mighty celestial wellsprings of light. I adore, laud and praise the life which proceeded from Life and the Truth which existed before, in the Beginning. I worship, laud and praise Yukabar-Ziwa, envoy of the Life and the Word of the first Elect Righteous ones. I worship, laud and praise the Ancient, Supernal, Occult and Guarded Abathur, who is high, hidden and guarded, whose throne is placed at the gate of the House of Life. He sitteth with the scales set before him, weighing deeds and (their) recompense. He seeth and discerneth that which the worlds and generations do. I worship, laud and praise Manda-ḏ-Hiia lord of healings, the being whom the Life summoned and bade him heal the congregation of souls, divesting the congregation of of souls of (their) darkness and clothing them with light; raising (them) and showing them that a great restoration of life exists, a place where the spirits and souls of our forefathers sit clothed in radiance and covered with light; showing the great restoration of life which is before them.

[1] The infinitive of a verb used for an action during its performance is an idiom found fairly often in Mandaean texts: hence here "to raise" = "raising".

[2] Read gilia parṣufai. Lidzbarski (M.L. p. 15) translated Wellen des Antlitzes. Gilia suggests rounded contours, hence "features". In translation it is best omitted.

[3] Pihta, "the opened", "The "opened up" is the sacramental bread.

[4] Ṣarka. The meaning is doubtful.

I worship, laud and praise Šilmai and Nidbai, the two delegates of Manda-ḏ-Hiia, who rule over the great jordan of Life, for they baptise with the great baptism of Light.

10

On the day that the Jordan was bestowed upon Sam-Smir, the great pure radiance[1]) of the First Life which flowed forth[2]) from Him, Bihram and Ram-Rba-Hiia went with him[3]) (and?) four hundred and forty-four thousand myriads of 'uthras, sons of light, who descended to the jordan. He baptised them and they rose to the bank. He raised them up and conferred upon them some of the glory and some of the greatness which was (conferred) on himself.

I have worshipped and praised that Yawar-Ziwa whose škinta is situate in the world of Outer Ether and in the Enduring Abode. I have worshipped and praised the seven holy and guarded mauas which were transplanted from it. I sought in prayer the First Life, and, in the presence of the mighty sublime Life, discovered that which offendeth in myself, (in me), Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš and about what which causeth my friends to offend, and my friends' friends and the friends of the great Family of Life.

[1]) "The great pure radiance" must refer, not to Sam-Smir, but to the Jordan,

[2]) The verb NGD as Lidzbarski comments, (M.L. p. 18, n.1) is usually connected with water or with the drabša (light or banner. The mss. vary, D.C. 53 ngad, D.C. 3 ngid: M.L. has 'tingid.

[3]) The first part of the hymn is obscure. Were it "aus Bihram" as Lidzbarski translates, it would be minḫ mn Bihram, moreover, the word ma before "four hundred" is meaningless. The baptist is Sam-Ziwa, although one would expect Bihram-Rba to be the officiating baptist. The formula at baptism is "Thou art immersed (baptised) with the baptism of Bihram-Rba". The names of Bihram and Ram are coupled in Prayer 25.

And Life is victorious.

[Pray these three prayers, " Raising eyes", "The day that the Jordan was bestowed" and "I have worshipped and praised that Yawar-Ziwa" on the jordan-bank after "I sought to raise eyes". They are the helpers (aids to) baptism.]

12

I am Yur son of Barit (I shone forth). In great effulgence the radiance glowed (with heat?). The tanna[1] dissolved and a škinta came into being, a škinta came into existence and was established in the House of Life.

And Life is victorious

[Read this prayer and grasp thy kanzala (stole).[2]. It is the opening prayer for the jordan. Then recite "I went to the jordan"].

13

I went to the jordan, but not I alone, (for) Šilmai and Nidbai, my helpers, went with me to the jordan; Hibil and Šitil and Anuš went with me to the jordan - they who baptise with the great baptism of Life. Piriawis-Ziwa and Piriafil-Malaka give free movement[3] to the limbs of my body!

I go down before these souls whom the Life delivereth and saveth, and protecteth these souls from all that is evil and from those who give nothing, but take away; and from those who lend nothing and

[1] This very obscure prayer does little to elucidate the meaning of the word tana (Tanna ?) but here, and in other passages, it might mean vapour here or a matrix. Tannas are often personified, as in prayer No. 305, and mentioned with nitufiata ("Drops"). Lidzbarski always left the word untranslated, and so must I!

[2] The kanzala, a long strip of white material, is used to loop round the staff when the baptist goes into the river and sticks the end of his staff in the river mud. The loop prevents the staff from floating away, and frees both the baptist's hands.

[3] D.C. 53 pralia hindamia, D.C. 3 pralia handamia, M.L. prulia handamia. See also p. 17. The verb PRA (cf. פרע "to break through", "to loosen") also means "cause to move or to flow". (See Pet. v. 17: 20; D.C. 36: no. 174 etc.) when used for the command to clear channels to the baptismal pool so that water may flow through it without obstruction.

(yet) are paid back; and from evil spirits which hasted yet did not arrive, and from liliths which fell down and did not arise.

Their hands fell (powerless) on their knees; their eyes were blinded and unable to see and their ears became deaf and unable to hear. In your names, Šilmai and Nidbai, and through the strength of Hibil, Šitil and Anuš, secure, seal and guard these souls who go down to the jordan and will be baptised, by the great seal [1]) of Yuzaṭaq-Manda-ḏ-Hiia, the healer, whose strength none can attain.

And Life is victorious!

[Recite until thou reachest (the words) "Piriafil, loosen the limbs" (etc.). And descend (into the water) up to a fourth of thy thighs. If thou art baptising a single soul, say "my body, and I go down before this the soul of N."

If there are several souls, recite as written (above), and at the place where it said "secure, seal and guard" say "secure, seal and guard this soul of N. and establish it" and then recite thy saying over the staff.]

In the names of Yusmir the First Vine, from whom Yawar took a staff of water and went to the bank of the jordan, covered, as it were, with radiance and clothed in light. Over it he pronounced secret sayings - these mystic names: "In the name of Yusmir-Yusamir, and of Sam-Mana-Smira; in the name of Hauran-Hauraran by which the first Yawar raised up 'uthras, flourishing Vines of life, in the jordan. By it (by its power) Hibil raiseth up living souls in the jordan, those worthy of the great Place of Light and of the Everlasting Abode. By it they will be established and raised up in the House of the Mighty Life. It will raise these souls who go down to the jordan and are baptised: they will behold the Great Place of Light and the Everlasting Abode.

[This saying is for the staff. Recite it over the olivewood staff and stick it into the jordan (-bed), then recite the baptism(al prayers.)]

Bound is the sea [2]), bound are the two banks of the sea! Bound are the devils and demons, the demon-visitants [1], haunting spirits[2], and satanic amulet-spirits. Bound are the three hundred and sixty mysteries that are in the House![3]

---

[1]) "'siqta" = "seal", "seal-ring" and "compulsion".

[2]) Yama here refers to the tank of running water called the yardna, or, alternatively, to a shallow part of a river. Salt water is forbidden.

I am secured and sealed, I, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš, and these souls who are descending to the jordan and will be sealed by the seal of the Mighty Sublime Life, and by the great MA [4] and the great YA and the great BAZ and by the great AZIZ and by the great AS and by the great ASIN and by the sea (of?) AS. Bound are (Magian) priests [5], slaughterers [6], priests who cut up victims,[7] scorners, those who make evil signs and the seven mysteries which are in the sea. Every demon (exorcised) by name, every evil spirit by his appelation, every amulet-spirit and all idol-demons who raise their heads and show their countenances, lifting themselves in pride against the Sublime Being and directing their evil Eye [8] towards these souls who are going to the jordan, shall be struck down and smitten by Yaha-Yaha and by Zha-Zha and by angels which were sent and come against them. Flee in fear before them! and before the glory which is mighty upon them. Depart in fear and avaunt! Seven walls of iron have been set around me, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš, with which Haiašum, the first Kušṭa, surrounded himself.

I am a perfected gem [9]: into the midst of the worlds and ages am I cast down. I am an iron club, a great rocky crag. Any demon that dasheth himself against me will be shattered and if I strike at him he will be dashed to pieces. Any demon which reareth its head, any amulet-imp which setteth its countenance [10] against these souls in malice, overlooking them, will be thrashed and struck [1]) by 'Usfar-Manharbiel-'Staqlus [2]), the little child who dwelleth upon pure springs of light, (yea) beaten with the mace of water by which Fire was beaten out and extinguished; (and) by the strength of Mān the Healer and by the strength of elect righteous (men).

[5] Kumria indicates priests who wear the "sacred thread": Magians.

[6] Zabia Lidzbarski suggests connection with the Assyrian zabbu.

[7] עדר "to cut, strip".

[8] A free translation: the Evil Eye is implied.

[9] Gimra, apparently a precious or semi-precious stone. Its whiteness, and several references in the Ginza Rba (e.g. G.R. trs. p. 172 l.11) suggest that it is a pearl, i.e. the soul.

[10] See p. 7, n. 2.

17

Avaunt! flee in fear all (ye) evil, restricting, wrathful spirits! Flee, begone, be vanquished and brought to nought before the glory and light of Manda-ḏ-Hiia! Piriawis-Ziwa and Piriafil-Malaka have set moving [3]) the limbs of my body: I descend (to the jordan) before these stedfast, flourishing souls of the living [4]). Šilmai and Nidbai, fly, approach, arrive! Bear ye witness to these souls who are going down to the jordan to be baptised. Ye four 'uthras, sons of light, Rhum-Hai, 'In-Hai, Šum-Hai and Zamar-Hai, be ye my witnesses on the great day of departure (from the body). Great Jordan of Life, I laud thee and adjure thee by 'Uṣar-Nhura (Treasure-of-Light), the great solace and support of life, that thou givest no room to evil beings (who are) against these souls who go down into thee. Healing shall be theirs in the name of the Sublime (Strange) Life from worlds (of light). May Life be established in Its indwellings, and Life is victorious.

18

In the name of the Life!

Piriawis, the great jordan of the First Life, which is all healings [5]), is afire like the glory flaming in the Tanna [6]). When Life was ardent[1]) and life burst forth in the great glory which flameth therein, Life arose and founded its škinta above the Tanna.

[1]) Like Lidzbarski, I suggest that the verb should be Ethpeel.

[2]) 'usfar in D.C. 3 and D.C. 53 (M.L. p. 24:2 'sfar). As 'usfar occurs in D.C. 21 with the seeming meaning of a cutting instrument, I take it here to be part of the name of a spirit.

[3]) See p. 9, n. 3.

[4]) ḏ-hiia, not here "of the Life", but as translated.

[5]) Lit. "healings": plural to agree with hiia.

[6]) The proximity of 'qad to yaqid twice over justifies the translation. It is tempting, however, to think of the Syriac and ܝܩܕ Arabic عقد "bind together", "materialise", "determine." The obscure language which priests no longer understand, suggests the spontaneous emergence of life from a fiery matrix. For Tanna, a word of doubtful meaning, see p. 9, n. 1.

The radiance waxed ardent, the Tanna dissolved. They opened the waters and Life was established by its own waters[2]). Yur (brilliant light) established Yur: Life was increased in power by its own radiance and by the great glory which flamed in It.

And in the waters Life established living (creatures); above the the waters fruit appeared[3]) and a škinta was founded.

Thee do I invoke, great Jordan of Life, by (in the name of) Treasure-of-Light, the great support and solace of the Life, and by pure Yušamin[4]) who dwelleth upon the treasures of the waters and upon wellsprings of light; by Yusmir, the being who united with water; by Adatan and Yadatan who sit at the Gate of Life and seek spirits and souls in the Place of Light; by Šilmai and Nidbai who bear witness before the Great Life. Behold these souls who quit destruction for construction, (go) from error to truth and (leave) the abode of fear of the deity of the House (i.e. world) for the great Place of Light and the everlasting Abode!

If he to whom I speak listeneth and he to whom I call is established (in the faith) and is knit into the communion of Life and built into the great fabric of Reality[5]), I will take his hand and be his saviour and guide to the great Place of Light and to the Everlasting Abode. If I speak to him and he hearkeneth not and call to him and he is not uplifted, he will be put to the question (tortured). (But) I shall not be put to the question, because of the Word of Truth (Kušṭa) and its uplifting by Yukabar. And Life is steadfast in its Dwellings, and Life is victorious.

[Then cry] "In the name of Life! Let every man whose strength enableth him and who loveth his soul, come and go down to the jordan and be baptised and receive the Pure Sign; put on robes of radiant light and set a fresh wreath on his head".[Here baptise the souls. And they shall descend behind thee and shall submerge three times. And thy staff shall be (rest) on thy left arm. Dip them with thy right hand, grasp them with thy left and place them between thee and thy staff and dip them under thrice and and sign them thrice with thy right hand. And thy face shall be toward the Gate of Prayer [1]).

When thou hast signed them, say, "N, son of N. [2]), thou hast been signed [3]) with the Sign of Life and the name of the Life and the name of Manda-ḏ-Hiia were pronounced upon thee. Thou hast been baptised with the baptism of the great Bihram, son of the mighty (life). Thy baptism will protect thee and will be efficacious. The name of the Life and the name of Manda-ḏ-Hiia are pronounced upon thee!"

And give them three palmfuls of water to drink and say to them "Drink! and be healed and be strengthened! The name of the Life and the name of Manda-ḏ-Hiia have been pronounced upon thee". Recite "Manda created me" over the myrtle-wreaths and place them upon their heads. [4]) When placing thy hand on their heads recite these secret names: "The name of the great mystic First Wellspring [5]) be pronounced on thee; the name of the great First Palmtree [6]) be pronounced on thee; the name of the great Šišlam be pronounced on thee; the name of the great 'Zlat be pronounced on thee; the name of the great Yawar be pronounced on thee; the name of Simat-Hiia be pronounced on thee; the name of the great Yukabar be pronounced on thee; the name of the Mana and its Counterpart be pronounced on thee; the name of the Great Mystery and the secret sayings be pronounced on thee; the name of the great first Shaq-Ziwa be pronounced upon thee; the name of Sam-Ziwa-Dakia, the Eldest, Beloved, great First (Being) be pronounced on thee; the name of the Life and the name of Manda-ḏ-Hiia be pronounced on thee."

Then reach them (perform with them the rite of) kušṭa [7]). And he shall go up before thee (on to the bank). Then dip thy phial, fill it with water and give it to whoever standeth on the bank. Then dip thy bowl and recite the hymn "At the waterhead I went forth" and "Blessed art thou, Outer Door", and recite the dedicatory prayer for the jordan.

[1]) I.e. he shall face north. The north is also called "the gate of Mercies". M.L. has "their faces" etc.

[2]) The mother's name, not the father's.

[3]) The signing consists of drawing the wet forefinger of the right hand across the forehead, horizontally, from right to left.

[4]) This should be "the myrtle-wreath upon his head" etc. as only one person at a time stands in the baptismal pool with the baptist.

[5]) Ritual mss. explain the "Wellspring" as the female or "Mother" aspect of creative power.

[6]) The Sindirka, "palmtree" symbolises the male or "Father" aspect of creative power.

[7]) See p. 2, n. 1.

When thou recitest "Bound is the sea", "I am a perfected gem", "Avaunt, flee in fear", "Piriawis" and all as it is written, speak as written if there are two, three or many souls; but if only one soul say "the soul of N. who descended to the jordan and was baptised and received the pure sign." (And pay close attention to thy baptism.)

19

Manda created me, 'uthras set me up, radiance clothed me and light covered me: Haza-zban [1] set the wreath on my head, mine, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš, and on these souls who descend to the jordan and are baptised. Its tendrils shine and its perfume is sweet, for they (the tendrils) wither not nor do they come apart, and its leaves do not fall off.

And Life be praised!

[This is the set prayer for the baptism wreath. Recite it over the myrtle-wreath and place it on the heads of the souls that thou baptisest [2])].

Blessed art thou, Outer Door, and blessed art thou, Everlasting Abode! Blessed are ye, great beings of radiance [3]) and mighty and powerful beings of light. Blessed, lauded and honoured be the 'uthras which dwell on the jordan! Jordan! be gentle towards these souls which have descended into thee! Let healing be theirs by virtue of the Word of Truth and its uplifting by Yukabar-Ziwa.

[This is the dedicatory prayer of the jordan. When thou hast extolled the jordan, if thou baptisest several souls recite as it is written; if only one soul, say "The soul of N. who hath descended into thee" and rise to the bank and recite "I rose up from the Jordan" [4]).]

[2] Seth.

The moon is vanity and cometh to an end
And his worshippers come to an end and are vanity."

I rose up from the jordan
And a group of souls I met,
A group I met of souls
Who surrounded our father Šitil,
Saying to him, "By thy life, our father Šitil,
Go with us to the jordan!"
"If I go with you to the jordan
Who will be your witness?"

"Lo, there burns a fire.
It will bear witness for us."
"That is not what I seek,
Not that which my soul desireth.
The fire of which ye spake
Once a day needs a firebrand [1]).
The fire of which ye spake -
Fire, is vanity and cometh to naught
And its worshippers come to naught and are vanity."

I rose up from the jordan
And a group of souls I met,
I met a group of souls
Who surrounded our father Šitil,
Saying to him, "By thy life, our father Šitil,
Go with us to the jordan!"

"If I go with you to the jordan,
Who will be your witness?"

"The jordan and its two banks
Will bear witness for us;
Pihta, kušṭa and mambuha [2])
Will bear witness for us;

Will bear witness for us;
The sanctuary[2] in which we worship
Will bear witness for us;
The alms that is in our laps
Will bear witness for us;
And our father[3] who is our head
Will bear witness for us."

"This is that which I seek,
This is that which my soul desireth!
When I rise to the House of Life
And travel to the Everlasting Abode,
When Life questioneth me, (these) witnesses
Will come and will bear witness.
Witnesses of the truth are they,
Sure is all that they say!"
And Life is victorious!

We have acknowledged the name of Life: (believe in) the great celestial Womb[4], in that which is endless and countless, in Yaluz-Yaluz, in Ṣbabut, the mighty Will[5] of Life; in Piriawis, fount of living waters; in "He-provided-a-Dwelling"[6] giving His Likeness its dwelling in the House of Life; in the Life Whose Eyes were fixed upon the waters. He arose, gazed and beheld the Nest[7] from which He derived His being.

(We believe in) Yufin-Yufafin, in Nbaṭ, the first Upsurge and outflow of Life at its inception[8], in its second (outflow), Sam-Smir; in its third, Bihram son of the Mighty (Life), Yukabar, the Word of Life who came from the House of Life to righteous and believing men.

In the name of the Great Life!

Precious oil art thou, son of white sesame, son of the Euphrates bank, son of the river [1]-pleasaunce, son of water-pools, son of treasures of light. Upon thee, Oil, Life laid His hand and sent thee to this world which is all birth, to heal, uplift, raise up and ameliorate all pains, diseases, complaints, tumours (and) the seven mysteries that inhabit the body. I praise thee, Oil, and adjure thee, Oil, by the Life, by Manda-ḏ-Hiia and by the 'uthras, sons of salvation (and) by this strange [2] being, who is honoured, wondrous and perfect, who summoned chosen elect beings, sons of light, and said to them: "Give me precious oil, son of white sesame, son of the Euphrates-bank, son of the river-meadow, [1] son of water-pools, son of treasures of light.

Anoint, and I will bring you oil: anoint with radiance, light and glory, the Oil wherewith I anointed and (which) I bestowed, not in the name of a god, not in the name of spirit, not in the name of a messiah nor in the name of a temple-Ishtar. Nay, the oil with which I anointed, (the oil) which I bestowed is at my name, my Sign and (given) as the name and sign of a living, glorious, flourishing and steadfast race. Any man anointed by this oil will live, be whole and be strengthened: his mouth [3] will assume the nature of Anuš, within him [4] he will take on the nature of Anuš. From him the seven dolours of death and the eight afflictions [5] of darkness shall violently depart and be expelled. Demons, devils, shedim, demon visitants, amulet-spirits and liliths will be removed and driven out of him in the presence of that which increased the strength, radiance and light of Knowledge of Life".

In the name of the Life!

Thou wast established, First Life; thou wast in existence before all things. Before Thee no being existed.

For [1] He hath fulfilled Himself and hath issued in His strength and His steadfastness and in the radiance and strength which His Father hath bestowed upon Him. For we have not changed that which thou hast commanded us. Thou enlargest our steps and liftest our eyes heavenwards. Thou descendest and givest us dwellings by springs of Life. Thou pourest into us and fillest us with thy wisdom, thy doctrine and thy goodness. Thou showest us the way by which thou camest from the House of Life and we will walk therein with the gait of righteous and believing men, so causing our spirits and souls to dwell in the dwellings of Life, the place where the spirits of our fathers abide, clothed in radiance and covered with light, rejoicing, laughing, dancing, exulting about the glorious splendour resting (upon them [2]) [?]

This is the Oil wherewith he anointed, the radiance, light and glory which Manda-ḏ-Hiia blessed with his pure mouth and bestowed on all who love his name of Truth. From all those who are anointed with this oil every pain, disease, complaint, tumour, curse and physical evil will be removed. They will be freed from fetter and bond, from evil curses, from evil slander, from lying accusation, from the hand of the wicked, from the sword of enemies and from the third tongue which is softer than fat and sharper than a sword. (They will be delivered) from incubi and hobgoblins, from wicked outcry, black magic; from a spoilt wreath, from the male and female biruq [3]) and from the second death: they will be driven off and cast out by thy surpassing Name which is all life. It falleth on the dead man and he liveth: on the sick man and he stretcheth

Every man anointed with this oil will be sinless and blameless in the Place of Life.

And Life is victorious.

[Read these three prayers "We acknowledged the name of Life" "Precious oil art thou", "Thou wast established, First Life", upon the oil and sign the souls thou hast baptised, when they rise up out of the jordan. Say "N. son of N., thou hast been signed with the sign of Life and the name of Life, and the name of Manda-ḏ-Hiia hath been pronounced on thee. Thou hast been baptised with the baptism of Bihram the Great, son of the Mighty (Life). Thy baptism shall protect thee and attain its end [1]). The name of Life and the name of Manda-ḏ-Hiia are pronounced on thee." Sign thrice and grasp their right hands in the kušṭa (rite). Then recite [2]) and pass (thy finger) over thine (own) face - thine own sealing. And then they shall stand up before thee. Recite over the pihta and mambuha and give them pihta that they may eat and mambuha that they may drink and take their right hands in kušṭa. Then make them sit before thee and read the sealing (prayer) and lay thy hand on their heads.]

In the name of the Life!

When a jordan of living water (Water of Life) was bestowed on Sam-Smir, the great Radiance of Life, nine hundred and ninety-two thousand myriad 'uthras, sons of light, opened their mouths, praising Manda-ḏ-Hiia. "Praised be Manda-ḏ-Hiia; praised be Yawar-Ziwa; praised be Bihram and Ram; praised be Tarwan-Nhura; praised be Nbaṭ the first great Radiance; praised be Nṣab and Anan-Nṣab; praised be Sar and Sarwan; praised be that great and mighty Mana; praised be that great Presence of Glory; praised be that whole abode of those at rest; praised be all the ways and paths of the Almighty (Life); praised be all the mighty celestial worlds of Light; praised be all those occult dwellings (škinata); praised be that Voice, Strength, Word and Command which come from the House of Abathur; praised be Abathur-Rama; praised be the myriad 'uthras who stand in the presence of Abathur; praised be Šilmai and Nidbai the guardian 'uthras of the jordan; praised be our father Hibil, Šitil and Anuš the head of the whole race.

Turn back, thrust back from me, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš and from these souls who have descended to the jordan and been baptised, terror, fright, fear of devils and demons, shedim, demon visitants, ghosts, amulet-spirits, liliths, gods, angels, demons of high places and shrines and idol-spirits: (all those) that the seven planets and the lords of the House loose against souls in this world.

Manda-ḏ-Hiia! Lift up thine eyes, (behold) thy devotees, thine offspring and thy priest! Behold us who stand in this place which is all evil things! At the great Door which is all principalities [1] do we stand, amongst the wicked, and dwell amongst sinners. Deliver us from this world which is all sinners and from the sorceries of the children of Adam and Eve. Forgive us that which we have done, and that which we do forgive us. Forgive us, Looser of sins, (our) trespasses, our follies, our stumblings and our mistakes. If thou dost not loose us from our sins, trespasses, follies, stumblings, and mistakes, no man is clean in thy sight [2] Manda-ḏ-Hiia!

Accept, (O) Life, Thy [3] prayer from the Occult and assure (to us) bliss in Thy light in the name of Šarhabiel the great First Radiance. May the words of Šarhabiel the Great First Radiance, be established for all who love his name of Truth. And for me, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš may darkness be overcome and light set on high.

And Life be praised.

In the name of the Life!

Bound (together) [4] and sealed are these souls who went down to the jordan and were baptised in the name of the Great Life. They have been baptised with the baptism of Bihram the Great. Their souls have been secured with bonds of righteousness and with the bonds of Zhir, the great light of Life.

In the name of the Life!

We were set up and raised up by 'Uṣar-Hiia: through 'Uṣar-Hai and Pta-Hai union[1]) with the House of Life came to us: Manda-ḏ-Hiia went to us with radiance that is great and light that is powerful, with our mana, our sign, our way, our jordan and our baptism; with Hauran [2]) our vestment; with Hauraran our covering and with Hazazban our wreath.

I call on the mighty, sublime, all-surpassing Life, supreme over all works and I say to It, "Behold, behold, Great Life, us who at Thy name, Life, descended into the jordan and for Thy name's sake, Life, we took our name and our sign from the great Jordan of Life and from the great source of healing, at the word of Truth and (the power) to uplift of Yukabar-Ziwa.

And Life is victorious.

Bound (together) and sealed are these souls who descended to the jordan and were baptised. By Hauran-Hauraran, the out-thrust of the Great Life: by Its names, by Yufin-Yufafin and Sam-Mana-Smira; by Yusmir, vehicle of the First radiance; and by the being Yukabar, the (well-) equipped 'uthra; seal and guard these souls who descended to the jordan and were baptised, against the deities of the House, lest they gain dominion over them. (Protect them) from their devils and demons so that they shall not go near them nor harm them nor ruin them. Let all pains, diseases, afflictions and tumours be removed from them. Let all evil sicknesses and malignant curses of the body be removed and driven off, so that those who sit before Thee like men attainted [3]) shall stand up like clean men. And healing shall be theirs, those souls who went down to the jordan and were baptised.

And Life is victorious.

In the name of the Life!

Ye are set up and raised up into the Place of the Good. Established amongst *mana*s of light are these souls which went down to the jordan and were baptised (and those) of our fathers and teachers and of our brothers and sisters who have departed the body and those who are still in the body. Yea, Life! lo, Life! Life hath triumphed over this world
And Life is victorious.

[This is a baptism hymn. Set up (recite?) the hymns, and where it says "souls" recite as written, but if it is a single soul say "amongst manas of light, the soul of N. son of N. who went down to the jordan and was baptised and received the Pure Sign" and chant "What did thy Father do for thee, Soul" and recite the antiphonal hymn "How lovely are plants which the Jordan (planted)" and "Rightly did my baptiser baptise me", "Šilmai baptised me with his baptism", "The jordan in which we were baptised", "I rejoice in my priests" and chant other hymns: "Truly do I say to you", "To you I cry, men who have received the Sign, and explain", and "A disciple, a new one, am I who have gone to the jordan-bank"

Then recite the "Blessed and praised" of Šum (Shem) son of Noah and at the place where it says "a wreath from the Vine Ruaz" (say) "will be set on the heads of these souls who have descended to the jordan, been baptised and received the pure sign and who were called, established and sealed by this baptism, and (on the heads of) our fathers, teachers, and brothers and sisters who have departed the body and those who are yet in the body". Should it be a single soul whom thou hast baptised, say "the soul of N. who went down to the jordan and was baptised" and finish.

And recite "Good is the good for the good" and end. And offer up the Petition and say the Rahmia[1]) for the souls thou baptisest. Say "these souls who went down to the jordan and were baptised and received the pure sign." If it was a single soul, say "the soul of N. son of N. who went down to the jordan and received the pure sign."

And beware: from the beginning to this point recite all thy baptism(al prayers) with care, attention and knowledge. And again perform kušṭa with them [2]) and say to them "Kušṭa make you whole my brother-'uthras! The communion of the living hath been performed [3]) in the manner in which 'uthras perform it in their škintas [4]). Fragrant is your perfume, my brother-'uthras, (for) within ye are full of radiance."

[3]) Lidzbarski takes laf for an imperative. The act of communion has, however, taken place when this is said.

[4]) Every act of devotion on earth is paralleled in the world of light, and the earthly cult-hut has its heavenly prototype.

And they shall say "Seek and find, speak and be heard!" and kiss their hands [1]. If the souls be female or if the soul thou baptisest is one (woman), perform the kušṭa with them and say to them "Kušṭa heal thee and raise thee up. Thy kušṭa shall be thy witness and thine alms thy saviour. When they say "Seek and find, speak and be heard" and kiss their hands, then say to them "Your kušṭa shall be your witness and your alms shall be your saviour. Your prayer and praise will rise and obtain mercy for you. In the name of the Great Life; we have acted (according to) the goodness of the Great (Life). And we have arranged (all things?) according to Thy loving-kindness from beginning to end. We have called upon the great Jordan of Water of Life and upon the three hundred and sixty jordans in which Hibil-Ziwa was baptised [2]". And he (H-Z.) said "Warn them, deliver them, save them and protect those souls which went down to the jordan, were baptised and received the pure sign from adultery, theft, black magic, from going to temples and worship in temples and from eating temple-food. And eat not of that which was killed by lion or wolf, or of anything disgorged or (found) dead. But immerse yourselves and purify yourselves. Manda-ḏ-Hiia will be your helper, and your baptism will be efficacious." Then pray a prayer and Rahmia [3] for thyself, and say "In the name of the Life! I worship the First Life and praise my lord Manda-ḏ-Hiia and that great Presence of Splendour which emanated from Itself". Then recite "The First Life be praised! Truth make you whole! Ye are established and raised up" and transfer thy staff to thy right arm and end (the prayer). Then return it to thy left arm and recite the "Blessed and praised be Life" of Šum son of Noah. And sit [4] and recite "Good is good for the good" and bend thy knee, sit, and pour out [5] at "forgiving of sins" (be there for) "our forefathers" (etc.) "and the souls of Mandaeans, priests, ganzivri, treasurers, chief men [6] and ethnarchs" in the "forgiving of sins". Then rise to thy feet, take the pihta and mambuha and recite the eight pihta prayers for the pihta and the two mambuha prayers for the mambuha. Dip the pihta in the mambuha and recite "The Life spoke and Life opened" for thy pandama and unfasten it. Eat thy pihta and drink thy mambuha and drink the rinsing-water 1) and take a second rinsing and recite "Life is fulfilled" and "The (Great) Life dwelleth on those who love Him" and cast in thine incense at (the words) "Radiance goeth up to its place" and at the place where it says "will forgive those that love his name of Truth" he shall say "those souls who went down to the jordan, were baptised and received the pure sign, and Life is victorious". Then throw (water) beneath thy staff, recite "Good is the good for the good" and make the Petition and repeat the Rahmia for thyself. Perform the kušṭa with the šganda 2) and when he goes down, recite "In radiance that is great am I immersed", slip aside thy pandama and honour thy crown 3).]

Radiance goeth up to its place and Light to the Everlasting Abode. On the day that Light ariseth, Darkness returns to its place. is the baptism wherewith Adam the first man was baptised by Hibil-Ziwa when he breathed the pure mana into him and he got up, sneezed and lived.

And Adam questioned, and spoke, "Through the power of Hibil-Ziwa have I attained my end!"[1]

Then Hibil-Ziwa arose, put on the seven vestments, and went to the jordan-bank. When Adam had placed the qauqa [2] (and) fire before Hibil-Ziwa, Hibil-Ziwa twined a wreath for his staff and twined a wreath for Adam, then rose and went to the jordan and recited the prayer "Answer me, my father, answer me, for I have gone to the jordan in the strength of my father Yawar, and in the strength of Manda-ḏ-Hiia a wreath hath been set upon the 'uthras."

Then he arose and recited "In the name of that First Being" for his crown and set it on his head, then recited [3] "Life created Yawar-Ziwa", "Let there be light" and Manda created me" for the myrtle-wreath and set it beside the crown.

And he held the end of his stole and recited "Strengthened and enhanced is the great mystery of radiance, light and glory" over his pandama, folded his pandama over his mouth and recited "Incense that is fragrant, yea, for the First Life" and cast incense on the fire. And he recited "We have acknowledged," "Praises", "Thee, Thyself", "I sought to lift mine eyes", "The day that the jordan was bestowed on Sam-Smir", "I have worshipped and praised that Yawar-Ziwa" and "I am Yur son of Barit; in great radiance". And he held his stole and recited "I went to the jordan, but not I alone" up to the place where it says "give free movement to the limbs of my body; I go down," and he went down into the jordan up to a fourth of his thighs. And he recited "In the name of Yusmir, the First Vine" over his staff, and at the place where it saith "covered with radiance and clothed in light" he cast the myrtle-wreath over the staff and "clothed" it with his stole [4].

And he recited "Bound is the sea" and traced three circles [5] thrice over in the jordan. And he recited "I am a perfected gem", and "Avaunt, flee in fear" and splashed the water in the jordan at his right, his left and in front of him and recited "Piriawis" as written. Then he chanted a hymn and said to him "Any man who hath strength thereto and who loveth his soul, let him come and go down to the jordan, be baptised, receive the pure sign, put on robes of radiant light and set a fresh wreath on his head."

[1] Pthahil, who created Adam's body, was unable to give it life.

[2] The qauqa (a small terracotta cube) is placed on the birihia. (See MMII, p. 106). See p. 6, n. 3.

[3] In D.C.53 the narrative becomes directions to the priest in the imperative. I continue to use the narrative form.

[4] The myrtle-wreath is slipped over the staff in the water and the knotted stole looped over the staff, which is pushed upright into the river-bed, in such a way that it cannot fall or float away.

[5] Lit. "tracings", "drawings". The priest traces the circles about himself as he stands in the water, with the end of the staff.

And Adam descended into the jordan and submerged himself thrice behind him (Hibil-Ziwa), who took him by the right hand transferred him to his left, placed him between himself and his staff, dipped him thrice and signed him thrice in the jordan.

And he gave him three palmfuls of water to drink and recited "Manda created me" over the myrtle-wreath and set it upon his (Adam's) head and pronounced the secret names over him.

(Then) he took his hand in kušṭa over the staff and made him go up before him.

(Then) he took water from the jordan into his phial and recited the hymn "At the waterhead I went forth" and "Blessed art thou, Outer Door", and recited "I rose up from the jordan, and a group (of souls) I met". And he came up out of the jordan and completed it (the hymn). And he took up the oil and recited "We have acknowledged the name of Life", "Precious oil art thou" and "Thou wast established, First Life" over the oil. Then he signed him thrice and made passes over him thrice, and at each signing he laid his hand on his (Adam's) head and repeated those names which he had pronounced over him in the jordan.

And he performed kušṭa with him. (Then) he took the pihta and recited the eight prayers for the pihta over the pihta and the two prayers for the mambuha over the mambuha. And he gave him the pihta so that he should eat and gave him the mambuha that he might drink, and he drank the rinsing (water) [1]).

And he grasped his hand in kušṭa and seated him before him and recited the "sealing" prayers, "When a jordan of living water was bestowed upon Sam-Smir, the great Radiance of Life", "Bound and sealed", "By 'Uṣar-Hiia" and the greater (longer) "Bound and sealed" and laid his hand upon him and stood and recited "Ye are set up and raised up", "What did thy Father do for thee, Soul?", "How lovely are the plants which the jordan planted and raised up",

[1]) M.L. omits "and he drank the rinsing". It should be omitted.

"Rightly did my baptiser baptise me", "Šilmai baptised me with his baptism and Nidbai", "The jordan in which we were baptised will bear us witness", and "I rejoice in my priests and Naṣoraeans who hearken to my converse".

And he chanted the hymns "Truly do I say to you", "To you I cry and explain" and "A new disciple am I who hath come to the jordan bank".

And he read all the hymns and homilies unto their end and recited "Blessed and praised be Life" of Šum son of Noah and "Good is the good for the good". And he recited "In radiance that is great am I immersed" and loosed his kanzala (stole) and "honoured" his crown [1]).

And Life is victorious.]

[Then Hibil-Ziwa gave judgement and said "The Life hath anathematised and Manda-ḏ-Hiia hath cried out against and the Great First Word hath pronounced against any man, priest, who performed a baptism without his pandama. He shall be accursed by the Name (Vein) [2]) of the Great Wellspring: Šilmai and Nidbai the guardian 'uthras of the jordan will curse him and the Wellspring and Palmtree will curse him. Yukabar will take away his crown and his seal and hurl him back to his natural home, the Place of Darkness. Moreover, before any Naṣoraean who retains his pandama whilst performing a baptism, a vein of the Great Wellspring will heap up and all that he doeth will be confirmed. All mischances will avoid him and darkness will roll away from him. His vestments [3]) will be kept in our safekeeping. Whilst he is alive in his body the Seven will be powerless to loose fear against him and lofty strength will be sent to him.

When he departeth the body the clouds which precede 'uthras will come towards him and dread of purgatory-demons [4]) will be powerless over him (for) he will not pass through the Purgatories [4]).

And Abatur will clothe him in his glory and all the 'uthras will shed their light upon him.

And Life is victorious.

[1]) See p. 28 n. 3.

[2]) D.C. 3 and M.L. both have širiana for kiniana.

[3]) D.C.3 has "his head".

[4]) Mandaean literature, especially the Diwan Abatur, justifies this translation. The planetary watchhouses are places of purgation.

This is the limit [1] (end) of the baptism which came to this world, the (baptism) wherewith Hibil-Ziwa baptised Adam the first man and it was preserved in the ages for the elect righteous, for it was written down in the scroll of the Great Wellspring belonging to Ramuia son of 'Qaimat. And Bayan-Hibil son of Brik-Yawar wrote it here and distributed it amongst a hundred Naṣoraeans, (copying) it from his own scroll which he copied from the scroll of Ramuia son of 'Qaimat. [2]

It was written in the town of Ṭib and was placed with Haiuna daughter of Yahia, and Bainai son of Zakia.

Those who hold to it, (let them) expound it. (But) he who doth not establish it, let him keep away from it and not approach it.

And Life is victorious.]

Then said Yahia-Adam son of Sam-Saiwia, "When the scroll of Ramuia son of 'Qaimat found in the possession of Haiuna daughter of Yahia and Bainai son of Zakia came into my possesion [3] I put it together and arranged it as it was written originally, and removed nothing from it.

And Life is victorious.]

THE MASIQTA [4]

32

In the name of the Great Life may there be healing for me, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš!

Strengthened, enhanced was the great mystery of radiance, light and glory dwelling on the mouth of the First Life, for from It came forth Manda-ḏ-Hiia (Knowledge-of-Life). For he knew and interpreted the thoughts of the First Life and perceived that they are wondrous. [1]

[1] Lidzbarski translates Verordnung and gives the reason in footnote 1, M.L. p. 60.

[2] According to Yaqut Ṭib was in his time inhabited by Nabataeans who spoke Nabataean (i.e. Mandaic ?). According to the Haran Gawaita it was the first settlement of the Naṣoraeans when they migrated from Harran under the protection of the Parthian kings. In the same manuscript, as in many other colophons, Ramuia son of 'Qaimat is mentioned as a liturgist who collected scattered texts, edited them and distributed them in early Moslem times.

[3] Lit. "fell towards me" i.e. "fell into my hands".

[4] "The raising up" (i.e. spiritual resurrection or ceremony to aid the ascent of the soul).

And Life be praised!

[Recite this prayer and hold thy stole for the masiqta.]

33

In the name of the Life!

Water of Life [2] art thou! Thou art come from the Place which is life-giving and art poured forth from the House of Life.

(At thy) coming, Water-of-Life, from the House of Life, the good come and refresh themselves, (but) the wicked are discomfited and the children of (this) world abashed and say "Is there (not?) room for us in the Place of Light? For those that seek (ask) of it find, and those who speak of it are heard".

We have sought and found and we have spoken and been heard in thy presence, Manda-ḏ-Hiia, lord of healings. As water when poured out falleth on the earth, so (too) so doth evil fall abased before good. As the water falleth on the earth, so shall their sins, trespasses, follies, stumblings and mistakes be loosed from those who love the name of Truth (kušṭa) and from the souls of this masiqta, and from (the souls of) our fathers, teachers, brothers and sisters who have departed the body, and those who (still) live in the body And say "Established is Life (or "the living") in Its (their) dwelling".

And Life is victorious.

[This is the mambuha prayer]

34

Hail [3] to the First Life before Whom none existed, the Sublime from worlds of light, the Ineffable which is above all works; to the Ancient Radiance and the Great Primal Light, the Life which emanated from Life and the Truth that was of old, from the beginning. Hail the ancient, lofty, esoteric and guarded father of 'uthras. Hail Yuzaṭaq, Gnosis of Life, Source of Life; He who unveileth the silence [1]), giveth hope and keepeth the prayers of the spirits and souls of righteous and believing men into the Place of Light. Hail to the life of sincere and believing men who have come to their end and departed the body, and hail to those who are still alive in the body. May the gate of sin be barred to them and the gate of light be open for them. May they be knit together in the communion of Life in which there is no separation.

[1] Or "noble" or "distinguished".

[2] Mia hiia could almost always be so translated in ritual mss. Lit. "living waters". In the material sense "living water" is flowing water.

[3] Hal here is best translated "hail". It is a salutation, a greeting. In Prayer 5 I translated it "yea for" (Lidzbarski M.L. ja für) because the incense is a tribute to the spirits named.

Pray ye from there for us and we will pray from here for you. All fruits wither: all sweet odours pass away, but not the fragrance of Gnosis of Life, which cometh not to an end nor passeth away for an age of ages and for world without end. May the souls of this masiqta rise up without sin, trespass, folly, stumbling and mistake unto the Place of Light and to the Enduring Abode.

And Life be praised!

[Read this ordinance for the incense and cast it on the fire. Then recite the prayers for the masiqta.]

35

In the name of the Life!

I sought to lift my eyes, shoulders and arms towards the Place which is all life, radiance and glory, the place where which is all life, radiance, light and glory; a place where they who seek of it find, those who speak of it are heard and to those who ask of it, it is given them, day by day and hour by hour. This hour I address to thee, my Lord, Manda-ḏ-Hiia, a vital petition, large and not small, for this congregation of people [2]) who have bent their knees to the ground and stretched forth their hands to the intermediate and upper (worlds). They have forsaken images, pictures and idols of clay, gods (made) of blocks of wood [3]), and vain rites, and have testified to the name of the great, strange (sublime) Life. To them the gate of sin is closed and for them the gate of life is open. May our request, our prayer and our humble submission rise before the supreme Life which is above all works.

Before thee (in thy sight) all hands are thieving, all lips have lied. Water is in the jordan. Before thee (in thine eyes), Manda-ḏ-Hiia, no man is clean: we are slaves who are all sin, and thou a lord who art all mercy. When thou art with us, who shall conquer us and if thou justifiest us who will convict us? Judge us not after the fashion of earthly courts of law; despise us not for our follies and associate us not with the false rites practised by the worlds and generations.

[1]) See Prayer 8. Lit. "showeth forth silence".

[2]) Cf. ܓܽܘܕܳܐ "a body of people, congregation, company".

[3]) Cf. ܩܽܘܪ̈ܡܶܐ: plu. "tree-roots cast up by flood".

The worlds thrust hard at us, but we fell not. Backed by the Truth which is thine own, we have perfect confidence.

Establish life, and wilt thou not establish 1) human beings? Thou hast spoken to us in thy Word and hast commanded us with thy command "Ask on earth and I will supply you with heavenly fruit: ask from below, (from) reed 2), swamp and mud, and I will supply you from the lofty heavens. Make supplication with the fleshly right hand, and I will bring you (what ye asked) with the right hand of kušṭa. 3)

The first (generations) sought and found: let those that come after seek, and they will find. Seek and find for yourselves, for your friends, for your friends' friends and for those who love the great Family of Life. Your eyes shall not turn away from me unsatisfied." 4)

Thou art the father of all the 'uthras, the Support 5) which is all light, the Vine which is all Life and the great Tree which is all things. 6) For Thou knowest hearts, understandest minds and searchest out consciences (even) in the nethermost hells of darkness. Like a servant lying prostrate before Thee, our eyes are lifted to Thee, our lips give Thee praise and blessing seven hours of the day and the three watches of the night.

Those who seek of Him find, and to those who ask of Him it will be given. For to him that standeth at a closed door Thou wilt open the closed door. In the Place of Light Thou wilt wipe away and remove from us our sins, trespasses, follies, stumblings and mistakes and wilt cast them into the hells of the earth and the nethermost limbos of darkness. Thou wilt raise us up as sinless and not as guilty, as virtuous and not as vicious before thee, Manda-ḍ-Hiia.

1) The sentence is obscure. See M.L. p.66, n.2. The prefix mi shows it to be a question.

2) Hurda not ḥurba. See M.L. p.66, n.3. The picture is of a swamp country, similar to that in which Mandaeans live today, the marshes of southern 'Iraq.

3) Here kušṭa is the ritual act, see p. 2, n.1.

4) Lit. "empty".

5) 'Uṣṭuna, also "body", "corporation", "trunk", "pillar".

6) D.C. 53 has mindia; D.C. 3 and M.L. mandia (a curious plural in classical Mandaic).

The good behold and are refreshed: the wicked are discomfited and the children of (this) world abashed. And they say "Is there no place for me[1]) in the Place of Light, since those who seek therefrom find, and ask thereof and it is given them?"

We beseech thee to let some of thy radiance, thy light and thy glory rest upon us. Thou art the Healer above all means of healing, a Raiser-up above (all) that raiseth up, a Radiance above all radiancies and a light above all lights. For thou openest doors of truth and revealest mysteries and wisdom and showest forth mighty deeds in Jerusalem. Thou confinest demons and devils and frightenest away the gods from their high places. Great is thy name and praised is thy name! Thou art the counterpart of the Life, for thou wast in existence before all. Thou art the Vine, for thou wast in the Ether above heaven and above the earth. When worlds came into being and creations were called forth. thou didst hold in thy grasp the worlds and generations. Thou hast laid down a road for sincere and believing men to the Place of Life. (Though) spirits and souls sit (here) as guilty, (yet) by thy name they shall rise as innocent, (thy name of) Yuzaṭaq-Manda-ḏ-Hiia. To support the hands of good people, thou wilt be (bring?) healing of life to the souls of this masiqta Life is established in its indwellings and Life is victorious.

[This prayer is good for all occasions: (it may be used) on occasion for the Rahmia (daily office), or for the masiqta, or for baptism and for all purificatory rites. For the masiqta, after thou hast recited over the pandama, "water of prayer" [2]) and the ordinance for the incense, pray "We have acknowledged", "Praises", "To Thee", "Lifting eyes" and "I sought to raise my eyes". And prepare the pihta, mambuha and klila (wreath) and set them out for the masiqta. And recite the ordnance for the oil, (placed) in something clean: in a glass or tin cup when washed and cleansed. And recite the masiqta.]

In the name of the Life!

I worship, laud and praise that great, secret, First Mana who abode for nine hundred and ninety-nine thousand myriads of years alone in his own Abode - for no Companion came to him; (none existed) save that great, secret, First Mana. For he came into existence therein and developed therein.

[1]) Read 'tlan as in M.L. D.C. 3, like D.C. 53 has 'tlun.

[2]) "Water of prayer" is water drawn from the jordan like mambuha, but that poured into the "inner phial" used for the commingling - the ritual addition of water to the hamra (wine).

Then I worship, laud and praise that great, occult, First Drop 1) who emanated from Him. They existed, (but) She abode for four hundred and forty-four thousand myriads of years in Her own Abode, alone, for She had no consort

Then I worship, laud and praise Šar, that great occult first Vine, who was with them.

Then I worship, laud and praise Pirun, that great occult first Vine from whom there emanated eight hundred and eighty eight thousand myriads of 'uthras.

From Them and from those 'uthras proceeded one 'uthra, whose name is the Great Countenance 2) of Glory who is (at once) less than his brethren and more venerable than his parents. Manda-ḏ-Hiia, the well-prepared 'uthra, divulged and revealed and said "Any Naṣoraean man who sitteth to recite "Established is the First Life" and breaketh bread 3) will receive condemnation from the House of Life,"

And I am established, in the light of Life and Life is victorious.

I worship, laud and praise that Occult, great First Cloud of 4)

---

1) Niṭufta ניטופתא lit. "Drop". This curious appellation appears to designate the Female principle of Creation, the consort of the creator, or rather the receptive and productive side of creative deity. Because of its female character, the Niṭufta represents in certain texts the material side of the human spirit. For an analysis of her appearance in Mandaean texts see J.B. p. 227. Used in the plural niṭufiata = spirits of life of a productive (i.e. female) character.

2) Or, "Presence".

3) Pihta is the sacramental bread and the verbs PTA and PTH (or PHT) used in conjunction with it, describe the act of ritual breaking, of bread, and sometimes of the whole sacramental act of partaking of it. Mqaimatum (etc.) is repeated by a celebrant after making, baking and consuming his own pihta at the rite of preparation before baptism and again after the baptism and communion of the baptised. He usually makes and bakes three times, twice for himself and once for the person or persons baptised.

4) A Cloud is a spirit of life (female again, like a "Drop"). The word is used for a "divine consort", a "heavenly spouse". As priests are the earthly representatives of 'uthras and malkas, their wives are sometimes spoken of as "clouds" or "drops".

Life, with whom in secret, he [1] broke bread and gave thereof in secret to the Occult Life and to the Mighty First Life.

And Life is victorious.

38

I have worshipped and praised Yawar-Ziwa, who arose and praised that great mighty Mana at whose right and left hand there stand four hundred and forty-four thousand myriads of 'uthras. A thousand myriads of 'uthras, sons of light, worship and laud the rays of his Radiance.

He arose and broke bread in secret and gave thereof to the sons of men and establisheth his Abode in secret.

39

I worship, laud and praise that secret saying which Yawar pronounced secretly. He made it known, and divulged and established a Life-ray therein. Radiance and light came and dwelt at his right and glory and resplendence dwelt at his left. And the 'uthras entreated the Life that they might behold the Likeness of Yawar-Ziwa in their own [2] glory.

Yawar-Ziwa the vigilant 'uthra divulged and revealed and said "Sixty-four sins daily will be forgiven a Naṣoraean man who repeats this secret saying, in the Great Place of Life and the Lasting Abode".

And Life is praised.

40

I have worshipped and praised 'Uṣar, who broke bread for the hidden first 'uthras, so that they (find) rest in their hearts.

The holy [3] 'uthras stood in their dwellings [4] and praise the mighty Life in its Dwelling, adorable in Its radiance and wondrous in Its light.

[1] Lidzbarski translates for pta pihta "das Pihta ..schuf" throughout these hymns. It may refer to the sacramental "breaking of bread" see p. 37, n. 3.

[2] I.e. in the glory of Yawar-Ziwa and his Dmuta (Likeness or Counterpart)? The plural seems unjustified by the context.

[3] Kasia plu. Kasiia, "mystic", "occult" can sometimes be better rendered by the word "holy".

[4] The various meanings of škinta must be borne in mind: i.e. "dwelling" "indwelling", "shecinah" and "sanctuary" or "shrine" (as of the cult-hut and its precinct).

I worshipped and praised that supreme First Vine, for within it is its Sap: its leaves are 'uthras and its tendrils rays of light. 'Uthras sit in its shade. And within the great first Cloud of Light there came into existence, within the Treasure-of-Light there was generated, the Secret Mana.

And Life be praised.

I worshipped and praised Treasure-of-Light, the great Awaker (yawar) of Life, who broke bread in the Hidden and gave (thereof) to the Mighty First Life in Its Dwelling. I praised the seven mystic precious and preserved *mana*s who derived existence from Their Place and were transplanted from Their Treasure-house. I worshipped and praised the mighty First Life that transported Itself from Its Place, transferred itself from its own Treasurehouse in which it came into existence, was developed, dwelt and was established; and (whereof) It discoursed and wherein It had gloried.

It praiseth and speaketh, "Every Naṣoraean who reciteth these secret sayings will seek and find, will speak and be heard seven times daily. And seven sins will be forgiven him in the great Place of Light and Eternal Abode.

And Life be praised!

I worship, laud and praise that first secret Word which Yawar imparted in secret. He expounded and explained it and established therein that which is living, Rays (of his light). And Yawar said "Enlightenment and praise have come to pass". And Yawar came and his glory rested upon his own škinta. Radiance and Light came and were established before him: Glory and Enlightenment came and dwelt at his right hand. And the 'uthras[1]) ask the Life to behold the appearance of Yawar-Ziwa in their (its?) radiance, and to commend the prayer and praise which they pronounced to Šilmai and Nidbai, the 'uthras who are the two messengers of Manda-ḏ-Hiia

Yawar hath said, "Every Naṣoraean who repeateth this secret prayer seven times daily, seven sins a day shall be forgiven him. And Life abideth in its Dwelling".

Life is victorious.

43

Thou, Manda-ḏ-Hiia, hast established for thy chosen that which thou hast revealed to us from the book Nhur (Be light) and from Pta 'uṣra (They revealed treasure [1]) and from 'Uṣar Nhura (Treasure of Light), a solace, a great support of life, that which shineth in light, the light of which enlighteneth.

It (Manda, gnosis) came into being, was revealed, fulfilled and went forth in strength abundant and became mighty by growth of knowledge [2]) It increased in radiance and was full of light which proceeded from the Counterpart(?) of [3]) Life, a wondrous counterpart!

Thereupon the worlds were ashamed, for none had seen its like, its brilliance or its glory.

Kušṭa standeth by his friends and Manda-d-Hiia by his chosen ones.

For thou hast chosen (us), hast taken us out of the world of hatred, envy and disputes and hast set us firmly on paths of truth and faith, so that we stand and praise the holy and guarded place. And he who partaketh of this bread (pihta), put out [4]) (for him) will be sinless in the Place of Light, the Everlasting Abode.

And Life is victorious.

[These are the prayers appointed for the pihta].

44

Biriawiš, source of living waters, first upsurging that sprang forth, great outburst of the radiance of all-abundant Life! (Be) life for the souls of this masiqta.

---

[1]) Lit. "opened treasure".

[2]) Rabut manda.

[3]) Lidzbarski translated dimat hiia, Träne des Lebens (Life's tears), an unsatisfactory translation. "Distillation" (ܕܡܥܬܐ) is also doubtful. I take the word to be influenced by dmu, which follows closely, hence possibly an archaic form of dmut? See below, p. 43 n.5, where dimat hiia recurs - dmut hiia ḏ-mn dimat hiia (counterpart of Life that is from the likeness of Life ?).

[4]) Brita. I suggest a connection with "food put out for mourners" (see Hif. of ברי "to strengthen, offer refreshment, esp. to mourners").

[This is the appointed prayer for the mambuha. If there are (several) souls, read as written; if one soul say 'for this the soul of N.']

Thy name, (O) Life, is excellent: its glory is great, its light abundant. Its goodness came over (or overflowed), inaugurating the First Mystery, life which proceeded from Life and Truth which existed before the beginning. This is a wellspring of life which sprang forth from the Place of Life: we drink thereof, of this Fount of Life which Life transmitted was established in the House of Life, which crossed worlds, came, cleft the heavens and was revealed.

Thou hast shown us that which the eye of man hath not seen, and caused us to hear that which human ear has not heard. Thou hast freed us from death and united us with life, released us from darkness and united us with light, led us out of evil and joined us to good. Thou hast shown us the Way of Life and hast guided our feet into ways of truth and faith so that Life cometh and expelleth darkness and goodness cometh and casteth out evil. (Like) the mingling of wine with water, so may Thy truth, thy righteousness and thy faith be added to those who love Thy name of Truth.

And Life be praised.

[This is the set prayer for the mambuga (sacramental drink). Make the pihta and the mambuha and place them (ready for) the masiqta, and then make the myrtle wreath.]

46[1]

In the Name of Life![2]

The Light became light, the Light became light! The Light became the light of the First Life. Glory[2] dawned[3] and (there was) praise of the Mana who came from his Place. He came (with) an ether-wreath, with benefits that are from the Place of Light and the Everlasting Abode. Yufin-Yufafin was the weaver of the wreath; she who brought it was 'Niṣbat'-Utria (She-planted i.e. was the mother of uthras). And he who set wreath on was 'It-Yawar-Ziwa (There-is-dazzling-Radiance) son of 'Niṣbat-'Utria: he brought it and set it on the head of the Mana, planted it (there) so that it was set up (thereon).

[1] Lidzbarski considers Prayer 5 so like Prayer 46 that he neither reproduces the text nor translates it. The priests, on the contrary, insist on a very exact pronunciation of the first words: (nhur nhura and nhar nhura) and say that there is a difference in meaning. In all the copies of the ʿniania the earlier pages and the last pages are those which become worn out most quickly, I am inclined to think that Prayer 46 is nearer the original version. However, whatever the variations in the text of the two prayers, they should be noted.

[2] 'ruta. I am reluctant to accept without reservation Lidzbarski's translation "Erleuchtung". The root could be 'R' as the ע would disappear: derivation from 'WR or AWR or unlikely.

[3] Nihrat "it became light" "was light" is freely translated as "dawned".

The wreath flames and the leaves of the wreath flame. Before the Mana there is radiance, behind the Mana there is light and glory, at either side of the Mana are radiance, brilliance and purity; and at the four corners of the heavens [1]) and on the seven sides of the firmament dwell silence, bliss and glory.

Enlightened and enlightening are words of light to the souls of this masiqta. Sure, assured, [2]) armed and prepared, resplendent and beauteous (are they) when the wreath with its mysteries is set on the heads of these souls of this ascent (masiqta) to the great gate of Abathur's house. They will open to them the great gate of Abathur's house and will guard them by secret and watchful manas. [3])

And Life be praised!

[These two prayers are said over the myrtle-wreath in the masiqta].

In the name of the Life!

Manda-d-Hiia went to the stars. His appearance [4]) loosed the bound (souls): he knit (them into?) the communion that is without parting and without limit or number, by his word which issued from him in that place. All the worlds were confounded: the works of the House [1]) were destroyed and there was security for sons of the Great Family of Life.

[1]) An obvious corruption, see Prayer 5.

[2]) The play on words is intentional.

[3]) Or, acc. to Lidzbarski, "in verborgenenen wohlverwahrten Gewändern bewahren".

[4]) In support of his translation "des (schönen) Aussehens" Lidzbarski adduces GR 10,6 and JB 110,3. I cannot bring myself to agree, for the stars here are enemies, far from admirable. True, in Syriac we get gabra hizua "a man (of handsome) appearance" in proof of GR and JB, but hizua both in Syriac and Mandaic has also the meaning "a vision", "appearance". The reference is to Manda-ḏ-Hiia's (or Hibil-Ziwa's) descent to the planetary purgatories in which souls expiate sins committed on earth.

He planted his planting and descended to the earth, (where) the hand of Evil, of the Lord of the House, lay heavy upon them. And when wickedness oppressed them, they beheld his radiance, and some of the celestial fruits appeared to them, the strength and name of the Ineffable One Who is all light was revealed to them and some of His glory was communicated [2]) to them and Knowledge of Life (Manda-ḏ-hiia) was revealed to all who love his name of Truth at the place which is wholly (inhabited by) those convicted of sin.

And when they beheld him, the lords of the worlds were confounded but did not, from their thrones, loose (the bonds of) the captives.

He passed by: the captives were freed. He loosed them from their sins and trespasses: yea, release from their bodies was made possible to them. And (as for) the lords of the House who looked on, their ranks were discomfited and they were unable to reach him. Yea, the name of Abathur was (set) over them and the name of Yuzaṭaq-Manda-ḏ-Hiia was fulfilled and revealed to those who love his name. And his name shall (aid) the souls of this masiqta: it will be his name.

And Life is victorious.

[This is the recitation appointed for the masiqta. Read it over pure oil in something (pure?) and place it before thee and then read the masiqta].

49

In the name of the Strange (Sublime) Life!

This, the glory and light of life, is to bring forth the spirit and soul from the body and to clothe the living soul in a living garment. Yea, she is solaced [4]) and liveth, the counterpart of Life, she that emanated from a.........[5]) of Life, with the Outer Life, with Hauraran and Karkawan-Ziwa, with Treasure-of-Light, the solace and great support of life, with life that emanated from the Life and with the truth which existed of old in the beginning. They live in their shecinahs, [1] and the Great Light (abideth) in its purities.

[2]) Lit. "went out over them".

[3]) The "pure oil" of the masiqta is the expressed oil of sesame and date juice. These are pounded together and strained. Baptism oil is sesame oil only.

[4]) Hadinat (Lidzbarski leaves untranslated) is probably a corruption of ha ʿdinat as translated; but the meaning is doubtful.

[5]) Dimat again (see p. 40, n.3.)

When any human being departeth from his body, there come towards him seven godlike appearances [2], and each standeth by his own. And Ṣauriel the Releaser cometh - he who releaseth spirit and soul from the body. Up there, with those works, he standeth with the vesture of Yuzaṭaq-Manda-ḏ-Hiia which releaseth (the soul). And Hauraran and Karkawan-Ziwa remove from her that in her which is of the body, and she putteth on the dress of Yuzaṭaq-Manda-ḏ-Hiia. Garment on garment she putteth on, she arrayeth herself in robe after robe. When she weareth the vesture of Yuzaṭaq-Manda-ḏ-Hiia there, she laugheth, rejoiceth, leapeth for joy, danceth, exulteth and is overjoyed about the glorious splendour [3] resting (upon her) and the glory that accrueth to her.

Onward she goeth in the vesture of Yuzaṭaq-Manda-ḏ-Hiia. The planets who are in their places were out of coutenance on seeing it: they clenched their fists, beat on the forecourt of their breasts and say "Woe on (us) planets! for they (we) are powerless, but the works of Their hands are victorious!"

And they say "How beautiful is this radiancy, how steadfast this light, how lovely this glory and how wondrous this appearance!" And they ask "Who will clothe us with this radiance? Who will cover us with this light and who will shed on us this glory? And what is it that passeth before us in this guise? for it is fair, shining and bright: in this world nothing made can be compared to it!" And they exclaim "How good is Kušṭa to the good, and Manda-ḏ-Hiia to all his chosen, (those) who stand in their bodies and dedicate themselves to the name of the Life and to becoming (thus)!"

She goeth on in the vesture of Yuzaṭaq-Manda-ḏ-Hiia and they let those deeds of hers pass by and (escape) the hands of all the planets.

And on she [4] went and reached Abathur's house of detention,

[2] The seven planets, which wait to carry off the soul to their maṭarata (houses of detention, purgatories).

[3] See above, p. 20, Prayer 24 "rejoicing, laughing, dancing, exulting about the glorious splendour" etc.

[4] The narrative is here in the 1st. person "I went on" etc. but returns again to the original "she". I think it better to continue throughout in the 3rd. person.

(Abathur), the Ancient, Lofty, Holy and Guarded one. There his scales are set up and spirits and souls are questioned before him as to their names, their signs, their blessing, their baptism and everything that is therewith.

The soul of N. hath entered the House of Abathur and hath given her name, her sign, her blessing, her baptism and everything that is therewith!

The souls of our fathers were signed with the sign of Life and the name of the Life and the name of Manda-ḏ-Hiia was pronounced over them. They put them in the scales, putting in their deeds and rewards [1] and weighed them. And the perfect went in (also), the spirit with the soul, but they took them out (for they were) clean. Radiance issued from the radiance of Abathur and clothed them and they brought light and covered them (therewith).

(Like them) she (the soul) put on garment on garment and robe over robe like the vestments of Abathur. There she laugheth, rejoiceth, leapeth for joy, danceth, exulteth and is overjoyed about the glorious splendour which resteth (on her) and accrueth to her [2]. And she proceedeth in the vesture of Yuzaṭaq-Manda-ḏ-Hiia and went on [3] and reacheth the watch-house (house of detention) of four beings, sons of perfection, 'In-Hai, Šum-Hai, Ziv-Hai and Nhur-Hai [4]. Each of these beings clotheth her with his radiance and each covereth her with his light. Garment on garment she putteth on, with garment after garment doth she clothe herself. When she puts on the vesture of the sons of perfection she laugheth, rejoiceth, leapeth for joy, danceth, exulteth and is overjoyed about the glorious splendour, the honour resting on and belonging to her. She proceeded in the vesture of Yuzaṭaq-Manda-ḏ-Hiia and went[5] onwards and reached the Waters of Death [6]. The waters covered her, (but) Radiance crossed over - his name abode in his škinta: honoured and chosen, he created [7] himself - and said "Life, I am Thine, and for Thy name's sake came I forth from the world of

He is a ray [2] of the great radiance of Life, a being who resteth upon the *škinta*s, and upon *škinta*s doth his name rest.

He graspeth her with the palm of his right hand and handeth her over to two 'uthras, sons of light, to Adatan and Yadatan, of one gnosis and one mind. And Adatan and Yadatan hand her over to two 'uthras, to 'Uṣar-Hai and to Pta-Hai who open the Door [3] of Life, plant the plant of Life and establish the first counterpart of the House of Life. They raised her up beside the living [4] they bring her in, in the likeness of Life they support her in the Place where radiance, like light, flameth. And the spirit [5] of N. went and became of the same nature as the soul and was established in the House of Life.

And Life is victorious.

[Note. The following hymn reads like pure nonsense. Lidzbarski suggested that it had been mutilated and misunderstood : Das Stück besteht aus abgerissenden schwer verständlichen, wohl auch stark enstellten Sätzen. (M.L, p. 84, n.4)].

Rightly did the baptist baptise me (in the waters of?) Yaluz-Yaluz [6] for their spring is Hammamulai [7]. My name, Ksasar-Hamamulai is spoken, disseminated, guarded, hidden and pure. They (the waters?) knew the source from which they proceeded : its name was on the sky, its glory on the earth. For upon treasure, in treasure, the Great Life existed and was fulfilled in Its glory.

[1] The translation is unsatisfactory, one would expect titia. I find Lidzbarski's translation unsatisfactory too: for the saviour spirit is explaining its purpose.

[2] ṣurik with ziwa occurs fairly often. Lidzbarski translated "Ausfluss" (cf. زهة); but a connection with زهش is indicated, a verb used for lightning and meteors.

[3] To justify the translation "door": see Levy, Targ. פְּתָחָא (syr. ܦܬܚܐ hebr. פֶּתַח) Eingang, Thüre. Lidzbarski translated (M.L.p. 84, n.2) die die Schöpfung des Lebens schaffen.

[4] D.C. 3. arimlḫ kanfia hiia.

[5] "Of the same nature as the soul". Commentaries say that after purification the spirit unites with the soul "as one". (ATŠ No. 282 "the twain become, as it were, a single body").

[6] "joyful, rejoicing?" (עלין עליזא).

[7] 'Ulai was the ancient name of the Karun river in Khuzistan. Here, Hamamulai perhaps = "the hot springs of the Karun"? There are hot springs at Shustar.

I sit on a perfected garment [1] and by the great fountainhead of Yukabar-Hiia, beneath a Vine which riseth above me. Praise-of-Life standeth before me. "Who will manifest himself and come and speak to me?" "I am he who is manifest, for I am great". The life that is beneath me is the Vine which riseth above me, Praise-of-Life standeth before me. This is my name and my sign which I received from waves of water and from treasures of radiance and from the great and lofty Mixing-Bowl (?).

And Life is victorious.

In the name of the Life!

I am baptised in the name of the Strange Life, the Sublime (Being) above all works. I am established in the name of Treasure-of-Light. Yawar from the House of Life revealed (himself?) and shone forth [2], establishing his counterpart, transplanting the Great Life in his light. The worlds thrust at us, but we fell not; backed by Thy truth, we have confidence. The first sprout hath burst forth - a ray [3] of the great radiance of Life in its triumphs; Truth (kušṭa) and the great Source (kana) [4] of its glory.

And Life be praised!

52

Whose son am I? (Of?) the guarded Mana, who is Yusmir, the First Great Radiance, son of the great Primal Life, who pondered and went forth seeking His own, that which came from Him. The congregation of souls, on the last day, when departing from their bodies, rejoice in Him, embrace Him and rising up, behold the outer ether and the enduring Abode and praise the Great Life in Its light.

And Life is victorious!

[1] "In a perfected garment" would make better sense, if sense were possible in this obscure hymn.

[2] 'Udna is "ear". In one copy only Lidzbarski found 'uṣrḥ on which he based his translation. I suggest that 'udna is simply a miscopying of udna "and shone forth". Yawar is always associated with light.

[3] See p. 46, n. 2. Or, "a flash".

[4] The word has kana has varied meanings: a receptacle, collection, assembly, group, stem, race, base, fundament, origin, place of origin, source, home etc.

A letter, union and victory have come to this the soul of N. from the House of Life. Its fastening is water, its wreath is light, its weapon the living word, and its seal the Chosen, the Pure One. Every man who openeth it and readeth therein shall live, be whole, and his name will be set up in the House of Life in the name of the Great Sublime Life. And the First Life is established in Its škinta.

[This is the seal of the masiqta. Up to this point recite the masiqta, and here take the pihta and break off a morsel from one upper faṭira 1) and the undermost faṭira and bring a portion of the Ba 2) and fold them together. And mingle the "water of prayer" 3) with the wine 4) and recite over them "Yukašar chose her (the soul) who passeth over" and recite "The Life spoke and opened" and part thy pandama and eat thy pihta and drink thy mambuha and recite "The Water of Life burst forth in splendour in its škinta.]

1) A faṭira is a disc of dough without leaven or salt. A number of these (usually sixty) are made for a masiqta, but only two small fragments (as described above taken from a pile on the ritual table) are eaten by celebrants. The remaining faṭiria are buried in the sacred precincts at the conclusion of the rite.

2) The word (always written bḫ) is pronounced Ba, and priests all say that it refers to the dove. The rite of slaughter of the dove is one of the ritual mss in a priest's library.

3) See p.36 n. 2.

4) Hamra (wine) is made just before the masiqta by macerating four raisins in a bowl of water.

5) D.C.31 libraia (= לעבראיא) i.e. the soul crossing the "waters of death". Lidzbarski, M.L. 88:5, translates "den Jenseitigen". The context shows that one soul is meant.

called upon, raised up and signed [1] in this masiqta, (the souls of) our fathers, teachers, brothers and sisters who have departed the body, and of those who still live in the body. They shall rise upward on a smooth road and by the path of the perfect, shall behold the Place of Light and the everlasting Abode and be established by Him who opened (revealed) the great first light.

And Life is victorious.

The Great Life spoke and revealed (opened [2])) with His mouth, in His own radiance light and glory.

And Life be praised.

[This is for the loosing of the pandama. Recite this "Yukašar chose her who passeth over" over the "water of prayer" and wine when they are mingled together. If it is for (several) souls that he has recited read as written, but if for a single soul say "the soul of N. shall be awakened" [3]). And say "The Great Life spoke and opened with His mouth" and part thy pandama, eat thy pihta and drink thy mambuha. And recite "The living water shone forth in its place" then rise, and read one prayer after another until the (prayer) "Yukašar chose her that passeth over" hath been offered up.]

In the name of the Life!

Living waters shone forth (in splendour) in their škinta. The robes of [4]) the good were resplendent in their place. The great Mana was dazzlingly bright in [5]) His glory. So (too) shall these living, (brightly) shining, steadfast and vigorous souls shine in splendour in the great Place of Light and the Everlasting Abode.

[This is a prayer of dedication for the "water of prayer"]

[1]) All the faṭiria have been signed. They represent the souls included in the masiqta, whereas the pihta, which has been "clothed" and to which a portion of dove's flesh and two morsels (see above) have been added, represents the deceased for whom the masiqta is celebrated.

[2]) Priests associate this short verse with the opening up of the pandama for the sacramental eating and drinking.
This rite is, according to tradition, an "opening of the mouth" of the dead, as the celebrant acts as the proxy of the deceased. Cf. the Babylonian pit pi.

[3]) Nitiairia (see p. 48, n. 6) could also mean "will shine forth".

[4]) Read ḏ-ṭabia.

[5]) l'qarḫ is written: (chez lui?).

57

Fragrant incense riseth to its place and Thou, Life, be victorious! The Forgiver of sins, trespasses, follies, stumblings and mistakes will forgive all those who love his name of Truth (kušṭa) and (likewise) the soul of N.

And Life is victorious.

[A dedication prayer for the incense]

In the name of the Life!

Praised be the First Life, praised be the Word of the First Life: praised be that radiance, light and glory; praised be that Light which is boundless and endless and none know when it came into being. Praised be the Lord of Greatness [1] and praised be all the 'uthras that stand to the right and left of the Lord of Greatness and praise the Lord of Greatness. Praised be my father Yawar, praised be all the 'uthras who stand and praise my father Yawar. Praised be that great first Jordan in which the First Life was baptised. Praised be all jordans of living water: praised be the fruits, grapes and trees which stand by them. Praised be all the mighty and lofty worlds of light; praised be all those sanctuaries (škinata) of the Hidden [2] for in each and every škinta sit a thousand thousand 'uthras, ('uthras) without end, and the myriad myriad sanctuaries that are countless. Praised are those thousand thousand 'uthras without end and the myriad myriad sanctuaries beyond count.

Praised be all those banners of radiance, light and glory unfurled before them which give them light. Praised be the great gate of the House of Abathur; praised be all 'uthras who stand before Abathur and praise him. Praised be the three hundred and sixty scales which are set up before the ancient Abathur; praised be that first great Scales that was set up before Abathur the Ancient. Praised be that great occult Drop from which he proceeded. Praised be all 'uthras who sit upon thrones of rest and recite ordinances and masiqtas and secret prayers. Praised be those recitations, masiqtas, and secret prayers in which the Great (Life) is praised. Praised be those priests [3] who sit with them.

[1] A priest who instructs postulants for priesthood is called a rba and his office rabuta, so that Mara-ḏ-Rabuta could be translated "lord of instruction".

[3] Or "disciples".

Praised be all mountains of radiance, light and glory; praised be all roads and paths of light.

First Life! Lift up Thine eyes upon these souls called upon, raised up and signed in this masiqta and (the souls of) our father, brothers and sisters who have departed the body, and of those who still tarry in the body. Deliver them, save them and protect them from this world of the wicked and from those watch-houses (purgatories). Let thy mercy, Great First Life, rest upon them. And ye shall say "Life is established in its indwellings".

And Life is victorious.

[This is an offering-up of supplications. It is the dedicatory prayers of the masiqta. Pray "We have acknowledged", "Praises", "Thee, Thyself", "Raising eyes" and "I sought to raise my eyes". If thou recitest for (several) souls read as written, if it is one soul say "Lift thine eyes upon the soul of N"].

59

Life is fulfilled in its own glory and the Great Light established by its victories.

[This is the prayer offered up for the pihta].

The Great Life dwelleth in those that love Him, and His devotees dwell in the Great Place of Light and the Everlasting Abode.

And Life be praised!

[This is the dedicatory prayer for the mambuha.]

61

An earthly wreath fadeth, [1] but the wreath of Life is fresh and living [2]. The wreath of an elect righteous man is set and shineth on the heads of those who love the name of Truth (kušṭa). The wreath is from the world of light and the robe from the Everlasting Abode. The ether-wreath is set, with its purities [3], and shineth on the heads of these souls of this masiqta.

And Life is victorious.

[This is the prayer put up for the wreath of a masiqta. If thou recitest for several souls, read as written, but if for a single soul say "on the head of this soul of N."]

In great radiance am I immersed and in steadfast light am I established. Manda [1]) baptised me, Kušṭa confirmed me. A letter, communication (communion) and purity came to me from the House of Life. Its fastening is water, its wreath is light, its weapon the living word, and its seal the chosen, pure one [2]). Every man who openeth it and readeth therein shall live, shall be whole and his name will be set up in the House of Life, in the name of the great Sublime Life from worlds (of light?).

And Life is victorious.

[This is the prayer offered up for the masiqta oil.]

64

The Life dwelleth in its own radiance and light.

And Life be praised!

[This is the confirmation of the (prayer) "Yukašar chose her who passeth over". Here recite "Ye are set up and raised up" and the masiqta-hymns.]

65

Ye are set up and raised up into the Place where the good are established amongst manas of light, the souls called upon and raised up and signed by this masiqta and (the souls of) our fathers, our teachers, our brothers and our sisters who have departed the body, and of those who are(still) living in the body. Your manas shall be set up in the Light and ye will be established in the Light.

And Life is victorious.

In the name of the Life!

I am crowned with a wreath [3]) and lay me down [4])

[1]) Cf. Prayer 23.

[2]) The personified manda (this time the cult-hut and its precinct)? Or Gnosis?

[3]) Or "I have reached my end". The translation given above is probable, as a dying person is dressed in a spotlessly clean rasta (white ritual dress), and crowned with a myrtle wreath after being thrice immersed from head to foot.

[4]) "Lay down" or "slept", a synonym for death.

In a dress in which there is no blemish.
No spot is there in the dress,
Nor is there aught missing or lacking in it.
The Life knew about me.
Adam, who slept, awoke;
He grasped me with the palm of his right hand
And gave (not ?) into my hand a palmbranch. 1)
Light cast me into darkness,
But the darkness was filled with light.
The day that light ariseth,
Darkness returneth to its place.
The souls of this masiqta
Approach a cloud 2) of light.
Their journey is to the Place of Light.
And Life be praised.

[This is a masiqta hymn]

67

With him, with the Deliverer 3)
The souls of this masiqta will ascend.
They will behold the Place of Light
And the Everlasting Abode.
On their road the Seven will not detain them,
Nor will the Judge of the False question them.
The Life will count you in His reckoning
And the good will set you up in their midst.
To the place to which the good go they will guide you
And in the place in which they stand they will set you up;
Lamps of radiance are found before you,
Beams of light behind you.
Kušṭa will come at your right
And Piety will smoothen your path.
For you there will be loosings 4)
From here to the Everlasting Abode.
For the ferry which ferries over the Elect
Will set out towards you and take you across.

The saviour that cometh towards you
Is all radiancy and light from head to foot
Like the wreath in his right hand.
And on his two arms is a robe.
Bestir yourselves! Put on your robes!
Put on your living wreaths, gird on your girdles
In which nothing is awry or blemished.
Above your head there will be fruit,
And there, at your time and season
Your *mana*s will be set up in the Light.
Your *mana*s in the Light will be set up.
(So) rise up,behold the Place of Light!
And Life is victorious.

Between the Hidden and the Radiance,
Between Light and the 'uthras,
Between the Hidden and the Radiance
Stand those who question the soul,
Saying to her "Speak! say, soul,
Who constructed thee? who was thy Builder?
Who built thee and who was the Being, thy Creator?"
The soul spoke and said —
The edified, well-constructed soul spoke —
And saith to the Being who questioneth her,
Said to him, "My father, One built me, One constructed me".
One was the Being who transplanted me;
One of the sons of salvation in his goodness
Took (accepted) his lot (duty).
He folded me in a wrapping of radiance,
Took (me) and gave me over to Adam.
Adam, in his simplicity, whilst he knew not nor understood,
Took and cast me into a physical body 1);
Took me and cast me into a physical body
That is all sour and bitter fluids and decaying substances 2).

Who loosed her and bore her away:

Went before her whom he had bound.
Coming behind him, the soul hasted
Reached [2] her Deliverer, ran (after) him
Who had bound her to her dwelling.
The soul and her Deliverer (go):

The soul hath loosed her chain and broken her bonds;
She hath shed her earthly garment. [3]
She turned round, saw it and was revolted
She uttered an evil curse on the being

The hollow of thy hand is filled with water!"
The voice of the Framer-of-Bodies (is heard)[1],
Who howleth and weepeth for himself
And saith "Woe is me that the hollow of my hand
Is filled with water!" And to her he saith
"Go in peace, daughter of the free, whom
In the house of evil ones they called handmaiden.
Go in peace, pure pearl that was transported
From the treasuries of Life;
Go in peace, fragrant one who imparted
Her fragrance to the stinking body.
Go in peace, radiant one, who illumined
Her dark house. Go in peace,
Pure and chosen one, immaculate and spotless!"
Flying, the soul went
Until she reached the House of Life:
She arrived at the House of Life.
'Uthras went forth towards her,
Saying to her "Take and put on thy robe of radiance
And set on thy living wreath!
Arise, dwell in the *škinta*s,
The place where 'uthras abide, conversing;
And Life is victorious and triumphant is Manda-ḏ-Hiia
And lovers of his name".
And Life be praised!

70

Blessed and praised be Life
Who is filled with compassion for these souls.
Praised be thou, my lord, Manda-ḏ-Hiia,
For thou raisest up these souls and dost not condemn them.
Praised be thou, pure Yušamin,
For thou wilt give them thy helping hand.
Be ye praised, Šilmai and Nidbai,
For ye will give true witness concerning them.
And be ye praised, Hibil, Šitil, and Anuš
For ye will ransom them from the House-of-Dues
And from Abathur of the Scales!

For toward you will go forth a messenger,

[1] The Fashioner of Bodies must be the unsuccessful creator, Pthahil.

And the messenger who goeth toward you
Is all radiance and light from head to foot.
In his right hand a kind of wreath
And on both his arms a robe.
Up! put on your robes, set on your living wreaths!
Gird on your girdles that are flawless and faultless!

Above your heads there will be fruit,
And your lamps will hang amongst lamps of light
And will shed light.
The Lord of Tolls will not confront you
Nor will lying judges put you to the question.
They will bring you liberating words [1]
From here unto the Everlasting Abode,
The building that was built for you in the House of Life,
Will not come to nought in an age of ages!
And may some of Manda-ḏ-Hiia's radiance and light
And the revivifying-breath of Life [2] rest upon us!
Blessed is the Voice of Life
And praised be the great Beam which is all light.
And Life be praised.

[After thou hast recited "The Life dwelleth in its own radiance and light", "Ye are set up", "I am crowned with a wreath and lay me down", "With him, with the Deliverer", "Between the Hidden and the Radiance", "Bliss and peace there will be", "My vigilance and my praise giving","Go in peace, Pure Chosen one", "Well, well is it for thee, soul" and the other hymns, as many as thou art able, then recite the "Blessed and praised is Life" of Shem son of Noah.

If thou readest for (several) souls, read as it is written, but if only for one soul, say "The soul of N." and pay attention, with all watchfulness, clearness of mind and studious attention and recite "Good is the good for the good"; perform kušṭa [3] with one another and recite "In great radiance am I immersed".

And pray a prayer for yourselves and make pihta and mambuha

[1] Širiata in magic texts is "exorcisms", i.e. words that liberate. Lidzbarski translates Balken (from שָׁרִיתָא, שְׁרִי).

[2] A free translation. Ruaha has the meaning of enlargement, refreshment, restoration.

[3] Just as in the Eastern Church the Pax marks a stage in the ritual of the mass, so in Mandaean rites the kušṭa is performed after every stage of a rite.

for yourselves [1]) and eat your pihta and drink your mambuha And offer up the prayer "Good is the good for the good", perform kušṭa [2]) with one another for yourselves and (then) honour [3]) your crowns.
And Life is victorious.]

In the name of the Life!
Blessed and praised be the Life!
Blessed and praised be the name of Life in the Place of Light!
Blessed and praised art thou, my lord, Manda-ḏ-Hiia;
Thou and thy strength, thy radiance, thy light, thy glory and thy help.
Praised art thou, my father Yušamin the Pure,
Son of a transplanting of the mighty Life.
Praised art thou, Second Life, Life that is from Life.
Praised are ye, Šilmai and Nidbai, guardian 'uthras of the jordan.
Praised are ye, Nṣab and Anan-Nṣab.
(Praised are) [4]) our fathers Hibil, Šitil and Anuš
The name and chief of the whole race.
Praised art thou, Lofty Abathur;
Blessed and established is the great škinta in which thou sittest.
Praised are ye four beings, sons of Perfection, who go to meet the good;
Go forth to meet the good and clothe the good with robes.
Praised art thou, Earth of Light and blessed and praised Those who dwell in thee.
Blessed art thou, Road of the great [5]), path of the perfect
And track that riseth up to the Place of Light.
Blessed art thou, Naṣirutha [6]) from whom the elect learn;
From thee learn the elect, and deal out reward [7]) and pious gift [8])

[1]) The pihta and mambuha consumed by celebrants at the beginning of the masiqta and at its end are the ordinary sacramental bread and water. They are consumed by the priest as himself, whereas the pihta and mambuha of the masiqta are consumed by the priest as proxy of the deceased. Moreover the former is made of saltless flour, (the faṭira, to which scraps of ritual food are added) and the mambuha is hamra and water.

[2]) See p. 57. n. 3.

[3]) See p. 28, n. 3.

[4]) Missing in D.C. 3 and D.C. 53.

[5]) Or "teachers", see p. 50, n. 1.

[6]) A word which means true religion, the inner teaching.

[7]) The fees given to priests.

[8]) Offerings in kind, fruit, corn, vegetables, etc.

They deal with reward and pious gift and rise up and behold the Place of Light.
Praised art thou, jordan of living water, for from thee we obtain purity;
We obtain purity from thee and receive the pure sign.
My fathers beheld the Life and my teacher the Place of Light.
The 'uthras of light are victorious,
And victorious Abathur and the sons of Perfection
Who stand, praising the Life.
Enlargement [1]) of life there shall be for the believing
Who have departed out of our midst;
The believers, the poor, the lowly and priests.
And my lord Manda-ḏ-Hiia will lend them his helping hand.
Thankfully received are the good gifts [2]) (ṭabuta) of life,
The good gifts of life and of knowledge of life,
The pihla [3]) that . . . . . at the name of the Life.
For any man who giveth an oblation,
His oblation will be his helper: elect and perfect men
Who bestow oblations will rise by Kušṭa's path.
To them [4]) it shall be given.
Of the Ether-wreath they twisted them a wreath
Of speech and hearing, of joy, purity, goodness and greatness.
A wreath from the Vine Ruaz He will set on the heads
Of those souls called on, signed, and raised up by this masiqta;
(And the souls of) our fathers, our teachers, our brothers and our sisters, of those who have departed the body and those who are yet in the body:
(A wreath like that) set on Its head by the Great (Life)
And by the Great (Life) given to 'uthras
And given by 'uthras to their priests.
Healer, whose medicine is water, come!
Be thou a healer to thy devotees,
To thy devotees be thou a healer

[1]) The meaning here is renewal of life, a larger form of life.

[2]) Ṭabuta here refers to the ritual food placed on the ṭariania (sacred tables).

[3]) I am still of the opinion that pihla here refers to the phallus which, on the table of oblation is modelled in dough and represents the male principle of creation. The meaning of the verb depends on that of pihla.

[4]) With Lidzbarski (M.L. p. 107, n. 3), I read "them" rather than the written "you".

And to him that giveth oblation be thou a helper:
On him whom thou hast healed, do thou,
My lord, bestow soundness.
Behold him who standeth before thee and condemn him not.
My Lord, High King of Light, Revealer
Whose eyes are uncovered, seeking justice
And enacting justice for those who love it,
Do justice on those who persecute us,
Those persecutors who pursue us,
And on the wicked and furious ones
Who scheme to work evil upon us.
If it please Thee, High King of Light,
Look on us and condemn us not!
Behold these souls who believed in Thee
And for Thy name's sake stood by on earth
And were persecuted. Show us pure ether-air
So that we may forget earthly persecution,
That we may forget the persecution of earth
And the vexation of the wicked and liars.
Strengthen our insight, our voice, our vigilance and our praise!
Thereby the Great Life communed with thee
And set thee up completely(?) [1]) with His radiance
And His light, Manda-ḏ-Hiia!
And may the vivifying-power [2]) of Life rest upon us.
My elect, ye shall say "Blessed be the Voice of Life
And praised be the great Beam which is all light!"
And Life be praised!

[This is the "Blessed and praised be the Life" of Shem son of Noah. Afterwards, read here "Blessed and praised be Life" of the souls, and then recite "Good is the Good for the good".]

72

Good is the Good [3]) for the good, and His nature [4]) is set upon those who love His name. We will seek and find, speak and be heard. We have sought and found, have spoken and been heard in thy presence, my lord, Manda-ḏ-Hiia, Lord of all healings.

---

[1]) The sentence is obscure, but is addressed to Manda-ḏ-Hiia?

[2]) Again ruaha ḏ-hiia is paraphrased.

[3]) This is the chief sacramental formula and during its recitation, priests crouch near the ground. The exact meaning is doubtful. Ṭaba, the second word, probably means "the Good One" (warranted by similar use of ṭaba in No. 159 and elsewhere). ṬAB has also the meaning of "to be good, wholesome, well". The formula is an ancient one, and its place in the liturgy corresponds roughly to the Christian liturgical formula "The holy (agia) to the holy".

[4]) Kiniana, a word of wide meaning; "a name" (tribal or generic name), "nature", "characteristic", "qualify", etc.

Forgive him [1] his sins, trespasses, follies, stumblings and mistakes and (those of) him who furnished this bread, masiqta and (ritual) food [2]. My lord, Manda-ḏ-Hiia and (Thou) Great First Life, forgive the sins trespasses, follies, stumblings and mistakes of the donor(s) of fee and oblation, and their wives, children, their priests and those who placed (brought) this bread and food; (likewise) you, my parents, teachers, instructors and preceptors when ye support from the Left to the Right. [3] And ye shall say "Life be established in Its Dwellings and Life be praised; Life is victorious over all works.

[Recite this "Good is the Good for the good" when thou readest a masiqta. When thou performest a baptism recite it, when thou distributest oil recite it, when thou recitest the Rahmia ("Devotions" [4]) recite it, and after the Rahmia. And recite it when thou partakest of the (ritual) dish. [5])

And Life is victorious.]

In the name of the Life!
A sealed letter which leaveth the world —
A letter written in good-faith (kušṭa)
And sealed with the seal of the Mighty (Life) —
Righteous men wrote it, believing men tied it on [6],
And suspended it about the soul's neck
And despatched it to the Gate of Life.
The soul, in her wisdom,
Pressed her nail on the letter,
Her nail she pressed on the letter;
She imbued it with her mystic radiance,
Wrapped it and veiled it in her light.
How came it that Daium saw
That the soul bore a letter?

[1] The person for whose benefit the masiqta is celebrated.

[2] Ṭabuta "goodness" in ritual refers to the sacramental food, the bread and the fruit. Lahma (lit. "bread") can refer to any nourishing food.

[3] I.e. from evil to good. The left is associated with evil, matter, materialism, darkness and "the Mother"; the right with spirituality, light and good.

[4] Prayers recited at the three daily prayer-times.

[5] Patura = any table, tray, large dish or food-mat on which the sacred food is spread out. The clause is missing in D.C.3

[6] See J. זרז 3, "to tie around".

How was it that Daium 1) saw it
As her seven sons gathered about her
And said "Who hath written the letter
Whose secret no man knoweth?
Who wrote the letter that is sealed in
By these protective 2) strands?"
The letter is written in good faith,
And sealed with the seal of the Mighty(Life).
Righteous (men) wrote it, believing men tied it on
And hung it about the neck of the soul
And despatched it to the Gate of Life.
The soul flieth and goeth until she hath reached
The watch-house of the Seven.
The Chief-of-Dues, when he saw her,
(And) the Governor 3), when they saw her, Murmur discontent 4) and say
"Who hath written the letter
Whose secret no man knoweth?
Who wrote letter that is sealed
By these protective marks?"
"The letter is written in good faith
And sealed with the seal of the Mighty (Life).
Righteous (men) wrote it;
Believing men tied it up
And hung it about the neck of the soul
And despatched it to the Gate of Life".
The soul flieth and travelleth on Until she reacheth spirits of Purgatory 5).

1) A name given to Ruha.

2) Miṣra has a double meaning here, and in my translation I have tried to convey both. In general miṣra is a line traced about a sacred or untouchable thing or area. It isolates that which it contains from contact. In ritual, it refers to the furrow drawn about a purified area, which is purified by water, in much the same way as the Parsi priest pours water into the protective gutter (p̣avi) round a sacred area. The ceremony of "the Letter" is protected by such water-containing furrows. Miṣra (Aramaic מְעָרִי could also mean a rope, "a twisted cord".

3) Šahardal = שאהארדאל, middle Parthian for Middle Persian šahriyar, "ruler", "governor".

4) DMDM = "to mutter angrily".

5) The maṭaraiia, officers of the watch-houses, or places where travellers are detained at frontiers, are, as the Diwan Abatur shows, demons, spirits who torment and purge souls after death.

The spirits of Purgatory abased their heads
And the soul passed the purgatory-spirits by.
The soul flieth and goeth
Until she came to the waters of death.
As she reached the waters of death
There came forth towards her
A great Beam [1] of radiance (and) of life, (who)
Grasped her by the palm of her right hand
And brought her over the waters of death [2].
The soul flieth and goeth
Until she reacheth the House of Life.
When she reached the House of Life
She uttered a cry to the House of Life,
And when He heard her call, the Life
Sent a messenger towards her,
(Who) grasped her by the palm of her hand,
Conducted her, (came) to support her
In the likeness of the Life to the place
Of radiance, light and beams of effulgence [3];
To unite her to (the company of) 'uthras
And to set her up amongst beams of light [4].
Upon her head they placed a wreath of ether
And took her out of the world in splendour.
Life supported life: Life found Its own:
It hath found Its own, and my soul hath found
That for which she hoped.
And Life is victorious.

[Up to here recite over the flask of oil as it is put into clay up to the mouth of the bottle. And the clay must be pure and from the jordan.]

74

Bound (secured) and sealed are the spirit and soul of N. by the seal of Kušṭa and the great safeguard ot truth by the word of Kušṭa and the raising (power) of Yukabar-Ziwa.

And Life is victorious.

[1] See p. 45, n. 6.
[2] See p. 46 n. 2.
[3] Read abrḫ as in D.C. 3 and M.L. p. 113:8.
[4] Pasimka = a beam or ray of light.

[This is the conclusion of the "Letter". Set (press) thy seal-ring and the nail of thy little finger of thy right hand into the clay, seal it and read this conclusion over it. And Life is victorious].

[Shouldest thou wish to administer oil (to a dying person), at the beginning and end order the chief (relative) or remaining (persons: i.e. of the family?) to throw water over the dying person[1]). If he is a Mandaean (layman) they shall purify [2]) the hand of the dying person and pour oil on it and sign it with three signings. And he shall join with him [3]) and shall place his hand on his mouth and then put the dying person's hand on his mouth. If immediate death is near(?) [4]) at the place where they apply the oil they shall cleanse with water and purify him and bring to him proxies (those like him)[5])]

In the name of the Great Life!

Health and victory be mine, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš.

When thou wishest to administer unction to anyone leaving the body (dying), say "In the name of the Great Life, union and renewal of life and forgiving of sins be there for this soul of N. son of N. of this "Letter and masiqta". And bring a clean new bottle never before used, press out pure oil and place in it. When enough, twine a wreath of myrtle about the bottle. And set it before thee and recite for thy crown "In the name of that First Being" and set thy crown on thy head. And recite beside thy crown "Life created Yawar-Ziwa", "Let there be light", and "Manda created me" for thy crown. And recite "Strengthened and enhanced is the great mystery of radiance, light and glory" and bind thy pandama over thy mouth.

And take the phial into thy hand and recite "Water of Life art thou" over the bottle. And recite "Hail to the First Life" for the incense and cast incense on the fire and recite "We have acknowledged", "Praises", "To Thee" and "Raising my eyes"; and the bottle shall be in thy hand. And recite "I sought to raise eyes " and at the place where it says "wilt wipe away and remove from N. his sins, trespasses, follies, stumblings and mistakes and cast them into the hells of earth and into the nethermost Abaddons of darkness and wilt raise him up as guiltless and not as guilty and as virtuous and not as vicious before thee, Manda-ḏ-Hiia. With thy radiance thou wilt clothe him and with thy light thou wilt cover him, and wilt set thy living wreath on his head, (the head of) this the soul of N." And take care that thou readest to the end with attention!

[1]) Lit. "the departing" (i.e. soul).

[2]) MŠA with 'da = "to purify the hand (either by water or other cleansing substance or fluid).

[3]) This should mean the act of partaking of the sacraments, but I am in doubt.

[4]) 'u hawia 'ka lmifaq "If there is need for dying (to die) meaning that death appears to be near.

[5]) Should death take place before the rite is over, deputies qualified by age, status and astrological conditions act as proxies.

And recite the eight prayers for the pihta over the bottle and the two prayers for the mambuha over the bottle and recite over the myrtle wreath "The Light became light", "Enlightened and enlightening" and place the bottle on his head. Recite "Manda-ḏ-Hiia went to the stars: his appearance loosed" over the bottle and take with thy forefinger some oil from the mouth of the bottle and recite "(In the name of the) Strange (Sublime) Life, this, the glory and light of Life" and at the place where it saith "to send forth spirit and soul" say "of N". and where it saith "And Ṣauriel the Releaser cometh, who releaseth spirit and soul" say "of N." and at "everything that is therewith" sign the mouth of the bottle; and at "the house of Abathur" sign the mouth of the bottle. And where it saith "the spirit of N. went and became like the soul and was raised up into the House of Life and Life is victorious" sign the mouth of the bottle. And recite "Truly did my baptiser baptise me", "I am baptised in the name of the Life", and "Whose son am I? Of the guarded Mana", cover the bottle with the clay and take thy seal-ring with three of thy fingers - thy thumb and the finger next thy thumb and the little finger - and recite "The sealed letter which leaveth the world" and at the place where it saith "a letter written in good faith and sealed with the seal of the Mighty (Life)", seal with thy ring and the nail of thy little finger. And until the end let thy seal and the nail of thy little finger rest in the clay. And recite "Bound and sealed are the spirit and soul of N. with the seal of Kušṭa and the great safeguard of strength in the word of Kušṭa and the raising-up of Yukabar-Ziwa".

And lift thy seal-ring, thy nail and thy little finger from it and set it before thee and recite "Praised be the First Life" and at the place where it says "Lift thine eyes" say "upon N.". And thy pandama must be over thy mouth. And recite "Ye are set up and raised up up in the place where the good are established amongst manas of light" (insert) "the soul of N. is established in that place".

And (recite) "I am crowned with a wreath and lay me down", "With Him, with the Deliverer", "Between the Hidden and the Radiance", "Bliss and peace there will be on the road which Adam attained", "My vigilance and praise", "Go in peace, chosen, pure and guiltless one in whom there is no spot", "The Mana rejoiceth in his treasures", "Well is it for thee, well is it for thee, soul that departest from the world", "Sunday, and Kušṭa and Oblation", "I am provided and provisioned", "He rose and took me up with him", "The day that the soul goeth forth" and "Ye are set up and raised up, my Chosen".

And recite the "Blessed and praised be Life" for the souls and here recite the "Blessed and praised is Life" of Shem son of Noah. And where it saith "To you it shall be given, of the Ether-wreath" say "to N. son of N." (it shall be given).

And recite "Good is the good for the good"; ask mercy for him and remit his sins and his trespasses. And give it to him to whom thou givest it and grasp in kušṭa the hand of him who holdeth (the hand) of the dying person and say to him "This kušṭa which I entrust [1]) to thee, do thou convey it to Abathur" [2]).

If it is urgent to carry him away, bestir thyself (hurry) when thou recitest "The sealed Letter which leaveth the world" and "Bound and sealed are the spirit and soul of N.". Give him that which thou givest him, and take in kušṭa the hand of him who taketh (the hand of)the dying person and say to him "This kušṭa I speak to thee do thou speak it to Abathur". Thy pandama must be over thy mouth. Then thou shalt recite "The First Life be praised", "Ye are set up and raised up." and (so on) till the "Good is the good for the good", just as I tell thee.

Offer up for him the devotional prayers, hymns and the "raising". (prayers) of the masiqta [3]) from beginning to end. And be careful (to insert) the name of him to whom thou didst administer the oil. Let nothing be lacking and recite with attention and care.

And Life is victorious.

Then, when thou holdest thy pandama over thy mouth, pray for thyself. Make pihta and mambuha for thyself, recite "The Great Life spake and opened Their mouth" and eat thy pihta and drink thy mambuha. And recite "Life is full", and "The Great Life dwelleth" for thyself and recite "Good is the good for the good" and perform the kušṭa-rite for thyself and honour thy crown.

[1]) D.C. 53 has asbarlak here; asfarlak when the words are repeated below.

[2]) The ašganda holds the hand of the dying person, as the priest would be polluted by the touch of death.

[3]) "Of the masiqta" missing in D.C. 53.

And beware, beware and beware lest thou begin any of the "loosing prayers" [1] without thy pandama. (Do it) only after thou hast made petitions for thyself.

And Life is victorious.

This is the Benediction of Oil, which Bihram-Rba, son of Adam, celebrated for his mother Hawa wife of Adam when she departed the body, whilst Hibil-Ziwa sat before them.

This Benediction of Oil was in the Diwan [2] of Ramuia son of 'Qaimat of the town Ṭib, written by Zazai-ḏ-Gawazta son of Hawa. And Bayan-Hibil son of Brik-Yawar wrote it. Here he distributed it, with these books, amongst a hundred Naṣoraeans, from his own Diwan which he had copied from Ramuia son of 'Qaimat's Diwan that was found in the possession of Haiuna daughter of Yahia and Bainai son of Zakia.

And Bayan-Hibil son of Brik-Yawar said "Just as it was written, I wrote it and all the mysteries of the Oil were therein. As far as Jerusalem, the city of the Jews, their mysteries (sacramental ceremonies) are like these.

And Life is victorious.

Exhort those who administer the oil to be careful. If he (the apparently dying person) doth not depart the body, let them bring him to thee. Recite "In great radiance am I immersed", break open the seal, bear it away (?) and throw it into the jordan.

And when thou administerest oil, beware lest thou make a mistake. If thou hast committed an error, it will need a "masiqta of the sixty" [3] for him on whom the oil falleth and it will be well. If impossible to carry him [4] read a "sixty" masiqta for him with seven food-trays [5], and at "that which is with her" [6] sign him and at "the House of Abathur" sign him.

[1] Prayers of deconsecration.

[2] A diwan is a scroll, a miscellany comprising several texts.

[3] I.e. a masiqta at which 60 faṭiria are made and signed.

[4] Midirḫ; or "to reach him".

[5] The word arabata-variously spelt as arawata, (aruhata in D.C.3) — must be, I think, the rahbata or rahuata of the ritual mss. It seems to mean "spreadings". In actual modern ritual it is either a very large ṭariana, or a tray, or an area of purified and smoothened mud upon which food-offerings are laid out for a zidqa brika. (Blessed Oblation). It occurs only in the plural. Priests translate the word simply as "food-offerings", "sacred foods" but can never be relied upon for exact meanings. רָחַב, רְוַח, רְוח = to be wide.

[6] Prayer 49 ma ḏ-bḫ.

(If) the soul (be that of) a good, pious person, one who hath people who will do good after him, bring priests and celebrate sixty masiqtas for him in full with everything. In the upraising of the sixty" sign him[1]) alone at (the words) ma ḏ-bh̠; at the words bit Abatur sign him alone. And in the last upraising sign him alone at bit Abatur and (then) sign the souls of our fathers.

For a masiqta thou requirest meat, water of prayer, [2]) incense, pihta, hamra, wreath and oil. And in (on) the seven trays: - place there all that thou wishest in the trays together with those mysteries (named above).

And when (there is) a masiqta, read the homilies about the soul[3]); let them be many, and be compassionate. It is good (beneficial) for a soul on whom oil falleth. Recite over him and over the seven rahbata[4]) and (pray for) Mandaeans, Naṣoraeans and the faithful. And pray the masiqta prayers "We have acknowledged", "Praises", "Thee", "Lifting eyes", "I sought to raise eyes" and all the appointed prayers for the pihta and mambuha, the "bindings and loosings"[5]) of the masiqta from beginning to end.

Be careful; make enquiry, display kindness, show compassion (during?) the homilies, and loose him from his sins.

And Life is victorious.

Then Hibil-Ziwa taught and said "Great disgrace will fall on any Naṣoraean who (whilst) reading the masiqta openeth his pandama or adulterates the water of prayer. He will not behold his Creator and will be smitten with that blow which was administered to the First Eldest One because he sinned and blundered before his Parents. And I, Hibil-Ziwa, will not reckon him amongst my own, nor count him as one of my own".

And Hibil-Ziwa said "Any Naṣoraean who holds (to?) the pandama and doth not adulterate the water of prayer, as long as he remaineth in the body shall have increase[6]), speech and a hearing because he hath neither removed nor changed aught of that which his fathers commanded him, nor hath he performed the acts of Yušamin [1]) or rendered a portion to the Well Sumqaq [2]), nor did he stand in the heat of the Well Sumqaq".

[1]) "Him" here means the pihta representing the person for whose benefit the masiqta is celebrated. The other loaves represent other souls.

[2]) See p. 36 n. 2.

[3]) It is customary to read to mourners from the left side of the Ginza Rba, which consists largely of hymns and homilies about the after-life of the soul.

[4]) See above, p. 67 n. 5.

[5]) Prayers of consecration and deconsecration.

[6]) The word is misplaced in D.C. 53.

Every man who celebrateth these mysteries must hold (wear) the pandama. When he holdeth his pandama all the creatures of darkness are turned back from his presence, his appearance will shine and all that he hath done will be confirmed by us.

And Life is victorious.]

This is the Book of Gadana which Hibil-Ziwa gave to the chosen elect, which I have copied for myself. I am poor, lowly, child-like and striving, one whom the Seven and Twelve persecute; one of the Root of the First (Life), one insignificant amongst my fellow-priests and ganzibras, earth beneath the feet of Naṣoraeans and dust beneath the feet of the pious [3]).

I, a slave who is all sin, copied this Book of Gadana for myself so that there should be someone to commemorate my name on earth and yonder in the celestial worlds of light. For my heart hath loved the Life and mine eyes wait upon Manda-ḏ-Hiia, who will be to me a support, a deliverer and a rescuer from the sons of Krun [4]) And I testify to the Life and to my lord Manda-ḏ-Hiia with a true and faithful heart.

I am Rabbi Adam-Yuhana son of Bihram son of Sa'dan son of Msa'dan, Kamisia by name, Riš-Draz. I copied it for myself from the book of a righteous and upright woman, a believing (creature) whose mind is pure; in it there is no lechery, lust or harlotry. She consecrated herself to love of Truth (Kušṭa) and copied this Book of Gadana so that there should be for her a commemorator on earth and in the mighty celestial worlds of light, yonder. She was my own paternal grandmother, her baptismal name was Anhar daughter of Šarat. May there be for her enlargement of life! And the name by which she was called [5]) was 'diia, daughter of Adam son of Sa'ad-Juwiri. (She copied it from?) the copy of the great, lofty and respected R. Ram-Yuhana son of R. Yahia-Zihrun son of R. Zihrun son of R. Adam son of R. Yahia-Adam son of R. Šitil son of R. Ram son of R. Zakia son of R. Yahia son of R. Zakia son of a father of ganzibras, R. Mhatam son of R. Sam, known as Manduia, family name 'kuma (Black). He copied it from the book of the great, lofty and respected R. Yahia-Zihrun son of R. Yahia-Bihram son of R. Adam son of R. Yahia-Adam known as Manduia, family name 'kuma. He copied it for a šalmana [1]) — the craftsman Hadaiat son of the craftsman Qasum son of Bihram son of Zakia of the sons of the Dihdaria (tribe), family name Sabur, from the book of R. Zihrun son of Asṭa Faruk, Asṭa Nuruz, his baptismal name being Bihram son of Adam-Yuhana son of Br-Hiia son of Zihrun son of Yahia-Anuš, son of the great lofty and respected R. Mhatam son of Yahia-Baian son of Yuhana-Šadan, of the sons of the Dihdaria, family name Sabur. He copied from the book of Šaha whose baptismal name was Hawa-Mamania daughter of 'Aziz, family name Wašia. He copied it from a book (copied by?)Bihram-Br-Hiia son of Adam-Zakia-Br-Hiia son of Baktiar son of Adam-Bihram, family name Kuhilia, that was copied by the great, lofty and respected master-builder of knowledge and understanding, a noble and distinguished ganzibra, an excellent, accomplished man, devoted to the First Life, son of an orthodox family (root), son of a highly-distinguished family, our teacher, R. Yahia-Bihram son of a father of ganzibras, R. Sam-Bahran son of Yahia son of Zakia son of Yuhana known as Buhaiiar, Zakia by name. May Manda-ḏ-Hiia forgive him his sins for he was kindly and long-suffering, and wrote this book so that there should be commemoration for him on earth and yonder in the worlds of light. And he copied it with the rubrics which had been copied by the great, lofty, respected and reliable ganzibra Zihrun son of Br-Hiia son of Baktiar son of Adam-Bihram, family name Kuhailia—may Manda-ḏ-Hiia forgive him his sins! He copied it for Sam-Yuhana son of Mhatam-Bulbul son of Sam, family name 'Asakir from the book of R. Adam-Baktiar son of Yahia-Zakia-Zihrun son of Yuhana-Šitlan, family name Riš-Draz...

Hurdšaiia [1]) and travelled around a great deal, but found no reliable masiqta equal to this masiqta. When I saw that it was reliable I wrote this masiqta just as it was. And any priest or Mandaean who prays, shall hold to this masiqta.

And now, ye priests who hold to it, be staunch to this masiqta so that there may be forgiveness for your sins, and the Life and Manda-ḏ-Hiia and all the 'uthras sons of light will be your helpers. But we will abandon and not approach any man untrue to it.

And Life is victorious.

So these prayers were arranged from the "Explanation of Prayers of Baptism and the Masiqta" which was copied from the Diwan of Ramuia son of 'Qaimat: their father wrote (it ?), Baian-Hibil son of Brik-Yawar and our master Baian son of Zakia. It was in his library. So that these injunctions were written by Baian son of Brik-Yawar. He distributed these books here amongst a hundred Naṣoraeans from his own library, which he had copied from the Diwan of Ramuia son of 'Qaimat which was housed by Haiuna daughter of Yahia and Baian son of Zakia.

For it was written in the town of Ṭib. And Zakia copied it from the Diwan of Ramuia son of 'Qaimat and Yahia (?) copied from the Diwan of Sam son of Anuš-Yahia, and Sam copied from the Diwan of Bihram son of Brik-Alaha... ? and Anuš copied from the Diwan of 'Qaiam son of Šarat and 'Qaiam copied from Qaiuma son of Brik-Alaha and Qaiuma copied from Šganda son of Yasmin, and Šganda son of Yasmin copied from the Diwan Zazai-ḏ-Gawazta br Hawa and Zazai-ḏ-Gawazta copied from the Diwan of the First Life.

And Ramuia son of 'Qaimat said "From the day on which it fell from (was written by) Zazai-ḏ-Gawazta son of Hawa till now, the years in which I wrote it, is (a space of) 368 years in the ages". And Ramuia son of 'Qaimat said "I wrote this Diwan in the town of Ṭib in the years when Anuš son of Danqa departed with the heads of the people (ethnarchs), in the years when the Arabs advanced".

Then Baian-Hibil son of Brik-Yawar wrote "I purified myself when I got possession of these mysteries. And I myself travelled around and went on foot to Naṣoraeans and took many diwans from place to place. And nowhere did I find "mysteries" as reliable as these Mysteries of Baptism and Masiqta and Oil-of-Unction. I have written them here and have distributed them to a hundred Naṣoraeans in order that they may hold to and be staunch to them.

[1]) Read Bit-Hudšaiia. The Hudšaiia are mentioned in the Asfar Malwašia, (Bit-Hudšaiia p. 52 1.7) and in the ATŠ.

"And now, ye priests! Hold and abide by this end (purpose), like 'uthras of light who stood by these mysteries, all of them, and confirm it in a communion to which Yawar is joined. [1])

"And any man who doth not confirm this end (conclusion) we will avoid and not approach him. He may go in his clothes and roll in his filth! His habitation will be the Sumqaq Well."

Then the writing of Ram-Ziwa-Bihram son of Baian: — "I have looked into the Diwan of 'The Great Wellspring' of Ramuia son of 'Qaimat. Any person who writeth the Book of Gadana and removeth any of the injunctions assigned and written therein, Thou wilt place in clouds of darkness. And anyone who writeth a book of rejection, or removeth any of the injunctions written therein so that they are broken, shall be cursed with a great curse. For this is the curse which the First Life uttered and pronounced, "Anyone who becometh hostile to the Life shall die the second death of an enemy: he will belong to the Darkness; he will fall and for him there will be no uprising".

(But) those who have not removed trust in the Life or (changed) any part of that which they wrote and taught about it, any individual, he and his opinion: and hath delivered them from their sins . . [2]) Moreover, anyone who cuts a copy, or extracts therefrom the name of its owner, shall be cut off (himself and sent) to the watch-houses (purgatories) of the planets. And at the Great Judgement he will stand up, but Abathur will not take his hand in kušṭa [3]).

Life is victorious over all works and victorious is Yawar-Ziwa and his helpers, his people, his priests, and his holding (partisans).

And Life and all Its works are victorious.

In the name of the Great Life!

May there be healing, victory, strength, soundness, speech and a hearing for me, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš, from the Life!

[3]) I.e. grasp his right hand in the solemn act of fealty and friendship.

[4]) The prayer is called by the priests the Audin utušbihan.

We have acknowledged [1] and praises (are due)
To the mighty sublime First Life,
The Ineffable which is over all works.
(I come), bringing (dedicating) my head and my mouth
To the Life and to the implanted Word
And to 'Uṣar-Hiia, the great solace and support of Life
In order to praise, honour, magnify, bless and exalt Thee.
(Yet) who shall praise Thee [2], Life?
And who, Life, shall magnify the greatness of Thy victories?
Thou art lauded, Thou art magnified, thou art glorified
And Thou art exalted!
(For lo) Thou art come, Thou camest and none but Thee came.
At Thy radiancy the riders were afraid [3],
At Thy light gates and kingdoms were troubled.
On seeing Thee the Jordan turned about,
The waves of the sea rolled back
And the islands of the sea were thrown into confusion.
Chariots were overthrown and they fell on their faces.
Cedars of Lebanon were rent, mountains shook and leaped like stags,
They opened and gave praise.
Does in the desert shed their young untimely;
The heights arise and speak in (Thy) honour.
The earth trembled and was shaken.
Jordan! whom didst thou behold that thou didst turn back?
Waves of the sea! wherefore did ye roll back?
Isles of the sea! why were ye thrown into confusion?
Chariots! wherefore did ye overturn and fall on your faces?
Cedars of Lebanon! why were ye rent?
Mountains! wherefore were ye shaken and why did ye leap like stags?
(Why) did ye open and give praise?
Does in the desert! on account of Whom did ye miscarry your young?
Heights! in Whose honour did ye arise and speak?
Earth! Whom didst thou behold and (at what) didst thou tremble? [4]

At the Light which surpasseth all lights,
And at the Good Being who crossed the worlds
And came and cleft the firmament and revealed Himself."
When the Life gazed (down) and looked on the earth
And Its Glory alighted upon the roofs of Its Building, (Lo!) they were sitting on thrones of rebellion.
They got down meekly from their thrones
And fell upon their faces. It eclipsed and took away
The glory of the worlds and generations
And quenched the flames of their lamps.
It set the eyes of the planets in the depths of the earth
And in the lower glooms of Darkness.

Spirit (ruha) lifted up her voice,
She cried aloud and said, "My Father, my Father
Why didst Thou create me? My God, my God,
My Allah, why hast thou set me afar off
And cut me off and left me in the depths of the earth
And in the nether glooms of darkness
So that I have no strength to rise up thither?"

All arose, prayed and praised the majesty of mighty (Life)
And their voices sang to the Glory that is mighty
Praising the Radiance which surpasseth (all) radiance
And the Light which surpasseth (all) lights,
And the Good Being who crossed the worlds,
Came, cleft the firmament and revealed Himself.
He sundered Light from Darkness and sundered Good from Evil,
He sundered Life from Death,
And He brought out those who love His name of Truth
From Darkness to Light and from Evil to Good
And from Death to Life and set them
On roads of Truth and Faith.
And Thou hast spoken to us with Thy Word
And hast commanded us with Thy commandment —
"Be My glory and I will be your Glory.
Be my light and I will be your Light.
And my name shall be in your mouths
And I will be with you".

Thou art He who overthrowest (false) gods in their high-places
And bringest reproach on the divinity of (false) deities.

Great is the splendour in which Manda-ḏ-hiia is arrayed!
Blest is that day of light, praised is that dawn
On which Thou didst travel and come from worlds of light!
(That day) is not reckoned in a count of days.
Nor in a reckoning of months;
Except that day on which Thou wast revealed from worlds of light.
We will reveal to them, that day on which Thou wast revealed,
To all who love Thy name of Truth (kušṭa).

We offer up our commemoration, our petition, our prayer,
Our submission, our ṭabuta 2) and our faith
In Thy presence, (O) 'Uṣar-Hiia, Delight and great Support of Life.
Were we to stand and praise Thee, Thy name,
Thy title and Thy goodness seven times a day, my Lord,
Who could praise Thee, Life,
Or magnify (worthily) the greatness of Thy victories?
Can the stinking body praise Thee? or the vain tongue?
Were our mouth like the sea, our lips like its waves
And our tongue like cleft mountains,
Then might we praise Thee, magnify Thee, honour Thee and bless Thee!
Thou knoweth him who feareth Thee with his heart
And him who confesseth thee with his lips.
With a pure mouth be Thou blessed
And lauded with a tongue of praise.

Praiseth Thee. The ancient, lofty, occult
And watchful One, Abathur, who sitteth according
To his rank, like the Life, praiseth Thee,
The 'uthra Pthahil praiseth Thee and saith to Thee,
"Blessed art Thou, my Lord, Manda-ḏ-Hiia
And praised. And blessed is the Place
From which Thou camest: praised, magnified
And honoured is the great Place from which Thou camest.
And praised, magnified and honoured is the great Place
To which Thou goest."
Elect righteous (men) from lower sanctuaries [1])
Praise thee; for Thy knowledge, Thy wisdom,
Thine understanding and Thy goodness do they praise Thee.

Thou hast come! Thou comest and art ready to reveal Thyself.
Thou art immeasurable, infinite and everlasting.
Thou art the Father, Thou art the Brother, Thou art the Son;
Thou art the Source, Thou art the great Root of Life;
Thou art the First, Thou art the Last,
Thou art the Future, for Thou preparest Thyself to come
And didst depart in order to reveal Thyself.
Put far from us Thy wrath and bring near Thy mercy.
Turn back, push back, remove and make impotent
Angels of wrath, frost and hail from my land
And my house — mine, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš —
In the twinkling of an eye and at a turn of the wheels,
(Let) our petition, our prayer and our submission
Rise up before Thee, Manda-ḏ-Hiia!
That which we have done forgive us,
And that which we do, forgive us,
(For) Thou, (O) Manda-ḏ-Hiia art a forgiver of sins,
Trespasses, follies, stumblings and mistakes.
If Thou, (O) Manda-ḏ-Hiia, didst not forgive our sins,
Our trespasses, follies, stumblings and mistakes,
Who would stand guiltless before Thee, Manda-ḏ-Hiia?
Slaves are we, who are all sin
And Thou the Lord who art all mercy.
Before Thee, all hands are thieving and all lips lying;
In Thine eyes, Manda-ḏ-Hiia (even) Jordan-waters are not cleansing.

[1]) The reference is again to the Mandaean škintas.

The worlds know not Thy name, nor recognise Thy light.
O (fie on) those who sit and eat and drink,
On those who quarrel and persecute!
O (fie on) those who fornicate and are adulterous!
O (fie on) those who worship portico and clay brick!
Day by day they sit on thrones of insolence
And persecute the name of the Life;
(Yet) they knew not the name of the Life,
Nor did the idea of the Life enter their minds.
(But) we have testified to Life and put our trust in Life;
And Manda-ḏ-Hiia stood by us, was of our company
And was our Helper.

The worlds reviled us and persecuted us.
With (to?) the ....? of the world do not Thou abandon us,
Nor with the judgement of the world judge us:
Range us not with the world-guilty,
Nor cut us off from the Life.

We spoke in chants [1]) of the Life
And we revealed mysteries that were veiled;

Life! From the Hidden accept Thy [2]) prayers,
And we will establish delight in Thy light.
Thou art our Radiance, our Brightness, our Strength,
Our Help and our Enlightenment which thou didst reveal to us,

To the first lovers of thy Name, in rays of radiance.
We have confessed Thy truth and will spread Thy light
(Shed) upon us. Thy victories will bring it to pass
And we will be stablished in Thy truth (kušṭak).
The (false) gods in the height will see us
And will be convicted of guilt and put to shame.
Thou wilt clothe us with Thy radiance
And cover us with Thy light;
Thou wilt show us the road
By which Thou camest from the House of Life
And therein we will walk the course

Causing our spirit and souls to dwell in abodes of Life
According to the purpose of the Life
And the will of the three 'uthras [1]),
And according to the will of Manda-ḏ-Hiia
Sublimest of beings, and according to the will
Of the Four Beings, sons of salvation.
In Thy presence there will be restoration
For our spirit and our souls.
Thou wilt clothe us with Thy radiance
And cover us with Thy light
And will stand us before Thee with the innocent

With the richly-endowed and not with the lacking.

Your ears hearken at Your Place [3]).
Praises to that one great name of Life
Which is above all names.
Its name resteth on the great Place of Light,
On the everlasting abode and on the city of 'uthras,
And on the Beam who was greater than all beams,
With Whose light all beams shine
And by Whom all souls are justified;

1) D.C. 53 has umištakilan in the next line. I think that the verb here is ŠKLL ("restoring our souls and "perfecting our souls"), see J שַׁכְלֵל. (M.L. has umištkalin).

2) In M.L. p. 134:9 and D.C. 53 dukran: D.C. 3 has the more probable dukranan ("our mentioning", "our commemoration").

4) Lidzbarski translates šrara "truth" but this translation does not convey its literal meaning of "soundness" "reliability".

5) "It" is the great Family of Life.

They will not satisfy (lit. "complete") you.
If ye take seas for your drinking
They will not make you perfect [1] (content you).
(But) if with perfections [2] ye stand before the Outer Life
And before the Eternal Abode, I will count your number,
And your reckoning shall be reckoned.
Betimes I will come and will fly
And will reach [3] the sons of my Name, the sons of my Sign,
And the sons of the great Family of Life.
I will bind you together into the bundle [4] of Life
And I will build you into a great Building of Truth [5]
And will bring you forth to the great Place of Light
And to the Everlasting Abode.

If there is no hatred, rancour, or dissension amongst you

Ye will not pass over the Bridge [6]
Nor walk in a narrow street;
Ye will not stand before the judge
Nor look on the countenance of the Adversary-at-law;
Nor will ye see an averted face.
The chief customs-officer will not question you.

Ye will go forth: ye will behold the Perfecter of Souls,
One who setteth on paths of surety
His friends that are made perfect,
A great comrade of the faithful,
One of the great band of souls,
Who will come out toward you
And clothe your souls in a garments of radiance

[1] D.C. 53 lagmirilkin. As the reference is to the ritual meal, the reference may be to the sacramental meal of another rite.

[2] The expression tušlimia is often used for perfected souls.

[3] Read 'pra u'mṭia.

[4] I have adopted the Jewish expression here, for laufa conveys the image of binding units into a whole, and the sentence corresponds closely with the ancient Hebrew metaphor.

[5] Or "sound construction", see p. 79, n. 4.

[6] The "bridge" here probably refers to the Zoroastrian "Bridge of Çinvat", "narrower than a hair" over which departed souls must pass. Only the righteous succeed. The hymn was probably written at a time when the state religion was Magian. Tidun from ADA to pass, make a pass.

And in good pure vestments [1] of light
Which he will bring you from the Great Place of Light
And the Everlasting Abode.
He will bring out toward you wreaths,
A wreath of victories.
And every leaf of your wreaths will (weigh)
One thousand and eighty mithqals [2].
Its brilliancy will exceed the brightness of the Sun
And its light outshine the light of the moon.
Ye will receive your vesture and will receive your wreaths
In the presence of the Great (Life).

Ye will be great, and called 'uthras amongst the 'uthras.
Ye will open your eyes and behold your Judge.
Betimes will the dayspring dawn upon you,
In strength ye will arise and behold the Outer Ether
And the great Beam who is all light,
Who was set up before the Great Life:
He whom Life created, prepared and sent forth
To the ages and to the worlds.
And [3] every man who giveth oblation [4];
And took part in the communion [5] from beginning to end.
They will make as perfect as the manas,
Like rays of light he will be made to shine
On the day of deliverance, on the Day of Redemption,
The great Day of Joy; so that his righteous act
Stretcheth onward. It will precede you and will uplift,
Showing you the Outer Ether and the everlasting Abode,
The place which is ancient, (of) Primal Beings,
And sons of the great Family of Life.

They eat of that which is imperishable
And drink that which is not wine, eating well

[1] Ṭarṭabunia. Lidzbarski translates "turbans" (from Latin turritum a head-cover, Arabic طرطور). I incline to think that ṭarṭabuna is not a head-dress, but derived from the root RṬB. (The usual Mandaic word for turban is burzinqa).

[2] Mitqal: = shekel? (about one ounce?).

[3] D.C. 53 and D.C. 3 ulkulman (M.L. kul man. p. 137: 7f).

[4] Those who bring offerings for the Blessed Oblation.

[5] The expression is that used for partaking of food and water in the ceremony of Laufa, a commemorative meal for the dead.

And asking solace. And an 'uthra of Life
Cometh and resteth upon them day by day and hour by hour.
Praises (be) to the fame of the righteous
And to the existence of Chosen Elect (men),
And to the Unearthly[1] Being who standeth without,
Whose eyes are open and fixed upon those
Who love his name of Truth (kušṭa) —
Thou art he, Manda-ḏ-Hiia! for thou knowest
About that in which the perfect man is made perfect,
And about the virtuous man, in what his virtue consisteth[2].
And the Lie[3], of what doth it consist.
Not a word issueth from the mouth of a perfect man
But thou knowest it, hast understood and expected it
In the great Place of Light and the Everlasting Abode.
The mountain doth not boast its strength, nor a hero his doughty deeds,[4]
Nor doth a bowman vaunt his bow, nor the physician his drugs,
Nor the righteous and sage man the utterance of his mouth.
Not so: it is an 'uthra of Life which cometh
And resteth upon Thy devotees.
And those who seek from Him shall find, and to those who ask of Him
It will be given. Day by day, hour by hour, behold us
Who stand in Thy name and are upheld by (calling on) Thy name.
We hold to Thy Leader[5] of the great company of Truth
We have held staunch because of Thy victories.
Humiliate us not; cast us not into the hands of tormentors,
Liars, hypocrites and the censorious.
Let not torturers strike us nor condemners damn our souls!
The good will see and will be found ready[6],
(But) The wicked will be discomfited and the children of the world be shamed
Perfected (souls) will see that the Life existeth
And will direct their gaze to the great Place of Light and the everlasting Abode.

Thou, Manda-d-Hiia, callest the caller [1], nourishest the nourisher, buildest the builder,
Exaltest horns [2], enlargest footsteps and settest up a road [3],
And dost knit together in communion.

Thou art He who constructeth, and who takest out from amongst the peoples, nations and tongues every man who is summoned, worthy and invited. To every man whose term of life is over Thou wilt be a Helper, Saviour and Guide to the great Place of Light and to the everlasting Abode. As to one whose term is incomplete [4] and he standeth (liveth) in the body, (able) to open his mouth, lift up his voice, pray his prayers and to offer up his praise, and whose feet can walk to my House [5], thine 'uthra shall come and shall rest upon him, Thy friend.

Diffuse Thy light over all who love Thy name of Truth (kušṭa). Thou hast spoken with Thy Word and hast commanded us with Thy commandment, "Over your words My Word hath precedence: and at the raising of your right hands (towards Me?) My right hand will be lifted [6] towards you. Ye will call, and I will answer you quickly. Ye will seek My hand and I will not withhold it (from) your hands".

We will pray with Thee the 'uthras' prayer and ask of Thee, of the Great (Life),[7] a petition for ourselves, for our friends, for our friends' friends and for those who love the great Family of Life, for the whole Naṣiruta [8] of Life, fulfilled and disseminated on earth. Thou wilt bring us some of Thy radiance, thou wilt lend us some of Thy light. We will enter into Thy radiance will go forth in Thy light, will rise in Thy name and be kept right by Thy nature [9]. Truth is Thy name, Knowledge of Life is Thy name, precious is Thy name, magnified is Thy name, victorious is Thy name, victorious are the words of truth which issue from Thy mouth, and victorious are all Thy deeds 1).

In the name of the Life!
Thee (O) life, (is it meet) to praise, to honour,
To magnify and to bless;
First Life, Second Life and Third Life,
Yufin-Yufafin 2) and Sam-Mana-Smira 3)
And the Vine which is All-Life
And the great Tree which is all healings.
(Meet is it) to praise, honour and magnify
And to bless 'Uṣar-Hai 4) and Pta-Hai 5)
Who open (reveal) the pihta of Life 6)
And transplant a planting of Light,
And instal the First Counterpart
In the House of Life.
(Meet is it) to praise, honour, magnify and bless Nbaṭ 7)
The First great Bursting-Forth (Emanation),
The exigence of Life 8) in Its nature.
(Meet is it) to praise, honour, magnify and bless
The Lord of Great Fruition. the great and high Being
Who was fruitful, begetteth and produceth

1) Kušṭa is more than "truth". As antithesis to "lie": it is "sincerity", "good-faith", "rectitude", "fidelity".

2) Cf Yafefiyah "divine beauty" Targ.Y. Deut. xixv, 6. The verb יפה is not Mandaic, so that this is probably a name of foreign origin.

3) Lidzbarski always translates Sam Mana Smira as "Sam der wohlverwahrte Māna".

4) Either "Treasure-of-Life" or "Treasury of Life".

5) Literally "He (or "they") opened Life", i.e. "revealed or began life".

6) Or pihta ḏ-hiia = "Bread of Life".

7) The high-flown mystical language of this hymn is only comprehensible when the basic idea of creation as propounded in the inner teaching of the priesthood is brought to bear on its literal interpretation. Nbaṭ, "It or They burst forth" is the literal meaning, refers to the self-manifestation of a creative force after a period of quiescence. This "urge of life", this irrepressible impulse to express itself in worlds of spirit and matter, appears in the metaphor of springs of water, the bursting forth into leaf, flower and fruit of the vegetable world, the birth of creatures and so on.

8) Ṣurik hiia "need (or necessity) of life," could be almost rendered by the French "élan vital".

Great fruit for Himself.
(Meet is it) to praise, honour, magnify and bless
Yukabar-Ziwa, who increased in his brilliancy
And was great in his light.
(Meet is it) to praise, honour, magnify and bless
Yuzaṭaq-Manda-ḏ-Hiia, the life which proceeded from Life,
The truth (kušṭa) that was aforetime, in the Beginning;
Who was mightier in His radiance than the worlds of light.
(Meet is it) to praise, honour, magnify and bless
Haš, [1] the Stem of splendour, [2] radiance, light and honour
Whose branches are a thousand thousand and its tendrils
A myriad myriad. Well is it for him
Who hath looked on that Tree!
Bihram [3], who saw it, lived, shone, was cured and established
And his name hath not died.
(Meet is it) to praise, honour, magnify and bless
Ṣanaṣiel [4], who standeth at the Gate of Life
And prayeth for spirits and souls.
He interpreteth silence, inspireth hope
And taketh in keeping in the World of Light
The prayers of pious and believing people.
(Meet is it) to praise, honour, magnify and bless
Haiašum-Kušṭa [5], messenger of Life,
The Word of the first chosen elect (men).
He crossed the worlds, came, pierced the firmament
And revealed himself.
(Meet is it) to praise, honour, magnify and bless
Ƀhaq-Ziwa [6], who is called "He acted and succeeded in his škinta."
(Meet is it) to praise, honour, magnify and bless
Yukašar [7], source of radiance

[1] Haš = "He pondered".

[2] Hadra in D.C. 3 and D.C. 53, M.L. 142:3 has hidra.

[3] The Bihram Rba in whose name all baptisms take place? This line hints at a human being.

[4] Possibly from נָצַץ "to blossom"?

[5] "May-the-name-of-Kušṭa-live".

[6] The root BHQ means "to glisten, to be white".

[7] It seems likely that the words of the preceding clause attached to Bhaq-Ziwa, were originally part of those attached to Yukašar, whose name seems to mean "the spirit of success".

Who bestoweth radiance and displayeth his light.
(Meet is it) to praise, honour, magnify and bless
Biriawiš, the strong source (kana) [1],
The Kana took thought so that its radiance increased.
(Meet is it) to praise, honour, magnify and bless
Ayar [2], the pure Vine which abideth
In the great and lofty Treasure-house [3] of Light.
(Meet it is) to praise, honour, magnify and bless
The pure Yušamin [4] who resteth upon
The treasures of the waters
And upon mighty wellsprings of light.
(Meet is it) to praise, honour, magnify and bless
The 'uthra Tauriel [5], the being who resteth by
The pastures [6] of the water.
When a fragment from the little finger of his right hand
Fell (off?) There was consternation on earth,
And vexation(?) [7] in the world of falsehood.
(Meet is it) to praise, honour, magnify and bless
Adatan and Yadatan [8], who stand at the Gate of Life
And praise and extol Life,
And pray for the spirits and souls
Of righteous and believing people
In the Place of Life.
(Meet is it) to praise, honour, magnify and bless
Šilmai and Nidbai [9], two 'uthras
Delegates of Manda-ḏ-Hiia

[1] See p. 47, n.4. The Kana of the next line probably means the Divine Source of all Water of Life in gnostic symbolism. Biriawiš = Piriawis, the heavenly jordan, see p. 12 penult.

[2] Ayar, "ether", "pure air" is personified in Mandaean texts. He seems to correspond with the "most thin air" of the Essenes (Josephus, vol.iv, p. 155) and the Iranian Vayah (Ether).

[3] See p. 95, n. 5.

[4] Yušamin: see p. 7 and p. 13, n. 6.

[5] Tauriel is often invoked in phylacteries. An obvious cattle-spirit, he calls into mind the Mithra myth, in which the bull's blood released the forces of fertility and life. The verse is obscure. To lose a little finger is one of the causes of disqualification to priesthood.

[6] (See n. 5.) (Syr. ܦܥܡܐ).

[7] Or consuming (rage)?

[8] Adatan and Yadatan, often mentioned as a pair: no function is assigned them, except here.

[9] Šilmai and Nidbai are the guardian spirits of the jordan.

Who are active and do (the work of) the Life.
With kušṭa and with the testimony of the Life
They immerse living, shining, bright and well-doing [1] souls
Who go in sincerity to the Jordan (and are baptised)
(But) not in the name of gods [2] or of a messiah!
(It is meet) to praise, honour, magnify and bless
Šum-Hai, Rhum-Hai, 'In-Hai and Zamar-Hai [3],
Four Beings, sons of perfection,
Who come towards sincere and believing people,
And take them out of bonds
(Tied by) the hands of the wicked
And from beneath the claws of scheming men;
And lift them up to the great place of Light
And to the Everlasting Abode.
They knit them into the Bundle of Life
And build them into a great Building
Of sure strength [4].
(It is meet) to praise, honour, magnify and bless
Hibil, Šitil and Anuš [5],
Sons of a Stock which is living, light-giving,
Vigorous and sturdy:
Beings that cannot be taken by the sword
Nor consumed by flames of fire;
Nor swept away by floods of water;
Nor will the thongs of their sandals
Be dipped in the water.
They were judged and were justified;
They sought and they found;
They strove and reached the Great Place of Light
And the Everlasting Abode.
(It is meet) to praise, honour, magnify and bless
Ṣihiun, and Pardun, and Kanfun [6],
'Uthras whose names, each one, are in the House of Life [7];

---

[1] Vigorous, flourishing, full of vitality.
[2] Lit. in the name of Allah-cult, Allahdom, i.e. heathen
[3] Four beings mentioned in Prayer 17.
[4] Šrara; see p. 80, n. 5 and p. 79, n. 4.
[5] The three sons of Adam Kasca.
[6] The names do not occur elsewhere as a trio.
[7] D.C. 3 has ḏ-had had hawia šumaihun bit hiia adam kasia bihram uram utria ḏ-had šumaihun bit (hiia) utrin trin kinianun. The sentence is obscure.

And the 'uthras Adam-Kasia [1]), Bihram and Ram whose names are
Each one in the House of life, (but) their nature is two two, (dualistic ?)
And the names of righteous and believing people
Will be established in the Place of Light.
Thy name giveth out light, Thy name is illustrious,
Thy name is pleasing and Thy name raiseth up.
Thy name is victorious and victorious are the words of truth
Which issue from Thy mouth, (victorious) over all works.
Make victorious and raise up this my soul,
(The soul of) Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš!
And Life is victorious over all works.

I copied these three prayers "We have acknowledged", "Praises", and "Thee (Life)" for myself so that there may be commemoration for me on earth and yonder in the mighty and lofty worlds of light. For my heart hath testified to the First Life and I endure the persecution of the world from sons of the planets. For one name - Yawar - do I strive with a pious and believing heart for the love of precious Truth.

My waiteth on the Life and mine eyes upon Manda-ḏ-Hiia; for they will be my support, my deliverer and saviour from the Place of Darkness to the Place of Light.

I copied for myself, poor and lowly a slave who is all sin, dust on the feet of Naṣuraeans ...etc.

(The rest of the colophon, which resembles the former colophon, is omitted).

THE RESPONSES. ('niania)

78

In the name of the Great Life!
May my thought, my knowledge and my understanding
Enlighten me, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš,
By means of these responses [2]) and homilies for baptism and the masiqta.

[1]) Adam Kasia, the occult Adam, has the occult Eve (Hawa Kasia) as spouse, Ram's spouse is Rud, but Bihram's spouse is unnamed .

[2]) 'niania means "answers", "responses", hence these hymns were probably chanted antiphonally, although this is not the case now. Henceforward I shall translate 'niana "hymn". Drašia = "homilies" or "canticles".

79

In the name of the Great Life!
When the myrtle [1], the myrtle, flourished
In the gardens of Hibil;
When the wild marjoram grew in the precincts of the manda [2],
They gave me two twigs of myrtle
From which they twisted a wreath for the jordan.
For it is wondrous and fragrant is its perfume!

[Recite this hymn and twist a wreath of myrtle for thy staff, then read the jordan-hymn "Hear me my father, hear me".]

80

In the name of the Great Life!
Hear me, my Father, hear me! Draw me upward
(O) Great One, son of the mighty (Life),
Our Father, son of the Life!
Šilmai and Nidbai, lords of the jordan, hear me!
Jordan, and both its banks, hear me!
Hear me, Hibil-Ziwa, whose strength
Resteth upon his brethren, the 'uthras!
Hear me, Yawar-Ziwa, (thou)
Whose creations rest on (depend upon?) the jordan!
Hear me, Mana-Rba-Kabira [3])
And raise that which ye have planted!
Hear me, hear me, Habšaba [4]) and Kana-ḏ-Zidqa [5]), Hear me, hear me, Abathur-Rama [6]), whose strength
Presideth over the Scales!
Hear me, great Bihram! and raise me up
Yuzaṭaq-Manda-ḏ-Hiia!
Hear me, (ye) Seven Mysteries which reside

---

[1]) The word also means "healed".

[2]) In the sacred enclosure of the manda (mod. mandi) myrtle must be grown. Formerly, perhaps, marjoram was grown also, but it is no longer intertwined in the myrtle-wreath.

[3]) The great mighty Mana.

[4]) The first day of the week, personified, Sunday.

[5]) The collection of food-offerings and offerings in kind brought for the Zidqa brika, Blessed Oblation.

[6]) The spirit which sits on the frontier of the worlds of light with his scales, weighing their deeds.

In the Great Wellspring
Hear me, (ye) three wellsprings which give out
Radiance, light and effulgence!
Hear me (ye) three manas
Who rest upon the jordan with your treasure!
Hear me, Anuš-'Uthra [1]),
Whose strength dwelleth upon me!

81

In the name of the Great Life!
Hear me, my Father, hear me!
And draw me upward, great Son of the mighty (Life);
Our Father, Son of the Life!
Šilmai and Nidbai, lords of the jordan, hear me!
Jordan and its two banks, hear me!
Habšaba and Kana-ḏ-Zidqa hear me!
Hear me, Great Life, from the height,
Hear me!

82 [2])

In the name of the Great Life!
At the Fountain-head came I forth,
At the Source of springs of life went I hence.
Three *škinta*s (sanctuaries) did I found
And set over them guardians as rulers.
The guardians I appointed to rule over them
Are sublime, blessed and trusty
To the uttermost.

[Repeat this hymn when thou art baptising and takest up the mambuha [3]) into the phial from the jordan, and recite the prayer "At the Fountain-head of Water came I forth" and then recite "Blessed art thou, Outer Door".]

83

In the name of the Great Life!
How lovely are plants which the jordan hath planted

[1]) Anuš-'Uthra is a spirit active in helping the Naṣoraeans. See G.R., many passages.

[2]) Quoted G.R. p. 145.

[3]) The sacramental water or sacramental drink.

And raised up! Pure fruit have they borne
And on their heads they set living wreaths.
Yawar-Ziwa rejoiceth in the good plants
Which the jordan planted and raised.
The Plants rejoice and flourish
In the perfume of Manda-ḏ-Hiia
Which breatheth [1] upon them.

84

Truly did my baptiser baptise me,
Well did my baptiser baptise me,
Truly did my baptiser baptise me
And your baptism shall attain its end.

85

Šilmai hath baptised us with his baptism,
Nidbai hath signed us with his pure sign,
The great Anuš-'uthra hath placed living [2] wreaths on our heads.

The jordan in which we have been immersed
Shall be our witness that we have turned not away
From our sign, nor have altered our [3] pure Word.

87

I rejoice in my priests
And in Naṣoraeans who hearken to my converse.
I rejoice in you, my priests,
For ye have not changed my pure Word.

88

In the name of the great Life!
May the sublime Light be magnified!
Rightly do I say to you, my Chosen,

---

[1] Lit. "which resteth on them".
[2] I.e. fresh, or freshly cut, myrtle.
[3] D.C. 53 mimran, D.C. 3 mimrai. See M.L. 151; n.1.

Who went up with me to the jordan,
Pervert and change me not, alter me not by hand,
Pervert not nor alienate me,
Men who have heard the Voice of Life!
He who heareth the voice of Life
Will be edified, will be built up,
Built up and armed. (Such a man's) strength will be doubled.
Moreover, those who listen to the speech of the Life
Will be greatly increased,
Will be enriched and will not lack.
Into the communion that is great will he be knit,
He will enter the communion that is great
So that he will be united (therewith) and will arise
And will behold the Place of Light.
And Life is renowned and victorious,,
And victorious the man who went hence.

89

In the name of the Great Life
The great Light be magnified!
To you do I call and (you) do I teach,
Men who have received the Sign.
Hearken not to the talk of all peoples and generations;
Let not their stumblings cause you to stumble,
Stumble not because of their stumblings!
Be not interrogated at their tribunals,
At their tribunals be not interrogated!
Certainly have ye held to established truth,
Ye have held to the certainty about which
I instructed you. I call to my chosen ones so that Ye may not turn your thought away from Me.
Because any man who is not steadfast (in thought)
Whose mind is turned against me,
Whose mind is turned from me,
Great and not small will be his hurt [1]).
If ye have attained my strength [2])

---

[1]) Mhita = "blow", "wound".
[2]) Or "my army".

Bear (arms for) me [1]! If ye bear (arms for) me firmly
Stand by me from beginning to end!
But if ye have not attained my strength (or army [2])
Go from me, and approach not!
For he that entereth it and beareth (arms) for me,
His "garment" [3] will be adjusted to the House of Perfection.
But he that weareth it [4] and doth not perfect it
Will die and his spirit will extinguish.
He will die and extinct will be his spirit,
He will become the portion of the world.
Thou hast conquered, Manda-ḏ-Hiia,
Good One, who confirmest Thy friends!
Renowned and victorious is Life
And victorious the man who went hence.

90

In the Name of the Great Life
The sublime Light be glorified!
A disciple [5] am I, a new one;
For I went to the jordan-bank
And took my name on my head
And in my heart I took a Sign.
My Sign is not that of Fire,
Nor is it that wherewith the Anointed One [6] anointed,
My Sign is a jordan of living water,
The strength of which none can attain.
He chose one out of a thousand
And from two thousand he chose two,
Making traders of them

[1] Lidzbarski translated traget mich (carry me), literal but somewhat unsatisfactory. I suggest that the word here was some form akin to the Syriac ܕܪܪ, hence "Fight for me! If ye fight for me firmly, stand by me from first to last".

[2] See above.

[3] Here a play on words: the garment is the mana, the imperishable soul, the "intelligence", "mind. See p. 4 note 1.

[4] Another play on words: another meaning of DRA "to bear, to carry, to take, to wear".

[5] Or "a priest". This is the meaning accepted by the priesthood here.

[6] The Messiah.

Who labour and ply their trade on earth.
And they trade for fee and pious gift,
And shine more than sun and moon.
I came to the congregation of souls,
For the Life sent me, sent me forth.
There were some who bought my wares,
There those who came to their end 1) and lay down 2).
There were those who bought my wares.
The eyes (of such a one) were filled with light,
Filled with light were his eyes
(On) beholding the Great (One) in the House of Perfection,
There were those who did not buy my wares.
They went on, reached their end and lay down.
They were blind and saw not,
Their ears were stopped and they heard not
And their hearts were not awakened
To behold the Great One in the House of Perfection.
As They called them and they answered not,
When they call, who will answer them?
Because it was given to them but they took not,
Who will give to them when they ask?
They hated the Way of Life and its Abode
But loved the abode of the wicked.
And lo! in the abode of the wicked
Will they be held captive.
They tied up their tribute, their money 3)
In a lappet 4) of their clothes.
When they wish to lift their heads (hold their heads high)
They hurl them down 5) to the Gates of Darkness
To my Chosen do I call, to my Plants

1) The word has a double meaning: "to come to one's end" (i.e. "die") and "to be crowned with a wreath" (a death-rite, see MMII p. 179)

2) Or "slept", "died".

3) argbaiun uminunun. Argba uminuna in the G.R. is used for wealth, property". Purple, purple dye or murex (אַרְגְּמָן) appears at one time to have been used for barter, and the Hittite loan-word arkammana for "tribute" suggests that argba uminuna may be a corruption of this or some similar word. Cf. the Assyrian arqaman(n)u and Aramaic אַרְגְּוָן arguan (Delitsch, Ass. Grammar 1889. par. 44). Argamannu was given to temples.

4) A corner of the robe. This, in modern ʿIraqi villages, is often used as a purse, money is tied into it.

5) A play on words.

Who stand [1] by the jordan. I say to them,
"My children (who walk) in my road,
My children (who follow) my road,
Swerve not from it or its boundary!
Let him who deviateth from its boundary
Cling to the boundary-stone.
He who hath turned aside from both
Will fall into the uttermost ends of the world".
Thou hast conquered, Manda-ḏ-Hiia,
Good One, who confirmeth his friends!
Thou wilt forgive us who praise our Lord
Our sins and our trespasses.
Renowned and victorious is Life
And victorious the man who hath gone hence.

[Up to here are the hymns and chants of baptism; and from here to below are the hymns and chants of the masiqta.]

91

My vigilance and praisegiving
Are my ferrymen [2] across (the waters of death);
A transformation brought me over,
A cloud [3] of light took me over.
In purity shalt thou rise to the Place of Light.

92

In the name of the Life!
Go in peace, chosen, pure and guiltless one;
Thou art without spot.
Thou hast proven thyself by (thy sojourn on?) earth
And thy destiny leapt upward from its struggles [4]
From its struggles thy destiny leapt upward.
Above all the world thou hast spoken.
Chosen and pure one (saying),
"I am a seer, a diviner;
A seer am I and a diviner!"

[3] Mandaean priests translate "ship".

[4] Daria; as in hirba udaria umutana ḏ-hazin alma D.C. 22(r) 282 (Pet. (r) 287): "war and battles and the mortality of this world".

The worlds assembled for judgement,
For judgement the worlds assembled
And judgement was pronounced on them,
On them was judgement pronounced,
On those who did not perform the works
Of right-dealing Man.
But thou alone, Chosen and Pure One,
Fair mana, that art burnished bright,
Thou goest not to the judgement hall.
Judgement will not be pronounced over thee,
Over thee judgement will not be pronounced,
Because thou didst perform the works
Of right-dealing mankind.
This 1), that they endure and bear,
Thou (O) Chosen One, wilt not find before thee.
Escape the clutch of the planets
And the forces of this world!
Take, put on thy garment of radiance,
Set on thy living wreath!
Bow thyself! and worship!
Prostrate (thyself) and praise the Great Life.
Praise the Place of Life
To which thy fathers go.
Thou (O) Chosen One,
Wast not from here 2);
From this place thou wast not transplanted 3)
Thy planting, thy place was the Place of Life,
Thy home the Everlasting Abode.
They have set up for thee a throne of rest
In which there is no heat or wrath.
There is kept for thee a girdle
In which there is no trouble or fault 4).
Good one! Rise to the House of Life!
And go to the Everlasting Abode 5)!

---

1) Not hazia as in D.C. 53, but haza as in D.C. 3 and M.L.

2) The earth.

3) Lit. "Not from here was transplanted thy transplantation".

4) asga = trouble, tiresomeness. Cf. D.C. 22 (1) ḏ-asga umuma litbẖ (as above). (G.R.l. 80: 4)

5) The double meaning of taqna must be borne in mind. Here, possibly, a "light' ,meaning.

They will hang thy lamp amongst lamps of light
And they will shine in thy time, and at thy moment.
Arise! Behold the Place of Light!
Renowned is Life and victorious
And victorious the man who went thither.

93

The mana rejoiceth in its treasure
And in the glory of Life
Which resteth on it.
I have acknowledged thee
(O) elect righteous one,
For thou settest my soul free
From transitory things.

94

Hail to thee, hail to thee, soul
That hast departed from the world!
Thou leavest corruption and the stinking [1]) body
In which thou hast been: (thou leavest)
Its abode, the abode of the wicked,
The place which is all sinning,
The world of darkness,
Of hatred, jealousy and dissensions,
The abode in which the planets go about,
Bringing pains and blemishes,
Pains they bring, and blemishes,
Every day causing them tribulation.
Rise up, rise up, soul!
Ascend to thy first homeland.
Rise, rise to thy first homeland,
The place from which thou wast transplanted,
To the place from which thou wast transplanted,
To thy good dwelling, (the dwelling) of 'uthras,
Bestir thyself! don thy garment of glory
And set on thy living wreath. [2])

[1]) Read saria as in other mss.

[2]) Both D.C. 3 and D.C. 53 omit Tib 'l kursiak ḏ-ziwa ḏ-hiia tirṣuiḫ batar nhur (Rise, sit on thy throne of radiance which the Life set up for thee in the Place of Light.) See M.L. p. 160 n.1.

Rise! inhabit the *škinta*s
Amongst the 'uthras, thy brethren.
As thou hast learnt, praise thy first Home;
And curse this place, the house of thy fostering;
For (during) the years that thou didst spend therein
Every day the Seven were thine enemies,
The Seven were thine enemies and the Twelve
Beset thee with persecution.
Renowned is Life and victorious,
And victorious the man who hath gone thither.

95

Her Sunday, her kušṭa and her alms
Bear witness for the soul.
Ye will be her witnesses
And will pass her through at the toll-house.

96

I am provided and provisioned:
'Uthras of light equipped me.
I am provisioned; for Life provided for me.
And I am equipped by 'uthras of light.
They provided me with provision of Truth (kušṭa)
And armed me with all their wisdom.
Wherefore did Pthahil come into existence?
And why did he create the world?
Wherefore was a plan formed
Whereby they brought me from my home?
(Whereby) they sent me to a world of stumblings,
Filled with knots and seals.
It is all full of fire
And sown with thorns and thistles:
It is full of delusion,
All full of deception and lie.
The planets who dwell therein
Conceive plots against me daily
Plotting evil, and declare
"We will divert her thoughts!"
Of my heart that is full of true-dealing
They say, "From us shall come that

Which will make it stumble [1]".
(Of) my eyes that gaze towards the Light
They say "We will make them blink".
(Of) my mouth, which blesseth the Life,
They say "it shall speak untruth";
(Of) my hands, which give alms,
And offer the clasp of good faith [2],
They say "they shall commit murder".
(Of) my knees which bend and worship the Life
They say "they shall bend for the Seven".
(Of) my feet that tread paths of righteousness
And faith, they say, "they shall go on raids [3]" ("deeds of violence").
I lifted mine eyes to heaven
And my soul waited on the House of Life.
And the Life who heard my cry
Sent toward me a Deliverer.
The Deliverer who came to me
Brought me that which was lovely;
He opened out a robe and showed me its radiance
And I cast off the stinking body.
He grasped me with the palm of his right hand
And led me over the waters of death [4].
Over the waters of death he brought me
And led me onward; in the likeness of Life he supported me.
Life supported Life, Life found its own.
Its own Self did Life find
And my soul found that for which it had looked.
Renowned is Life and victorious
And victorious the man who went hence.

97

He rose and took me with him
And did not leave me in the perishable dwelling.

---

[1] Literally "We will cause it to stumble on account of us".
[2] The ritual hand-clasp, also used as a form of oath or promise.
[3] חיפא J. "impetuous attack": ("Barefoot", Lidzbarski's translation, is unlikely, as it is not considered a sin to walk barefoot. bhifia also means "in mourning")
[4] Hafiqia mia see p. 45 n. 6.

The day on which the soul goeth forth,
On the day that the perfected one ascendeth,
On the day that the soul issueth from below
The spheres of death, of contention 1),
Strife was thrown into the earth.
Ruha's slaves sit 2) bewailing
And the Seven sit in consternation.
The robe of the stars is rent
And dust is cast on Ruha's head.
The hell-beasts 3) weep
And the demons of purgatories are panic-stricken.
The Being who brought me hither,
Who brought me that which was beautiful,
Put on me a robe, clothed me in a robe of radiance,
In a wrapping 4) of light he covered me.
He set on (my head) a wreath of ether
And (gave me) of that which Life bestoweth on the 'uthras.
He set me up amongst 'uthras
And stood me up amidst the perfected (souls).
A wreath of ether he set on my head,
And gloriously he brought me forth from the world.
Life supported Life,
Life found its own,
Its own did Life find,
And my soul found that for which it had looked.
Renowned is Life and victorious,
And victorious the man who went thither.

Ye are set up and raised up, my Chosen ones,
By the Word and Certitude 5) that came to you

1) D.C. 53 p. 134 1.5. hišgiš, D.C. 3 kašgš, M.L. p. 164 1.1 ka šgiš. From the P. کشاکش kašākaš (distraction, contention, tumult).

2) Read yatbia.

3) Zangaiia "barkers, roarers, bellers" - a name given to the wolves, lions and dogs who attack souls in the maṭarata (purgatories. See Diwan Abatur).

4) Ṭarṭabuna, see p. 81. n. 1.

5) In both D.C. 3 and D.C. 53 it is ušrara. Lidzbarski translates "word of truth".

The Word and the Certitude that came to the good,
The True Word 1) which came to believers.
My Chosen, ye sought and ye found,
Moreover ye shall seek and ye shall find.
Ye sought and found, my Chosen ones,
As the first (souls?) sought and found.
Thou art victorious, Manda-ḏ-Hiia.
And thou bringest to victory all who love thee.
And Life is victorious.

[Here recite "Blessed and praised is Life, that souls".]

100

In a building which Life buildeth,
Good trees flourish.
Fragrant is the perfume of the trees
With the perfume of Manda-ḏ-Hiia
Which pervadeth them.

[Here recite "Blessed and praised be Life" of Shem son of Noah, and "Good is good for the good".]

101

The Life hath founded a dwelling,
And radiance dawned
In the sublime Ether!
I and my brethren, the 'uthras,
Have set out every good thing 2),
Have set out the allotted portion of the Great (Life):
We have offered it up in purity to the Place of Light.

102

The building that Life buildeth
Will never come to nought.

[Repeat this hymn after thou hast partaken of the communion 3)

1) Read kšiṭa as in D.C. 3 and M.L. p. 165.

2) "I and my brethren" means the celebrant and co-celebrants. The ṭabta refers to the small piles of ritual food ranged round the ṭarianas (tables) of the priests.

3) I.e. have eaten a few mouthfuls of the ritual food.

and then say "Darkness is crushed back into the Dark [1] and Light set up in its place".]

103

Darkness is crushed back into the Dark
And Light is set up in its place.
The Life hath accepted your prayer,
The 'uthras have accepted your praise
The oblation is assigned to its lord,
And bounty to him who giveth it.
This soul of N. and the souls of this masiqta [2] rest at the great Place of Light and the Everlasting Abode.
And Life is victorious.

[Here recite "In great radiance am I immersed" and lift thy hand for the masiqta and pray a prayer for thyself.
And Life is victorious.]

[These hymns and homilies of baptism and the masiqta I copied for myself so that there may be for me commemoration on earth etc. (Cf. other colophons.)]

104 [3] (The Rušma)

My Lord be praised!
May Kušṭa strengthen you! In the name of the great Life may healing and purity be thine!
O my Father, their Father, King Piriawis,
Great Jordan of living water,
In the name of the Great Life
We have cleansed our hands in truth (kušṭa)
And our lips with faith;
We have uttered words of radiance.

---

[1] 'Uma in M.L. p. 166: 10, also in D.C. 53, D.C. 3 and most copies. 'Uma = "darkness", "gloom", "obscurity" (see ܥܡܡ rt.-meaning "to be dark, overclouded, and the Aramaic עמם "to be dark, obscure" and cognates). The formula occurs again in Prayer 391, but, this time, both my mss. have 'ma (mother). The alteration may be deliberate, for in Mandaean mysticism "the Mother" is associated with matter, the gross and the physical.

[2] The soul of the person in whose name the masiqta was celebrated and other souls commemorated.

[3] This prayer, which is not in M.L., is recited daily by every Mandaean, and by every priest before each stage of a rite and every morning, whilst performing the minor ablutions. The water used must be "living" i.e. running, and each action and the verse accompanying it, is repeated thrice.

My mind is absorbed[1] in (thoughts of) Light.
Blessed is Thy name, praised is Thy name
My Lord, Manda-ḏ-Hiia, and blessed and praised
Is that great Countenance (Presence) of Glory
Which emanated from Itself. (Three times.)
I, N. son of N (or daughter of N.),
Am signed with the Sign of Life
And the name of Life and the name of Manda-ḏ-Hiia
Were pronounced on me.
(Three times)
My ears have heard the voice of Life.
(Three times)
My nostrils have breathed the perfume of Life.
(Three times)
My Sign, that is on me, was not in fire,
And not in oil, and not that wherewith the Anointed[2] One anointed.
My Sign is in the great jordan of living water
And the Sign and name of Manda-ḏ-Hiia is mentioned upon me.
Darkness is crushed down, and Light set up
And the name of Manda-ḏ-Hiia is mentioned upon me.
(Three times)
My mouth was filled with prayer and praise.
(Three times)
My knees bless and worship the Great Life.
(Three times)
My feet tread the ways of Truth (Kušṭa) and Faith.
(Three times)
I, N. son of N., am baptised with the baptism
Of the great Bihram, son of the Mighty (Life)
My baptism shall guard me and will succeed.
And the name of Life and the name of Manda-ḏ-Hiia
Are mentioned upon me.
(Three times)

[1] ṢHṬ, according to Lidzbarski is used almost always with fire in the sense of catch fire, and in Prayer 115 (M.L. p. 178, 1. 9) he translates 'ṣhiṭibun" sich entflammten". Above, however, we have 'shiṭabun in what is practically an identical passage. See J. ṢHṬ 2.

[2] The Anointed, i.e. the Messiah.

My feet [1] — and the hands of the Seven and the Twelve
Shall be powerless to rule me.
The name of the Life and the name of Manda-ḏ-Hiia
Are mentioned upon me.

105 [Known as the Asiet Malkia]

Kušṭa heal you!
In the Name of the Great Life!
Healing and victory [2] be thine,
O great Gate of the precious House of Mercies!
Healing and victory be yours;
My honoured First Parents
Healing and victory be yours;
Treasure of the great First honoured Life.
Healing and victory be thine;
King Mara-ḏ-Rabutha-'laita
Healing and victory be thine;
King Yušamin the Pure, son of Niṣibtun
Healing and victory be thine;
King Manda-ḏ-Hiia, son of Niṣibtun,
Healing and victory be thine;
King Hibil-Ziwa
Healing and victory be thine;
King Anuš-'uthra
Healing and victory be thine;
King Šišlam-Rba
Healing and victory be thine;
King 'Shaq-Ziwa-Rba-Qadmaia [3]
Healing and victory be thine;
King Sam-Ziwa, pure, eldest, beloved, great, first Radiance
Healing and victory be yours,
Hibil, Šitil and Anuš,
Healing and victory be yours
Adatan and Yadatan,
Healing and victory be yours

---

[1] Out of place? Or should it be Ligraihun u'daihun ("The feet and hands of the Seven" etc.)?

[2] Or, equally "health and purity" and for nihuilak "shall be thine". Asuta uzakuta is used in fact as a formula of polite greeting, a salutation. As this hymn is recited, the priest bows at every name. The prayer is not in M.L.

[3] The-great first-Radiance-was-bright. (שחק)

Šilmay and Nidvay, (ye) two guardian 'uthras of the jordan,
Healing and victory be yours;
(Ye) twenty-four 'uthras, sons of light,
Healing and victory be yours;
(Ye) four beings, sons of Salutation,
Healing and victory be yours;
Nṣab and Anan-Nṣab [1]),
Healing and victory be yours;
Sar and Sarwan,
Healing and victory be yours;
Zhir and Zahrun and Bhir and Bihrun,
And Tar and Tarwan
Healing and victory be yours;
Yufin (and?) Yufafin,
Healing and victory be yours;
Habšaba and Kana-ḏ-Zidqa,
Healing and victory be yours;
King Barbag-'uthra,
Healing and victory be thine;
King Šingilan-'uthra,
Healing and victory be thine;
Simat-Hiia,
Healing and victory be thine;
Great 'Zlat [2]),
Healing and victory be thine;
Šarat-Niṭufta [3]),
Healing and victory be thine;
Kanat-Niṭufta,
Healing and victory be thine;
Bihrat-Anana,
Healing and victory be thine;
King Abathur-Rama [4]),
Healing and victory be thine;

[1]) The prefix "anan" indicates the spouse of the spirit named.

[2]) 'zlat ("she-span") is a personification of pious wifehood of priestly caste. Šišlam-Rba, the prototype of Mandaean priesthood, took to wife 'Zlat, and the marriage is described as a pattern for earthly marriages.

[3]) See p. 37, n. 1.

[4]) There are two Abathurs, one appears to be an dmuta (or counterpart) of the other. In the less abstract form, he is Abathur of the Scales, the spirit of justice which weighs human souls in his balance.

King 'Uṣṭuna-rba [1]),
Healing and victory be thine;
King Abathur-Muzania,
Healing and victory be thine;
King Pthahil, son of Zahriel [2]),
Healing and victory be thine;
King Yahia [3])-Yuhana,
Healing and victory be thine;
King Adam, the first man,
Healing and victory be thine;
King Šitil, [4]), son of Adam the first man,
Healing and victory be thine;
O (ye) kings and 'uthras,
And Indwellings [5]) and jordans,
And running streams and *škinta*s
Of the worlds of light,
All of you, healing and victory (be yours!)
And (may there be) forgiving of sins
For myself, (Adam Yuhana) son of (Mahnuš), (N. son of N.)
Who have prayed this prayer!
May there be forgiveness of sins for me!

(Note.— The part which follows forms the main part of the RAHMIA or "Devotions", i.e. the prayers prescribed for the three prayer-times daily, i.e. at sunrise, at noon and before sunset; each day of the week having its own set of prayers. These must be got by heart, and their correct recitation is an essential part of every priest's training.)

My Lord be praised!

In the name of the Great First Sublime (Strange) Life, from the worlds of light, the Transcendent, above all works, be there healing and purity (victory), strength and soundness, hearing and being heard, joy of heart and forgiving of sins for me, Adam Yuhana son of Mahnuš. May my thought, my knowledge and my intelligence enlighten me by means of this treasure, a section of the Devotions (Rahmia), and the strength of Yawar-Ziwa and Simat-Hiia.

[1]) The "Great Body". The Great Life projected itself as a universe into the Great Body, shaped, according to gnostic tradition, like a man's body with worlds as limbs and organs. Here personified: also called Adam Kasia.

[2]) Zahriel was brought up from the underworld by Hibil-Ziwa, whose semblance wedded her there. Their offspring was Pthahil, who was therefore part darkness and part light.

[3]) John the Baptist.

[4]) Šitil, (usually one of the triad Hibil, Šitil and Anuš) died in order that Adam might live longer. Hence he is called the purest of human souls.

[5]) Mašknia. Or, just "abodes".

106[1]

In the Name of the Great Life!
Up, up! (ye) Elect righteous ones,
Rise up, ye perfected and believing ones!
Rise, worship and praise the Great Life!
And praise the great king Šišlam-Rba,
And praise the Occult Tanna[2] and Ham-Ziwa,
And praise the great Yawar and 'Zlat the great,
And praise Simat-Hiia,
From whom all worlds came into being;
And praise the Wellspring and Datepalm[3]
From Whom the Father of 'uthras came into being.
I worship and praise that lofty and great
King of light, the Compassionate One
Who is full of loving-kindness.

[Pray this prayer in the "Devotions" of the early hours (daybreak) for it is the opening (prayer) of the "Devotions". Here recite "My good messenger" and "I worship Life" and recite "In the name of..."]

107

In the name of the Great Life!
My good messenger of light
Who travelleth to the house of its friends,
Come, direct my speech and open my mouth in praise
That I may praise the Great Life
Wholly.

[1] In Lidzbarski's Mandäische Liturgien, this part comes as II, Die Oxforder Sammlung (i.e. in the Bodleian Library). Prayer 106 is Prayer I of his Erstes Buch, on p. 171 M.L.

[2] See p. 9, n. 1.

[3] See p. 14, ns. 5 and 6.

108

In the name of the Great Life!
I worship Life
And I praise my Lord Manda-ḏ-Hiia
And that great Presence of Glory
Which emanated from Itself.

[Pray these two prayers after "Up, up elect righteous" in the early morning devotions, then recite "In their name... in the name of that Primal Being"]

109

In the name of the Great Life!
I worship Life and I praise my lord
Manda-ḏ-Hiia and that great Presence of Glory
Which emanated from Itself.

[Pray this prayer at the devotions of the seventh hour and then recite "In their name... in the name of that..."]

110

In the name of the great Life!
The time, the time for devotions arriveth
The time of the Lord of Prayer hath come.
My awakener is Hibil, my instructor [1] is Šitil,
Anuš lifteth up [2] my hymns,
The immerser in my immersion [3] is Šilmai
And he who establisheth prayers is Nidbai.

111 [4]

In the name of the Great Life!
My good messenger of light
Who travelleth to the house of its friends
Come, direct my speech and open my mouth in praise
That I may praise the Great Life
Wholly.

---

[1] Lidzbarski Hymnensänger (M.L. p. 173).
[2] D.C. 53 has damia, read ramia as in other mss.
[3] The priest immerses himself at the early morning prayer.
[4] A repetition of 107.

112 [1])

In the name of the Great Life!
I worship the Life
And I praise my lord Manda-ḏ-Hiia
And that great Presence of Glory
Which emanated from Itself.

[This prayer, "The time of devotions" is the opening prayer of the eventide devotions. Then recite "In their name (= In the name of the Life) and "In the name of that (Primal Being) and set on thy crown and recite beside is "Life created (Yawar-Ziwa)", "Let there be light" and "Manda created me" and then recite "Incense that is fragrant", and "Lo for the First Life" for the incense and cast it on the fire. And here recite the Sunday prayer.]

113

In the name of the Great Life, may healing be mine, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš, through this Sunday prayer!

"On the light of Ether do I stand,
I stand for the Great Light with its purities!
I am Manda-ḏ-Hiia, emanation (lit. planting) of the Mighty First Life.
I cried to the first day of the week, (Habšaba)
The lauded, the pure guardian of the Light
Who enlighteneth 'uthras. To him I said
'Rise up, go, set off, descend to the earthly world,
To that world which is all birth,
To be with the Elect Righteous,
Men formed of flesh and blood.
Hold them in thy grasp, strengthen them,
Stand by them, take care of them,
Give them strength and fortitude
So that they may stand and worship and praise
The Mighty Sublime Life!'"
Then Sunday spoke, saying to Manda-ḏ-Hiia
"How canst thou send me to this world that is all birth
To be with elect righteous (men)
Formed of flesh and blood who do not respect me!
They treat me with contempt, hold me in no great honour,

[1]) A repetition of 108.

And remit not my sin and transgression?"
Then Manda-ḏ-Hiia spoke, saying to Sunday,
"Up with thee! Go, set off, descend to the earthly world
To this world that is all birth, to be with
Elect, righteous men formed of flesh and blood.
And grasp them in thy grasp, confirm them,
Stand by them and take care of them!
Turn back and drive away from them
The seven planets together with their demons and devils,
And their amulet-imps and their evil creatures;
So that they will forgive thee thy sins [1])
And thy transgressions; will hold thee in great esteem
And victory will be ours and will be thine".
Then Manda-ḏ-Hiia spoke and said to the elect righteous,
"Give heed to Sunday the Enlightener whom
I have sent to be with you in order to enlighten you,
To uplift you and make you upright,
And to bring you prayer and praise.
Forgive him his sins [2]) and transgressions
And hold him in great esteem."
Manda-ḏ-Hiia taught and expounded and said,
"Anyone who doth not forsake his sins and trespasses
On Sunday, nor holdeth him in high esteem,
Will have no seat amongst the 'uthras
Nor will he behold the great Countenance of Glory.
For Sunday is more precious, greater and more beauteous
And bright than all the 'uthras!"
Blessed and praised is Manda-ḏ-Hiia and the Confirmer".
And Life is victorious over all works.

114

In the name of the Great Life!
Sublime Light be glorified!
Early I arose from my sleep: I stood,
Into radiance that was great I looked,
I gazed into radiance that was great,
Into the Light which is boundless.

[1]) Read "they will forsake their sins and their transgressions".

[2]) I feel sure that this should be "Forsake on it (Sunday) sins and transgressions".

When clothed[1] in robes of radiance
And light was thrown on my shoulders[2],
A wreath of ether He set on my head
And set it on the head of all His race[3].
He hymned, and the 'uthras with Him hymn,
And the Light-rays[4] answer His voice.
And it rouseth sleepers and maketh them rise up
From their sleep.
He said to them "Arise, ye sleepers who lie there,
Rise up, ye stumblers who have stumbled,
Arise, worship and praise the Great Life
And praise His Counterpart, that is the image of the Life[5],
Which shineth forth and is expressed
In sublime light."
    And Life be praised!

115[6]

    In the name of the Great Life!
We have purified our hands in kušṭa (truth)
And our lips in faith
We have uttered words of radiance
And were absorbed[7] in thoughts of light.
Thou, my lord Manda-ḏ-Hiia, art blessed and praised
And thy praise is established (on high).
Great is the strength of Life;
Abounding the glory of the mighty (Life)!
Honour resteth upon the 'uthras who sit in glory.
This is prayer and praise which came to them[8] from

[1] Not as in M.L. "Ich war bekleidet". Possibly "When the dress of radiance was put on"?

[2] D.C. 53 lkadfḫ "on his shoulder" (D.C. 3 lkadfiḫ): M.L. (from the Bodley ms. lkadfai) "on my shoulder". As the Bodley ms. is the older I have adopted this reading.

[3] In both D.C. 53 and D.C. 3 "He set an ether-wreath on his head and set it on all his race".

[4] Pasimkia: see p. 63, n. 4.

[5] Is the sun taken here as a symbol or image of the deity?

[6] The first few lines are identical with 104 (the Rušma).

[7] D.C. 3 makes 'shiṭ abun two words (not 'ṣhiṭibun as in the Oxford Ms.) De Morgan has 'shiṭabun as in the Rušma and here. See Lidzbarski's note, M.L. 168 n. 2 on the meaning, which he associates with fire. Jastrow, סְחַט however, gives good reason for his second meaning "to absorb".

[8] D.C. 3 and M.L. "came to us"

The great place of Light and the everlasting Abode.
We praise (Him) with it when we have risen from our sleep,
Before any have spoken falsehood.

For any man who prayeth this prayer there will be forgiving of sins and transgressions in the great place of Light and in the everlasting Abode.

And Life is victorious.

116

Blessed be thy name and praised be thy name
My lord, Manda-ḏ-Hiia!
Pure mountains that quake not have blessed thee:
'Ufania [1] (interpretations?) of truth which are unchangeable
Have blessed thee.
Sons of salvation who sit in thy company
Have blessed thee.
Yawar-Ziwa, the great king of Naṣirutha
Hath blessed thee;
Ayar-Nhura, the pure, the envoy who is all righteousness,
Hath blessed thee
And I [2] worship and praise that channel of light,
The messenger of all rays-of-light.
Blessed is thy name and praised is thy name,
Being who resteth upon the *škinta*s!
Upon *škinta*s [3] doth his name rest.
Every day, daily, they gaze on his likeness
And upon the great Countenance of Glory.
And Life be praised!

[Pray these four prayers, "On the Ether-Light do I stand", "Early I rose from my sleep", "We have purified our hands in kušṭa", and "Blessed be thy name and praised be thy name". Recite them for the "Devotions" for daybreak after incense.]

117

I worship, praise and laud
That Šrar, the great occult First Vine
Whose fruits are a thousand thousand,

[1] אוּפְנָא "turn". interpretation". (In later Hebrew, see J. אוֹפֶן)

[2] D.C. 53 has ḏ-ana "whom I" etc.

[2] M.L. "upon all *škinta*s."

And a myriad myriad His tendrils;
Upon Whom I called and He answered me.
Further, when I call on him, He will answer me;
For He will come and will heal me,
Will lift me up, raise me and confirm me 1)
Will direct my eyes to the Light,
And my feet to steadfastness
My mouth to wisdom and my heart to vigilance.
Then I worship, praise and laud
That first great occult škinta
That is the house of dazzling beings.
Then I worship, praise and laud
That occult, first škinta
Which my Parents 2) inhabit.
Then I worship, praise and laud
Yon Ruaz, the great first secret Vine
Which loosed its milky juices 3) into the habitations.
Then I worship, praise and laud
That Ruaz, the great first Light
Who hath sovereignty over all worlds of light.
Then I worship, praise and laud
That great, occult, first škinta
To which the eyes of Naṣoraeans,
Men set apart, and the elect righteous
Look, that they may rise and behold
The great place of Light and the Everlasting Abode.
And Life be praised: Life is victorious.

[Pray this prayer in the Rahmia (Devotions) of the seventh hour, after incense on the fire (and after?) "On the Ether-Light do I stand"]

118

It is time to pray the "Devotions",
The great moment for humble worship 4),
For offering up propitiatory prayer 5)

---

1) D.C. 53 unitaqnan, D.C. 3 unitraṣlia, also M.L. p. 181, 1.3.

2) "My Parents", i.e. according to priestly teaching the cosmic Father and Mother.

3) "Nourishing juices" is perhaps better. From HLB? Lidzbarski (M.L. p. 181, n. 1) rejects this derivation.

4) Lit. "to humble oneself".

5) Hilita from (חִלָּה "to assuage by prayer or gifts"). French douceur.

To my lord, Manda-ḏ-Hiia,
For arousing 1) the elect righteous.
The priests say to Manda-ḏ-Hiia
"We will abjure that which we possess
Of fee, alms and benefit
And the (false) deity 2) of the House 3).
We will come and will be believers."
Manda-ḏ-hiia saith to them, to the priests,
"Your Father hath great strength,
Surpassing all limit, (stronger)
Than passionate thoughts, vain things
And the devouring flame.
The Good One clotheth His children:
He covereth them and raiseth and showeth them
That there is great enlargement 4) of Life
And your souls shall rejoice
With clouds (spouses?) of light.
But other souls will die and become
As though they had never existed.
Ye shall receive your vestments: 5)
Ye shall receive your wreaths.
In the presence of the Great (Life?)
Ye will be great, and will be called
'Uthras amongst the 'uthras.
And ye will say "The Living stand
In the dwelling of the Life".
And Life is victorious over all works.

[Pray this prayer in the evening devotions after incense (and) after "For the Ether-light do I stand".]

119

In the name of the Great Life
Be the sublime Light glorified!
On Sunday, the first of days,

Who hath seen that which I have seen?
Who saw Manda-ḏ-Hiia
When he went and came to the world?
He went (thence) and came to the world.
The Earth lay prostrate and was affrighted.
He taught, and lovely was his voice!
And he lifted it up, in his mouth there was eloquence,
Eloquence he put into his mouth.
He revolutionized and forsook the world:
The world he revolutionised and forsook.

In lamentation sitteth Ruha;
And the Seven sit in consternation;
They weep and prolong their mourning
Because their mysteries are disclosed,
Because disclosed are their mysteries.
They will be brought to an end

[4] paṭur occurs in D.C. 36 and DC. 6 of prayers, that they are the soul's paṭur (paṭurḫ hinun) i.e. "her discharge", her "permission to leave" seems the likeliest translation.

To my friends.
I brought truthful words to believers.
Men who buy my wares,
Their merits wreathe their heads
Twined are their merits,
And their horns are exalted

They will arise and will behold
The Place of Light.
Renowned is Life and victorious,
And victorious the man who went hence.

My day — what is it amongst the days?
A day, My day!
What amongst the hours is one hour?
My day, what is it amongst the days?
The day on which the radiance of Manda-d-Hiia shone forth,
My day is Sunday, chief of days,
The day on which the radiance of Manda-ḏ-Hiia dawned:
On my day the radiance of Sunday dawned
Upon us and enlightened us beyond measure.

121

Before the Wellsprings were transmuted [2]
Before the Awakening [3] without,
Before ye were in existence
I was in the world:
The Voice of living waters (Water of Life),
(Waters) which transmute the turbid waters.
They become clear and shining [4]
They gush forth and cast out impurities.

[1] Literally "in" or "with" their heads.

[2] The whole hymn deals with the transmutation of turbid water by Water of Life: (šinia,, from ŠNA "to change"?).

[3] In spite of Lidzbarski's note M.L. 186 n. 4, tirata is undoubtedly "awakening". In D.C. 43 ulabšinta ulabtirata "neither in sleeping or waking". Lidzbarski takes lbar in this line for lbab ('b' and 'r' are easily mistaken).

[4] Nasbia tuqna has the double meaning "take on restoration" and "assume luminosity".

Wherefore should the First (Life) desire sons from the dregs?
Voices cry aloud proclamations [1]
Planning schemes, all of them talk!
(But) one Voice cometh and teacheth all sayings,
One Being cometh and teacheth about this and that.
(As for) us, who have praised our Lord
Thou wilt forgive us our sins.
Thou wast victorious, Manda-ḏ-Hiia
And thou leadest all thy friends to victory.
And Life is victorious.

122

O Lord of devotions,
O Lord of Prayers
And of hymns and good [2] books,
O Lord of prayer and praise,
Hear my voice and condemn me not!

123

Except for six or seven nations,
Fruit is set up on the Tree;
On the Tree fruit is set up
And (other) trees gather together toward it.
Toward it do the trees assemble,
And a throne is set up for the Lord [3] of Radiance
For the Lord of Radiance a throne is set up
And the Lord of Radiance sitteth thereon.
Before him are set up recompenses
Which he delivereth to the perfect,
To the perfect doth he deliver them
And said "To each according to the works of his hands
It is awarded". And he said [4] "Every man who toiled [5]
And was long-suffering shall come and take with both hands,

---

[1] Or "sacred instruction" "scriptures".

[2] Reliable, orthodox books.

[3] Read Irab.

[4] Not in M.L.

[5] D.C. 53 is defective. For kulhin ḏ hua read as in other mss. kul man ḏ hla u'tangar. The verb is הַלָּא not חַלָּא (in Mandaic there is no distinction between the two hs.). Jastrow gives as the meaning of הלי, הלא "to be faint, to labor" i.e. to toil till fatigued. For 'tangar read 'tnagar (cf. [illegible]).

But he who did not toil nor endure,
Standeth empty in the House of Dues.
He will seek but will not find,
And ask, but nought will be given him,
Because he had in his hand and gave not,
He will search there in his bosom and will find nothing."
Thou art praised, Manda-ḏ-Hiia
Who dost not condemn thy friends.

124

I seek a boon from the Life,
From Thee, mighty Life.
I seek a boon from the Life —
That Ye will rightly guide Your praise [1])
For me.

[These three antiphonal hymns and three chants are for the first day of the week.]

125

In the name of the Great Life
At the beginning of the construction [2])
I issued from thee, everlasting abode:
At the beginning of the Building I emanated from the Builder,
The Great (Life) who built me.
From the Builder, who is the Great (Life)
Who constructed me, I came.
My Transplanter transplanted me.
I came: my Transplanter transplanted me
With advice that was counselled by the Great (Life),
With advice given by the Great (Life)
They sent me that I might build a building,
That I might construct a building for the good,
For true and faithful men,
I built and constructed it;
And at the beginning of the building I established,
I planted living plants therein,
True and faithful men.

[1]) I.e. the worshipper's praise of the Life.

[2]) Lidzbarski took banana to mean "in a cloud". The context, however, and the evidence of other texts proves the word to mean the act of building, construction, a building, and usually the act of creation.

I entreat my Builder (Creator) (saying)
"Keep Thine eye on my Plants
Upon my Plants keep Thine eye,
Lest, perchance, they droop 1) and lie down
Forgetting the good things commanded (them),
Until they sleep (droop) and until they lie down,
And until they forget Me (and) the good things commanded,
Until they forget Me!
(Then) will apostasy enter into them."
Beware of it, my brethren! Beware of it my friends!
Beware, my friends of Jesu, the pseudo-Messiah,
And of those who misconstrue appearances
And alter the words of My mouth.
If ye are wary, my brethren, if ye are wary, my friends,
If ye are wary, my brethren, when ye depart from your bodies
I will be a Helper to you.
A Helper and a Support from the Place of Darkness
To the Place of Light.
Thou hast conquered, Manda-ḏ-Hiia
And makest victorious all those who love Thy name.

126

At the beginning of the pure Kimṣa 2)
Accompanied by sublime Rays of Light,
I gazed and beheld a great (sprouting) 3) Shoot
Which was transplanted from within the great Jordan.
Sublime was his voice his perfume fragrant,
His appearance shining and splendid!
And Life is victorious.

127

A Being, chosen, righteous, sprang up
And shone forth in the world.
He appeared in the world and shone forth.
He spoke with the Mighty Life;
With the mighty Life he spoke,

1) In the Middle East a gardener says of a drooping plant that it is nāima "sleeping", and here "sleeping" applied to a plant would mean "drooping".

2) Kimṣa especially when used with KMṢ appears to mean "formation", "materialisation", "taking shape" or "consummation". Here, possibly "formation" is the word.

3) Nibṭa. "a sprout", "outgrowth".

And revealed mysteries that were veiled,
Mysteries that were veiled he revealed.
His glory resteth on his friends,
On his friends his glory abideth.
But the whole world 1) persecuteth him.
When he saw that the worlds persecute him
He lifted his eyes to the Place of Light.
They opened the Gate of Light to him
And he arose into Life: They (Life) supported him.
Life supported Life,
Life found Its own,
And my soul hath found
That for which it had waited.
Thou art victorious, Manda-ḏ-Hiia,
And thou bringest to victory
All those who love thee.
And Life is victorious.

128

O Man, whom acclamation chose out,
Who wast selected out of the world,
They will cause thine eyes to shine, good one! 2)
For they have clothed thee in a robe
Which is beautiful.
Because of thy cry and the sound of thy teaching,
The Great Life hath accepted thy prayer
And thy praise.

129

"Whither goest thou, chosen 3) righteous One
Whom all thy friends seek, for Whom all Thy friends
Long and desire Thine appearance amongst them?"
"I have gone to build a building 4)
Yonder in the world.
I built it 5) and constructed it

---

1) Kulhun almia, often means "all persons", "everyone", "all the world"
2) In D.C. 3 and Oxford ms ṭaba (not uṭaba).
3) D.C. 53 has bhiria: read bhir as in other mss.
4) For banta in D.C. 53 read binta as in other mss.
5) Read banth̬ as in other mss.

And set it up in the beginning.
Into the Building I transplanted
Plants that were living,
True and faithful men.
I entreat my Builder,
The Being who guardeth the Building,
I entreat my Builder (saying)
'Direct Thine eyes to my plants,
Upon my plants keep Thine Eye;
For perchance they may wilt ¹) and lie down
And forget the good things They commanded;
Until they sleep and until they lie down
And until they forget the good things commanded (them)!'
The Being cried to the world from one end to the other,
To the world's end the Being called the world and said,
"Well is it for one who taketh heed to himself!
The man who taketh heed to himself
Hath not his like in the world! Moreover,
Men who are staunch shall live:
But those who turn aside shall come to an end.
Those who turn aside shall die ²)
But those who are staunch shall find certainty.
My brethren, hold firmly to your staves ³)
And endure the world's persecution.
The worlds' persecution endure
With a true and believing heart.
Worship Me with uprightness
And I will act as your Helper,
A Helper and support from the Place of Darkness
To the Place of Light.
And Life is victorious.

130

On the day on which They opened
The great gate of the Dwellings ⁴)

¹) See p. 119, n. 1.

²) So in both D.C. 53 and D.C. 3. The line is missing in M.L.

³) The olivewood staff (margna) is part of a priest's insignia, so that priests and not laymen are addressed.

⁴) Hilbunia is a literary word for "houses". Literally hilbuna means "egg", for which the usual word is bit (which also means "house"). In poetry, human beings as well as divine personages live in hilbunia.

The radiance of the King over the holy 'uthras
Was enhanced.
To true and faithful men there came
Prayer and thanksgiving.
They rejoice and delight therein
And raise their prayer and praise
To the Place of Light.

[These three hymns and three chants are for the second day of the week (Monday).]

131

In the name of the Great Life
Sublime Light be magnified!
"Thou camest from the House of Life;
Thou camest - what didst Thou bring us?"
"I brought you that ye shall not die:
That your souls shall not be pent back.
I brought you on the day of death, Life;
On the day of affliction, Joy. [1]).
I brought you a serenity
That existeth not in the unrest of nations".
"This, this hast Thou brought, Good One!
To the true man what hast Thou brought?"
"I have made him My treasurer,
Made him ruler over all that I have.
I have given him precepts of right-dealing
By which he entereth and departeth [2])
As a man who hath realised his desire.
Chosen ones! ye have asked and have found;
Furthermore, my chosen, ye shall seek and find
Just as the first (believers?) sought".
And Life is victorious.

132

Come, come, King of 'uthras,
Lofty Messenger, who came from His Father's House.
Come! receive my prayer and my praise
And lift it up in peace to the Place of Light!

---

[1]) Read hadua as in D.C. 3 and the Oxford ms.
[2]) I.e. "is born and dies".

133

Thou camest from the House of Good Beings.
(O) would [1] that Thou hadst not come into corruption
Into the evil and falsity of this world!
Would that Thou hadst not come into corruption
And hadst not been seen by my eyes!"
"If verily I came, if verily I appeared,
Thine eyes are eyes of falsehood
Whilst my eyes are eyes of truth.
Lying eyes are darkened utterly.
Eyes of falsity behold not the Truth!
If thou wishest to see, Ruha, [2]
Go to the house of him who knoweth Me,
Those who know me, for I dwell amongst them
In the hearts of my friends
And the thoughts of my disciples".
And Life is victorious.

134

Come, come, King of 'Uthras,
Lofty Messenger for whom my eyes look!
Hearken, hear my cry
And lift up my prayers and my praise
To the Place of Light.

135

Fragrance came from its place,
Truth came from its Home,
Fragrance came from its place,
It came and settled in the House
It crieth and maketh the dead live,
It arouseth those who who are dying
And lying prone.
It awaketh souls who are fit for [3] and worthy
Of the Place of Light.
This, this is what the Good One did,

---

[1] 'dilma indicates a doubtful or sarcastic statement. or a negative form of stating a condition. Ruha is the speaker.

[2] Both D.C. 3 and D.C. 53 have lruha: the Oxford ms. ruha.

[3] D.C. 3 ḏ-šihia, D.C. 53 ḏ-šiha.

And set up that which liveth, His Sign.
The planets assembled, they went.
They confronted him that ruled them,
Saying to him, "Hast thou not seen, Alaha-Alihun [1]),
That a Fragrance hath come from its place,
A fragrance from its place hath come?
The (And that) Mana hath moved from its place?
It calleth and maketh the dead live,
And rouseth the dead [2]) and the sleeping;
It awaketh souls who are fit for and worthy
Of the Place of Light.
This, this hath the Good One done,
And hath set up that which liveth, His Sign".

Alaha-Alihun opened his mouth,
Saying to his sons, his first-born,
"Come, come, my children,
My first-born and my offspring!
Listen to the thing which I say unto you!
If ye find a righteous man,
Bow yourselves low before him,
One bow for himself, and the second
For the Fragrance of Life which resteth upon him".
Behold, Life is victorious!
Life triumpheth over this world.

136

Come, come, Manda-ḏ-Hiia!
The Mount of Darkness becometh light,
It groweth light, the mount of Darkness,
And the turbid waters become fresh [3]).

[These three hymns and three chants are for the third day of the week (Tuesday).]

137

In the name of the Great Life
Sublime Light be magnified!

---

[1]) I.e. God-of-gods.

[2]) D.C. 53 and D.C. 3 both bave mitia: The Oxford ms. maitia "dying", which Lidzbarski has translated "bringt her".

[3]) The antithesis of turbid. The adjective means "fresh" also of myrtle.

There was a Cry in the firmament
And thunder sounded in the House of Stars.
Ruha and the planets sit in lamentation,
They sit in lamentation over a man
Who sprang up from the Earth,
About a man who sprang up from the Earth
And rent a fissure in the House,
A fissure he rent in the House
And into it he cast dispute.
A dispute he cast into it,
Not to be resolved for an age of ages;
(Not) until Manda-ḏ-Hiia cometh
Bringing with him three chosen ones,
Bringing three chosen ones with him
And lifting them up to the everlasting Abode,
To the place which is light-giving and effulgent.
Summoned and invited (thither) are your souls,
And the souls of our good brothers
And those of our sisters who are believing.
Thou art victorious, Manda-ḏ-Hiia,,
Good One, who establisheth his friends!
And Life is victorious.

138

The voice of a hidden Sprout [1])
It spoke and discoursed from the Earth,
From the Earth it spoke and discoursed.
The Great Life, from the Occult, answered it,
From the Occult the Great Life gave it reply.
And It transferred thither and sent a Messenger.
The Messenger (whom) It transferred and sent
Subdueth the might of rebels.

139

I ascended the mountain Carmel [2]),
Thee I ascended, Mountain, Mount Carmel!
The mountain of Carmel I ascended.

[1]) I take "sprout" to be a young "plant", that is a young believer.

[2]) Karimla, Carmel, is mentioned in the 26th. fragment of the Drašia ḏ-Yahia.

Twelve vines [1] awaited me.
The vines saw me, the Vines beheld me.
When they saw me, the vines waxed great,
They spread out their foliage.
They increased, spread out their foliage,
Increased their fruit and their blossom.
(Yet) they knew me not, did not discern me,
Nor did they take heed of me.
They knew me not, did not discern who I was,
Nor whose son I was [2],
The man who saw me and discerned me,
His course is set for the Place of Life!
Thou art victorious, Manda-ḏ-Hiia
And leadest all thy friends to victory.

140

Between mountains twain,
And between three škintas,
Between mountains twain
Yawar, the Chosen One, founded a škinta [3])
A škinta did Yawar found,
And chosen righteous were established therein,
Therein were the chosen righteous established [4]).
And they arise and behold the Place of Light.

141

Who will come, who will tell me,
Who will inform me, who will teach me,
Who will come and who will tell me
What 'uthras are like, what 'uthras resemble,
And what do rays-of-light resemble?

'Uthras resemble Radiance,
"Rays" resemble Light.
'Uthras pledge their word [5])
And do not lie.
The planets lie: they

---

[1] The twelve tribes?
[2] The second ana is a miswriting. (Not in D.C. 3.)
[3] Škinta: The cult-hut?
[4] The second mitqaimia is omitted in D.C. 53.
[5] Lit. "take oath".

Come to an end on the Great Last Day.
Life is extolled, and victorious
And victorious is the man
Who went hence.

142

The advent of Hibil-'Uthra —
Like Šitil, he goeth to the house of his friends,
Priests who hearkened to the voice of Anuš the great 'uthra;
They worship and praise the Great Life
From the beginning unto the end.

[These three hymns and three chants are for the fourth day of the week (Wednesday)].

143

In the name of the Great Life
Sublime Light be glorified.
In the glory of my Father I stand,
And with praise of the Being who is my Creator:
In the glory of my Father I stand
And am upright in the House of Perfection.
At my voice the earth trembled;
At my radiance the heavens were shaken,
The seas dry up,
Flowing streams fall into barren wastes.
Destroyed, rent asunder are fortresses
And earthly men of might are quelled.
Mountains, however lofty,
Like bridges are laid flat.
As for the wicked, who rise up against me,
There is a Being who will hew them down,
Not with my strength but in the strength of the mighty Life.
And Life is victorious and victorious the man
Who went hence.

144

By my pure radiance am I protected;
And the 'uthras, my brothers, are covered with light.
Through the vigilance and praisegiving of the 'uthras,
My brothers, the glory of Life cometh and resteth upon me.

145

When the Mighty [1] (Life) speaketh
In the Great Place, the House of Perfection
The Great and Mighty One transporteth (or createth)
Šilmai and Nidbai: It transported Šilmai and Nidbai
And gave them to Nṣab-Ziwa as his helpers.
When Nṣab-Ziwa had reliance on the ʼuthras,
The perfect beings whom They had sent down,
He spoke with his calm voice
And the chosen go out towards him [2]
Towards him go out the chosen.
And he giveth them some of his glory
Some of his glory he bestoweth on them,
And the chosen on earth are confirmed
The elect righteous are confirmed;
They rise up and behold the Place of Light.
Extolled is Life victorious,
And victorious is the man who went hence.

146

I am preserved by my pure radiance
Like the Mighty One [3] in His Glory.
My raiment shone forth in the House
And my prayer and praise rise upward to His Place [4].

147

Miserable [5] am I!
When shall I go (hence?)
(When will) my aching heart find relief?
My heart that aches (when will it) find relief?
And my soul, that they made an alien,
Find its vent?
In the place where they are much questioned
The glory of Life will rest on me.
And it will rest upon my priests and (those)

---

[1] The plural indicates the Great Life.

[2] The couplet is missing in D.C. 53: I take it from other mss. including D.C. 3 and the Oxford ms.

[3] Again, the plural indicates the Great Life.

[4] In D.C. 53 very plainly latrḥ.

[5] Ania means both "poor" and "miserable".

Whom the Seven persecute in this world.
(Yea) the Seven persecute sorely!
The worlds which persecute and wrong,
The Seven, they and their king,
Are bound for conflagrations of fire.
(But) the good, the elect, the just
And the perfect rise
And behold the Place of Light.
Life is extolled, victorious,
And victorious is the man who went hence.

148

"I am poor 1) and submissive,
An elect righteous one 2).
Listen, hearken to my cry!"
"Thou, poor one, with thy children,
Thine offspring and thy priest,
Shalt rise and thou wilt behold
The Place of Light".

[These three prayers and three hymns are for the fifth day of the week (Thursday).]

149 3)

In the name of the Great Life
Sublime Light be magnified!
At the door of the synagogue
Her mother meeteth Miriai,
Miriai her mother meeteth,
And she questioneth her straitly,
"Whence comest thou, My daughter Miriai?
That thy face plucketh (colour from) the rose.
Thy face plucketh (colour from) the rose
And thine eyes are full of sleep,
Full of sleep are thine eyes
And thy brow beareth marks of vigil!" 4)

---

1) See p. 128, n. 5.

2) That is to say, one of the bhiria zidqa, one of the Mandaean community.

3) The conversion and baptism of Miriai are described in G.R., see Lidzbarski's translation, p. 341; and in J.B. II p. 123. See also 162, p. 140.

4) שְׁהַר "to be awake: šaharta = "a vigil", "a watch"? Doubtful: the word could also mean "sleep"!

And she (Miriai) answered her,
"Yea, these two or three days
My brothers stayed in my Father's house;
In my Father's house my brothers stayed
Chanting wondrous chants.
At their voice, at the sound of the discourse
Of the 'uthras, my brothers,
No sleep cometh to mine eyes,
To mine eyes no sleep cometh
And my brow (keepeth) vigil". [1]
Hast thou not heard, daughter Miriai,
What the Jews say about thee?
The Jews say 'Thy daughter is in love with a man,
She hath hated Jewry and loved Naṣirutha;
She hath conceived hate for the synagogue-door
And love for the door of the maškna [2]).
She hath taken dislike to the phylactery-band
And loveth the fresh (myrtle-) wreaths.
On the Sabbath she carries on work;
On Sunday she keepeth her hands therefrom.
Miriai hath hated [3]) the Law
Which the Seven imposed (bound) upon Jerusalem'".
On the place where she was standing,
Miriai scattereth the dust with her foot
And sayeth "Dust on the mouth of the Jews!
Ashes on the mouths of all the cohens (priests)!
And dung beneath the horses' hooves
Be upon the Elders who are in Jerusalem!
That which I have come to love I cannot hate.
That which I (now) hate, I cannot love.
(No love have I) except love for Manda-ḏ-Hiia,
My Lord, who standeth by (me) and will be
My Helper, lending hand and support
From the Place of Darkness to the Place of Light".
Thou hast vanquished, Manda-ḏ-Hiia!
And bringest victory to all those who love thy name.
And Life is victorious.

---

[1]) Delete la?
[2]) The maškna is the Mandaean cult-hut and its enclosure.
[3]) In D.C. 3 slitḫ, Oxford ms. aslitḫ "rejected".

150

On the day that the great gate of the Dwellings 1) opened,
The radiance of the King upon the holy 'uthras was increased.
The 'uthras bowed in adoration
And the Great Life accepted their prayer and their praise
From beginning to end.

151 2)

When will my Lord come from thee
Victorious heaven?
He will lift my head from my knees
And dry my eyes from my tears.
My lap that is full of ignominies
He emptied 3) before Him
I lay low 4) and I arose.
I will tell him everything: of how
All the worlds have harried me,
Many were the persons 5) who harried me.
(But) my brethren, sons of Kušṭa,
Do not fail me.
The worlds stoned me with stones
(But) my brothers were moved in words to anger thereat 6).
(O) that my Lord would come from thee
Victorious heaven! for He will lift my head
From my knees and dry my eyes from my tears.
My lap, which was full of ignominies,
He hath emptied out before Him, I lay low
And I arose 7). And I will recount to Him everything,
How all the worlds persecuted me;
Many were the persons who harried me,
(But) my brothers, sons of Kušṭa, do not fail me.
The world stoned me with stones,

1) See p. 121, n. 4.

2) This prayer differs considerably in the D.C. 53, D.C. 3 and D.C. 1 versions from the Oxford ms. which Lidzbarski used.

3) Oxf. ms 'nfiṣ qudamḫ "I will empty out before Him"

4) Oxf. ms rmia qudamḫ 'qum, for qudamḫ rmit uqamit in the other three.

5) Almia for "persons", see p.2, n. 3.

6) Lidzbarski is mistaken: the soul makes no complaint about her "brothers in Kušṭạ".

7) See ns. 3 and 4.

(But) my brothers, in words were angry (thereat [1])
They said to me "Why weepest thou, Daughter of Kušṭa?
(Why) do thy tears [2]) fall down into thy bosom?
Thou knowest well thy road!
Thy boundary-stone is firmly erected!
Between lamps of light
They will lift up thy lamp,
Between lamps of light
Thy lamp they will set up [3]),
And they will shine forth.
In thy time and season arise,
And behold the Place of Light.
Extolled is Life and victorious
And victorious the Man who went hence.

152

Ye are uplifted and fortified
By a word of sure truth [4])
Which hath come to you.
A word of sure truth hath come to the good,
A truthful word to the believing!
To the Place which is all Life
Your souls are bidden and invited,
And the souls of your good brothers
And of such of our sisters who are believing.

153

A cleft was cloven in the earth:
Thunder sounded in great Sion,
The being who breached the breach
Was unable with (all) his might
To stop it up.
Another who was with him,
A weaver of a fishing-nets he was,
Cast his net for fishes great and small.
Fish who had strength thereto

---

[1]) Omitted in D.C. 53.

[2]) Read dimih as in D.C. 3.

[3]) The repetition is in D.C. 3.

[4]) Šrara is more than "truth": it is something sure, fact, something that cannot be shaken, certainty, also (physical) soundness.

Broke the net and got out.
Fish whose strength was not equal thereto,
Lay beneath the lead[1].
On the day that the breach will be closed,
On the day that the waterwheels[2] gush out,
On the day that the breach is blocked,
Ye fish, where will ye go?
O ye who sup on[3] scourge and despotism,
What will ye do on the Day of Judgement?
O ye who wear flowers and silk
What will ye say to the Being of the Scales?[4]
Voices have been voiced,
Opinions have been given, all (kinds of) pronouncements;
Yet there cometh one Voice
And teacheth all voices,
There cometh one Saying
And teacheth all sayings.
There cometh one Being,
Who explaineth them one by one.
We who praise our Lord,
Thou wilt forgive our sins and trespasses,
Our sins and trespasses Thou wilt forgive us,
Which we foolishly committed in the world,
For the sake of the strength of the holy
And the true-dealing of the believing.
Life is victorious and victorious the man
Who hath gone hence.

154

I have spoken and discoursed with my voice:
"O Lord of devotional prayer[5],
O Lord of prayer and praise,
Hearken and hear my voice,

[2] Wooden irrigation wheels. (P.) The naura is still employed but has been largely replaced by oil-pumps.

[3] I.e. "are avid of", lit. "eat." M.L. has šauṭa for šuṭa.

[4] Abathur (Muzania).

[5] I.e. the Rahmia, daily devotions.

And be Thou, Great Life,
To me a Helper".

[These three prayers and three hymns are Friday's.]

155

In the name of the Great Life,
Sublime Light be magnified!
Stand by Me, be steadfast,
(Ye who) know Me;
Stand by Me, be staunch,
My friends.
Stand by Me staunchly
(Ye who) know Me,
Like a stone column in storm-winds!
Tempest may go, tempest may come;
(But), My friends, change not
(The words of?) My mouth.
For men who stand firm will live,
(Whilst) those who turn away will meet their end;
Those who turn away will die
Those who remain staunch will find
Sure truth. My brothers,
Speak truthfully, not with lying lips
Prevaricate. Be not like a pomegranate
Which on its outer face is sound,
Outwardly sound is its surface,
But inside it is full of dry husks.
Be like a wine-jar full of Azmiuz wine;
Its outside is clay and pitch
But inside it is Azmiuz wine.

The Voice of Life calleth
And the ears of the chosen hearken.
Extolled is Life and victorious
And victorious the man that goeth hence.

156

By the bank of the great Jordan of the First Life,
A sublime Vine standeth erect.
Each and every day my prayer and praise
Riseth before it.

157

To the mountains I say
How fragrant are your odours,
How delightful your perfume!
Within you 1) all is full of brightness!"
They reply, "The Being who passed through our midst
Hath no tangibility or substance,
No substance or tangibility hath He,
Nor is there any kind of need in Him.
The Being who passed amongst us,
Released some of his vivifying power 2) amongst us."
The wicked hold their power of reproduction
(To consist of) questions 3) (?) and words.
But not in questions(?) and words can the vivifying power 4)
Of Life be comprehended,
But in truth and belief
Which the Elect hold as their vital principle.
Every man who holdeth to his vital principle
And is steadfast therein, raiseth up life,
To support it (life).
(But on) one who did not grasp his vital principle
And did not stand firmly upon it,
From yonder they loose strife,
They loose strife from yonder
And he will become the portion of the world.
And Life is victorious.

1) In mountainous regions, I suppose.

2) Niṣubta is a word of very complex meaning. It is primarily the urge to propagate, reproduce, the élan vital, the vivifying principle, procreation, planting, implanting. At the beginning of the hymn the poet, admiring the sweet herb-scented mountains, is told by them that it is the divine vivifying power of Life which has produced their perfume and beauty. The working of the vital urge in man is then described as a yearning for true life, the life of the soul. In later Mandaean literature niṣubta is an expression for a wife or bride, nṣab niṣubta = "he took a woman to wife".

3) Šulia. "Questions" is šuialia, not šulia. Šul שול is a word for "lower parts", "sexual part", and here possibly that is the meaning. A play on words may be intended.

4) The varying value of niṣubta makes translation difficult, and the whole poem is obscure.

O shoot which sprouted within the Tanna [1]
O prayer and praise
Which came to us from the Place of Light!

159

In the name of the Great Life
Sublime Light be magnified!
The departure of the sabbath
With its evening [2] (marketh),
The entry of Sunday for good.
At the departure of the sabbath
With its night,
The Good One set forth and came into being
And he took his lofty throne
And placed in it that which he brought [3].
And he took his shepherd's-pipe of Truth
That is filled with prayers [4] and praise.
Once on a time, Good One,
I played [5] thereon.
The door of the heavens opened!
A second time, Good One,
Did I hymn therewith,
And all the wicked became good!
And a third time, Good One,
I hymned therewith.
All were stirred to consciousness
And they arose.
It said to them, "Rise up, come [6],

---

[1] Tanna, see p. 9, n. 1. A modern Mandaean legend was related to me which may be founded on this prayer. It was that a green shoot sprouted in Noah's wife's oven as a portent that the flood was imminent. See MMII pp. 259-260.

[2] Read brmaš. (Bar maš and brmaš, "son of groping", "son of searching", may be deliberate play on words.) I translate "with its evening", not in the Christian sense of an "eve", because with Mandaeans a day begins at dawn, not at sunset of the previous day. רְמַשׁ = "evening", "night".

[3] Another play on words : עיתא = "time"?

[4] Read pisnia. Dalman gives pisan as "prayer, supplication" (loanword from the Greek).

[5] Lit. "I discoursed, preached".

[6] Not in M.L., but in both D.C. 53 and D.C. 3.

Ye sleepers who lie sleeping!
Arise, ye erring ones who have stumbled!
Is not my rule hard upon you?
And doth not my high lash fall heavy upon you?"
They say to him, "By thy life,
Our father [1], Son of the Life,
Because of the radiance and light
Thou hast brought with thee
Thy rule is not hard on us
Nor does thy high lash strike hardly upon us!
But as for the wicked,
The son of the wicked,
It entered his body
And felled him (to the ground)".
Once I cried to the evil one
"Keep aloof from my gnostic!" [2] (or "Avoid my hand!")
I repeated, saying to him,
"Keep aloof from my friends!"
And a third time I spoke to him
To the wicked one, and I will not let him go free,
I will slay him utterly, the evil one,
And will cast him into world's end
Into world's end will I cast him
For I cried to him [3] in his ear and he heard not,
In his ear I cried and he heard not.
I showed him, before his eyes, but he looked not.
I showed him, but he saw not with his eyes.
He will meet his end on the great Last Day.
As for us, who praise our Lord,
Thou wilt forgive us our sins and trespasses.
Life is renowned and victorious,
And victorious the man who went hence.

[3] Read qrilḫ as in M.L.

The face of the day [1] the name of which is holy [1].
Secret mysteries were revealed to the 'uthras
Enlightenment was revealed, and praisegiving
That was great and boundless.
The 'uthras who were transported thereby
Rejoice in its wondrous radiance
From beginning to end.

[These three prayers and three hymns are for the seventh day of the week (Saturday).]

161 [2]

In the name of the Great Life
Sublime Light be magnified.
The outgoing of the sabbath with its night [3]
Is the entry of Sunday for good.
(At) the outgoing of the sabbath with its night
The Life summoned me, from amongst Them,
And some of His serenity He imparted to my mind.
He issued a command, and they clothed me with radiance,
Brought me light that was powerful
And covered me (therewith).
They armed me with their armour
And gave command; to the earth they sent me
To voice the Call of the Life,
To found a society in the House,
To found abodes and to build in them sanctuaries [4],
To ordain priests [5] who are fit for
And worthy of the Place of Light,
To smoothen a road for the good,
To prepare a path for the believing,
To make plain and lift up
Probity [6] to its place;

---

[1] M.L. p. 223 translates Vorabend des Tages. Mandaeans begin a day at sunrise, not sunset the previous evening like Jews and Arabs: and this is a reference to Sunday, the morrow.

[2] This prayer is not in the Bodleian ms. (Oxford Marsh 691) — hence not in M.L.

[3] Three words are combined: b rmaš m'iil. See p. 135, n. 2.

[4] mašknia = cult-huts.

[5] Or "to teach disciples". The reference, however, is to the ordination of priests.

[6] Tuqna. Or "steady light", or "honesty" or "orderliness," "orthodoxy".

And to leave dross behind [1] at its proper place,
To deliver the whole congregation of souls,
(The souls) of Naṣoraeans and Mandaeans,
So that the sinner may have no power over them.
I set forth: with my radiance that is great
I came to this world,
I called with the voice of Life,
And I caused a society to dwell in the House [2].
I founded škintas, I built in them sanctuaries,
And I instructed priests (or disciples)
Who were fit for and worthy of
The Place of Light.
I levelled a road for the good
And prepared a path for the believing,
I made plain and set up probity
In its place
And left the dross behind at its place.
I delivered the whole congregation of souls,
(Those) of Naṣoraeans and Mandaeans,
So that the sinner should have no power over them.
Who told the sons of the Evil One
That they should go forth towards me?
They say, "Man, give us some of thy radiance
Which is great, and some
Of thy light which is boundless!"
I answer them, "Efface yourselves,
Be banished from before me
(Ye) dead ones, evil ones
Who have not beheld Life!"
Who giveth the portion of light
To Darkness, or truth to the wicked?
The truth which was mine I have given
To Naṣoraeans, righteous and believing men.
Behold, they dedicated themselves to goodness,
They will rise and will behold
The Place of Light.
Life is extolled and victorious
And victorious the man who went hence.

162 1)

In the name of the Great Life,
Sublime Light be magnified.
At the going-out of sabbath,
On the eve of the first day of the week, for good,
— The going-out of the sabbath —
At eventide Miriai went to the door of the sanctuary 2)
To pray her prayers and to praise the 'uthras.
All the evil ones who saw Miriai wore the qulab (tunic) 3)
All of them had put on clothing,
Wearing weapons they go forth toward Miriai,
Saying to her, "We adjure thee, Miriai,
By the Word, by truth and troth,
Moreover we adjure thee, Miriai.
By the Being from whom thy enlightenment proceeded,
The Being whom thine eyes beheld,
(Tell us,) What is He like?"
I do thus; I say to them,
"Be blotted out, be banished from my presence,
(Ye) dead, (ye) wicked men
Who beheld not the Life
Nor have ye seen that which mine eyes have seen,
Nor heard that which my ears heard.
The Being whom mine eyes 4) beheld —
There is not His peer in the world
(Though one were) to lift eyeballs
From bank to bank of the world!
At His tread and at His footsteps
The earthly world was alarmed.
The dead heard Him and lived.
The sick heard Him and were cured,
Lepers heard Him and were healed,
They got up, they arose, they were healed
By the healing of Manda-ḏ-Hiia

1) Not in M.L. (see p. 138, n. 2).

2) Maškna = that which is called to day a mandi, i.e. the Mandaean place of worship.

3) קוֹלְבִּין A tunic without or with short sleeves (χολόβιον). See Jastrow, p. 1328. The word is omitted in D.C. 3.

4) D.C. 3 ainik; D.C. 53 ainai

Which, in His goodness, He bestowed upon them.
And Life is victorious.

[Pray these two prayers in the Rahmia (Devotions) for candidates for priesthood, on Saturday evening after "It revealed itself and came". Then recite "Poor am poor I! from the fruits".]

163 [1])

In the name of the Great Life
Sublime Light be magnified!
On Sunday, on the chief of days,
Who saw that which I have seen?
Who saw Manda-ḏHiia who set out and came to the world?
He set out and came to the world and three 'uthras came with him.
When he had put [2]) on a robe of radiance and light Thrown [3]) over his shoulders,
An ether-wreath he set on his head
And he set it on all his kin.
On Sunday, on the chief of days
Who hath seen that which I have seen?
Who saw the Stranger who went
And stayed at the house of his friends?
I, who saw the Stranger,
Mine eyes were filled with His light
Mine eyes with light were filled
And knowledge (manda) dwelt in my heart
In my heart knowledge dwelt
And my mouth filled with his praise;
His praise filled my mouth.
And I arose, and I praise my Father.
I arose and (gave?) praises to my Father
From dawn until the decline of day
I praised His great radiance
And I praised his lovely light:
And I praised my father Yušamin the Pure,
The being who dwelleth on the water-springs.
I praised the four beings sons of salvation,

[3]) D.C. 3 mramia, D.C. 53 mramai.

Beings who grasp the hand in troth [1]
Praises to the great First Palmtree! [2]
From it I brought me garments,
Garments I brought me from it
So that the good might come and clothe themselves.
Praise my Lord, Manda-ḏ-Hiia,
Who will be my support in the world,
A support in the world will He be to me
And His hand will help me
To the Place of light.
Blessed and victorious is Life
And victorious the man who went hence.

164 [3]

In the name of the Great Life
Sublime Light be magnified!
I beheld a mountain,
White as the congregation [4] that had formed itself on it.
The day on which a wind breathes (over it?)
Nations delight in its perfume.
The day on which the wind holds the valleys [5]
They are illumined by its radiance.
When standing at my place, I made a great request,
A boon. I said "Grant me that from my mountain-home)[6]
And from the home of the great company that (dwelleth ?) therein
There may be (brought ?) a Healer of souls;
A Healer there may be for souls
Who healeth but taketh no fee".
As I was standing at my place
The boon I had asked was granted me,
Granted me from the mountain-home,
From the home of the great community therein.
I became a healer for souls!
I became a healer for souls

[4] Kana cf. kana ḏ-nišmata, "congregation" or group of souls.

[5] D.C. 3 has parata.

[6] 'qar, aqar, qar = the French chez: i.e. an habitual residence, hence "home" seems an adequate translation.

Who healeth but taketh no fee.
I set forth, came and reached
The gates of Babylon. Of the children of Babylon
There were some who shut their doors on seeing me:
There were those who shut their doors.
And there were those who opened their doors.
Those who shut their doors
Hated life and loved death,
They loved death and hated life
And will be held back in the Abode of Darkness.
Those who opened their doors
Loved Life and hated Death,
They hated Death and loved Life.
They will rise up in purity
And will behold the Place of Light.
Life is extolled, Life is victorious
And victorious is the man who went hence.

[These two prayers, pray them at the dawn of Sunday after "My day what is it amongst days" then recite "Poor am I; from the fruits".]

165 [1])

In the name of the Great Life
Sublime Life be magnified!
Poor am I! From the fruits... [2])
And displaced am I, from far away am I!
A poor one whom the Great Life afflicted [3]),
A displaced (being), for the 'uthras removed me;
They brought me from the Abode of the Good;
Yea! they assigned me a dwelling in the abode of evil ones,
Yea they made me dwell in the abode of evil ones
Which is all full of wickedness.
All full of evil, full of consuming fire.
I willed it not, nor do I desire
To dwell in the futile dwelling,

[1]) M.L. p. 223.

[2]) This makes no sense. I suggest that originally piria was Piriawis, and that it was mn Piriawis atit (I came from P.)

[3]) A play on words; 'niun also means "answered me" : עני means (a) to answer (b) to afflict, oppress.

With my strength and with my vigilance (Perforce and with vigilance?)
Have I dwelt in the futile abode,
By my vigilance and my praise
Have I kept myselt alien from it,
From the world.
I have stood amongst them like a fatherless child,
Like a fatherless child, or like
A fruit tree with none to tend it [1]).
I hear the voice of the Seven,
Who murmur and confer together:
They say, "Whence is this being? (this) stranger,
Whose whose speech is not like our speech?"
I did not listen to their talk
And they were filled with evil rage against me.
The Life, who heard my cry, sent towards me a saviour.
He sent me a gentle 'uthra,
A being equipped and equipping.
He discoursed with me in his pure voice,
Just as 'uthras discourse in the House of Perfection
And he said, "Fear not, poor thing; and do not tremble,
Say not 'I am alone!'
Because of thee, poor one the firmament
Was thus outspanned, the heavens were outspanned thus;
And stars were created therein.
For thy sake, poor one,
This dry land came into being,
The dry land came to pass and became solid
And fell into the water.
On thine account, poor one,
The sun came; for thee was the moon revealed.
On thine account, poor one, did the seven [2]) come.
And those twelve [3]) went hither.
At thy right hand, thou poor one, abideth radiance
And at thy left are beams of light.

[1]) Lit. with no nurseryman.
[2]) The planets.
[3]) The signs of the Zodiac.

Stand firm! Rise in thy brightness [1] (?)
Until thy measure (of years) is complete.
When thy measure is complete,
I myself will come to thee, I will bring thee
Robes of splendour
Which the world, coveteous [2], will entreat;
I will bring to thee wrappings [3],
Good and pure, of the Light
Which is great and boundless.
I will deliver thee from the wicked
And save thee from sinners.
I will set thee in thy škinta
In the Pure Place. I will rescue thee!"
I hear the voice of the Seven
As they mutter and whisper and say
"Blessed is it that the poor one
Hath a father, and the fruit-tree one who tendeth it.
For us there is no father: our fruit-tree hath none to tend it!"
Well is it for him whom the Great Life knoweth
But woe to him whom the Great Life knoweth not!
Well is it for him whom the Great Life knoweth,
Who keepeth himself alien from the world,
From the world of imperfection
In which the planets sit.
On thrones of rebellion do they sit
And perform their deeds with a scourge.
They stir up trouble about gold and silver,
They cast into it (the world) strife,
They stir up trouble cast strife into it.
And they will go into the fire: will seethe,
They will go into fire and will seethe,
The wicked will seethe and their pomp
Will perish and be brought to a stop.
(But) I, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš,
And my offspring and my kinsfolk

(These are five (?) [1] prayers which are fruits of ether (?). The first is the confirmation [2] of your "Devotions". Pray them after the hymns and psalms for the day before the major "Blessed and praised be Life".)

These are the prayers and chants and the offertory [3] of the "Devotions" which I, poor and lowly, a minor amongst brother-priests, have copied. I kiss the shoes on the feet of the pious [4] and (am) as earth on the feet of Naṣoraeans, dust [5] beneath the feet of ganzibras. I am Rabbi Adam-Yuhana son of Sam son of Bihram son of Sa'dan son of Msa'ad known as Kamisia and Riš-Draz by name. I copied for myself so that I might act and be successful therein and that I should have someone on earth to mention my name [1]) and yonder in the mighty and lofty worlds of light.

[1]) Dakar "mentioning", "a mentioner". That is a relative or priest to insert his name when reciting the list of names commemorated at sacraments for the dead.

[2]) A skilled person, a professor, a skilled craftsman.

Hiia son of Baktiar, Kuhilia by name. He copied from the qulasta of R. Ram-Bayan son of R. Sam, son of Mhatam Daudania by name, which was copied by R. Sam-Paiiš son of Baktiar son of Sam, Tutu by name. It was kept in the library (ginza) of R. Adam-Yuhana son of Sam-Daudania and was copied from the qulasta of R. Bihram son of Bihram-Yahia-Šaiar, Tutu by name, who copied for himself from the qulasta of Sam-Bihram son of Bihran-Gadana that was copied by R. Zihrun-Baktiar son of Adam-'qaiam son of Sarwan the Deaf, who copied it from a qulasta he had copied for himself from a qulasta copied by R. Adam-Zihrun son of Yahia-Yuhana son of Bihdad son of Anuš-M'ailia who copied it for himself from a qulasta he copied for himself from the qulasta of R. Bihram-Baian son of Br-Yahia-Baz, whose first pupil (candidate for priesthood) who copied it was the brother of his father Bihram-Baian son of Yahia-Baz who copied from his own qulasta which he copied from the qulasta of Ruzba-Bulbul son of Bihram which Adam-Zihrun copied, the son of Yahia-Yuhana- Bihdad son of Anuš-M'ailia. Adam-Zihrun copied it for his pupil, Adam son of Yahia-Sam-Paiiš: he copied it from the qulasta of Adam-Zihrun son of Yahia-Yuhana-Bihdad son of Anuš-M'ailia. And Adam-Zihrun copied it a second time for himself from the qulasta of his father Yahia-Yuhana-Bihdad son of Anuš-M'ailia, And Yahia-Yuhana-Bihdad copied it for Zihrun-Br-Bihdad which Zakia son of Yuhana copied. He copied it for Sam and Anuš, the sons of Br-Hiia. He copied from the qulasta he had copied for his pupil, Mhatam-Bulbul son of Br-Hiia, from a qulasta which Anuš M'ailia copied — the son of Bihdad-Zakia son of Zihrun. He copied from the manuscript of his father, Anuš-M'ailia son of Anuš-Bihdad who copied it for himself a second time: he copied from the qulasta of Hibil son of Yahia son of Sam-Saiwia from the manuscript of Baian son of Zakia. His mother was Haiuna daughter of Yahia. It was copied from the library which remained with them from the place Ṭib. And Ramuia son of 'Qaimat was its compiler, and Ramuia copied from Šganda and Šganda copied from Zazai-ḏ-Gawazta son of Hawa: the name of his father was Naṭar. And Zazai copied from the Scroll of the First Life.

And Life, rejoice for ever! Life is victorious over all works, and victorious is Manda-d-Hiia and his helpers.

(Translator's note). — At this point prayerbooks used by priests vary in order, and D.C. 3 and D.C. 53 no longer run parallel. Into

D.C. 53 I have inserted the longer form of Commemoration used at every masiqta. It is called the Abahatan Qadmaiia. In the list of commemorations, family names, the names of local priests, friends or relatives are inserted according to the occasion, place, or priests, but the beginning is always the same, and in the Abahatan Qadmaiia the names of heavenly beings, patriarchs, ethnarchs and liturgists are permanently embedded.

This prayer, the major Ṭab ṭaba lṭabia, is not in its full form. in M.L.

I have included here also the six prayers which follow the Abahatan Qadmaiia in D.C. 3.

170 [1]

Good is the Good (one?) [2] for the good, and He set His nature [3] upon those who love His name. We will seek and find, and will speak and be heard. We have sought and found, we spoke and were heard in Thy presence, my Lord Manda-ḏ-Hiia, Lord of Healings. Forgive the sins, trespasses, follies, stumblings and mistakes of him who made (furnished) this bread [4], masiqta and ṭabuta [5]. His sins, trespasses, follies, stumblings and mistakes thou wilt remit for him, my lord Manda-ḏ-Hiia and Great First Life, (those of) the donor [6] of fee and oblation.

For our forefathers there shall be forgiving of sins. For Yušamin son of Dmut-Hiia there shall be forgiveness of sins. For Abatur son of Bihrat there shall be forgiveness of sins. For Habšaba and Kana-d-Zidqa there shall be forgiveness of sins. For the twenty-four 'uthras, sons of light, there shall be forgiveness of sins. For Pthahil son of Zahriel there shall be forgiveness of sins. For Adam son of Qin [7] and Eve his wife there shall be forgiveness of sins. For Šitil son of Adam there shall be forgiveness of sins.

There shall be forgiveness of sins for Ram and Rud [8]. There shall be forgiveness of sins for Šurbai and Šarhabiel [1]. There shall be forgiveness of sins for Šum son of Noah and Nuraita his wife. There shall be forgiveness of sins for Yahia-Yuhana son of 'Nišbai and Qinta and Anhar his wives. There shall be forgiveness of sins for those three hundred and sixty priests who went forth from the district of Jerusalem the city. There shall be forgiveness of sins for the souls of our good fathers and for this my soul, Adam-Zihrun son of Mahnuš, who hath prayed this prayer and devotions. There shall be forgiveness of sins for the soul of my father, Yahia-Bihram son of Hawa-Mamania. There shall be forgiveness of sins for the soul of my mother, Mahnuš daughter of Simat. There shall be forgiveness of sins for the soul of my teacher [2] Bihram son of Mudalal. There shall be forgiveness of sins for his wife, Anhar daughter of Hawa. There shall be forgiveness of sins for the souls of my children Anhar daughter of Anhar. There shall be forgiveness of sins for my brothers (and sisters) Anhar, and Sam, and Mudalal, and Ram; and Muhatam-Yuhana, and Adam-Yuhana, the sons of Mahnuš: forgiveness of sins be there for them. The souls of Mandaeans; Ram son of Šarat-Simat,-forgiveness of sins be there for him; Zihrun son of Simat forgiveness of sins be there for him; Anhar daughter of Simat, forgiveness of sins be there for her; Simat daughter of Hawa, forgiveness sins be there for her; Ram son of Simat, forgiveness of sins be there for him; Yasmin daughter of Yasman, forgiveness of sins be there for her. All the souls of our good fathers, be there forgiveness for them. And for this my soul, mine, Adam-Zihrun son of Mahnuš, be there forgiveness for me. The soul of my teacher, Bihram son of Mudalal, be there forgiveness for him. The souls of priests, Adam-Zihrun son of Mamania, forgiveness of sins be there for him. Yahia-Anuš son of Maliha, forgiveness of sins be there for him. Yahia-Ram-Zihrun son of Hawa-Simat, forgiveness of sins be there for him. Yahia-Zihrun son of Mudalal, forgiveness of sins be there for him. Sam-Bihram son of Mudalal, forgiveness of sins be there for him. All souls of our good forefathers, forgiveness of sins be there for them. And for this my soul, Adam-Zihrun son of Mahnuš who have prayed this prayer and devotions, forgiveness of sins be there for me.[1]) And the soul of my teacher Bihram son of Mudalal, forgiveness of sons be there for him. The souls of ganzibria: Yahia-Yuhana son of Hawa-Simat, forgiveness of sins be there for him; Zihrun son of Simat, forgiveness of sins be there for him; Sam-Bihram son of Simat, forgiveness of sins be there for him; Bihram-Šitil son of Šarat, forgiveness of sins be there for him; Zihrun son of Maliha, forgiveness of sins be there for him; Adam son of Šadia-Maliha forgiveness of sins be there for him; Yahia-Bayan and Yahia-Bihram sons of Hawa-Mamania, forgiveness of sins be there for them; Ram-Yuhana son of Mamania, forgiveness of sins be there for him; Bayan-Zangia son of Anhar-Simat, forgiveness of sins be there for him; Sam-Saiwia son of Šarat, forgiveness of sins be there for him; Bihram son of Madinat, forgiveness of sins be there for him; Yahia son of Anhar-Ziwa, forgiveness of sins be there for him; Ram-Sindan and Šaria, forgiveness of sins be there for them; Hawa daughter of Daia, forgiveness of sins be there for her; Anhar-Kumraita daughter of Simat, forgiveness of sins be there for her; Yahia-Ramuia son of Ramuia, forgiveness of sins be there for him; Sam-Bihram son of Mudalal, forgiveness of sins be there for him; Adam son of Bihram (Bihrat?)-Dihgan, forgiveness of sins be there for him; Adam-Br-hiia son of Simat, forgiveness of sins of there for him; Brik-Yawar son of Buran, forgiveness of sins be there for him; Bihram Bisḥaq son of Hawa, forgiveness of sins be there for him; Šabur son of Dukt, forgiveness of sins be there for him; Mhatam and Šitil, sons of Haiuna, forgiveness of sins be there for them; Anuš son of Mihria-Zad, forgiveness of sins be there for him; Šaiar-Ziwa and Šabur son (sons?) of Kaizar'il, forgiveness of sins be there for him (them?); Bhira son of Kujasta, forgiveness of sins be there for him; Zakia son of Hawa, forgiveness of sins be there for him; Ardaban-Malka-Baktiar son of Simat, forgiveness of sins be there for him.

(Note. — 171 is taken from D.C. 3: in D.C. 53 it begins as No. 257, p. 287 of the Mandaic text of D.C. 53.)

In the Name of the Life!

Praised be the First Great Radiance and praised the Great First Light! Praised be the Wellspring and the great first Palm-Tree[4]) Praised be the mystic Tan(n)a[5]) which dwelleth in the great mystic First Wellspring. Praised be the great Šišlam[6]) who sitteth on the bank of the Wellspring and Palm-tree; praised is the great 'zlat[7]) Praised is the great Yawar who was formed from the loins of Radiance: praised is Simat-Hiia (Treasure-of-Life), Mother of all kings, because from them (both) all worlds proceeded — for she was appointed as the result of secret mysteries.

[1]) In most versions.

[2]) In some conclusions to this prayer daria is inserted here.

[3]) Or, lit. "the living stand in their *škinta*s (dwellings?)".

[4]) I.e., the two first creative forces, one male, the other female (See p. 14, ns. 5 and 6).

[5]) Tan(n)a. See p. 9, n. 1.

[6]) See p. 105, n. 2: 'zlat is Šišlam's bride and the archetype of wifehood.

[7]) See n. 6.

Praised is that first great Jordan [1]: praised are those three hundred and sixty jordans which proceeded from that first great Jordan. Praised is that great mystic first Škinta and praised are the three hundred and sixty *škinta*s [2] which proceeded from that first great mystic Škinta.

Yawar-Ziwa, the vigilant 'uthra, divulged, revealed and said, "Upon every Naṣoraean man who standeth at his devotions and prayeth this prayer and offereth up this (prayer of) dedication [3] the glory of the Life will come and will rest on him, and he shall have strength and increase like Anuš-'Uthra. Upon any Mandaean man who standeth at his devotions and prayeth this prayer and raiseth this dedicatory prayer the attention of the Life will descend, will rest on him and he will have strength and greatness like a priest. And he shall say "Thou art established First Life" and dedicate [4] (his crown) sixty-one times and make (this) petition [5]: (and say)

Ye are blessed, praised and magnified, revered and established with high honour which is great and boundless, O Life, and my Lord Manda-ḏ-Hiia and the great First Life, the Second Life and the Third Life; Yufin and Yufafin; Sam-Mana Smira; and the Vine which is all Life and the great Tree which is all healings. (O) Compassionate One, Forgiving One, Clement One, Pitiful One, Deliverer and Saviour, O Looser of the bound, loosen him (me) from and forgive his (my) sins, trespasses, follies, stumblings and blunders, mine, Adam-Zihrun son of Mahnuš, who have prayed this prayer and "devotions". Be there forgiveness of sins for me! O Sunday, the lauded, pure guardian of Light, (O) Ayar-Nhura, pure saviour who art all piety, who art invisible and unbounded! be my answerer and answer me: be my supporter and support me, be my Raiser-up and raise my soul, mine, Adam-Zihrun son of Mahnuš who have prayed this prayer and "devotions". Be there forgiveness of sins for me!

[1] The Great First Jordan is the River of Life, Water of Life. A jordan is running water generally, but in particular a pool of running water used in the cult-hut garden for baptism.

[2] Qaiamta; a name given to a prayer of dedication.

[3] Ṣauta can also mean "heed" or "company", "fellowship".

[4] See p. 28, n. 3.

[5] This prayer is called the Šal Šulta (pron. Šāl Šūltẖa).

O Habšaba (Sunday)! deliver me from hell-beasts [1] and from purgatory-demons [2] and from water-penalties [3], and from pots that seethe, from fire and ice, from the snare of the planets, from the plots of the planets, from the slaying of the planets and from the seven hell-beasts [4], the chief Levier of dues [5] and the children of darkness. Great Bihram! baptise me in thy sublime jordan and deliver me in purity to the Place of Light. Stretch forth thy right hand of holy truth [6] to clasp that of this my individual soul, mine, Adam-Zihrun son of Mahnuš, who have prayed this prayer and (offered up) these devotions. Be there forgiving of sins for me.

O Abathur-Rama, O Abathur-Muzania [7]! Weigh me in thy balance, build me into thy building and count me in thy reckoning! Mahziel, Great First Word, which assured me sight in mine eyes, pour wisdom into my heart! Open the eyes of my understanding!

Haiašum, healer; [8] Kušṭa, and Yusmir healer of the mana and its counterpart, heal me (preserve me) from pains, from blemishes from hateful [9] curses, from a sickly body and from an oozing body.

O Yawar-Rba, Yur-Rba [10], Treasurer, king of worlds of light, free me, rid me of my sin, my trespasses, my follies, my stumblings and my mistakes, mine, Adam Zihrun son of Mahnuš who have prayed this prayer and devotions. Be there forgiveness of sins for me, and for my father and mother, and for my teacher [11], for my wife and children, for my priests and for all souls who stood for the Name of Life and were firm in the sign of Manda-ḏ-Hiia with a sincere and believing heart.

Yea, Life, verily Life [12] Life will be with the victorious.

[12] D.C. 53 (see Prayer 258) makes this a separate prayer. Both in this and in D.C. 24 'in hiia u'iin hiia. (Hiia is both "living" and "life").

They (Life) will not condemn those who love Their name: they will be joined in holy union. Life for those who know, Life for those who believe, Life for beings who instruct us[1]. Life is established in its dwellings: Life is victorious over all works.

172 [2]

Now (we beseech Thee), Life, (bestow) Thy pity, Thy clemency, Thine attention, Thy compassion, Thine, Great First Life! Show pity, be clement, be attentive to and show compassion on this, my soul, mine, Adam-Zihrun son of Mahnuš who have prayed this prayer and (these) devotions. May there be forgiveness of sins for me. (Three times) [3]. For me and for my father and my mother, for my teacher and for my wife and my offspring, and for my priest and for whomsoever hath offered this bread and ritual foods. And for you, my fathers, my teachers, and my instructors and those who taught me the faith when ye supported me from the Left to the Right, may there be forgiving of sins for you. And ye shall say "Life is established in its dwellings".

And Life is victorious over all works.

173 [The Šumhata] [4]

The name of the Life and the name of Manda-ḏ-Hiia be pronounced upon thee! The name of the great mystic Wellspring is pronounced upon thee. The name of the great mystic First Palmtree is pronounced upon thee. The name of the great Šišlam is pronounced upon thee. The name of the great 'zlat is pronounced upon thee. The name of the great Yawar is pronounced upon thee. The name of Simat-Hiia is pronounced upon thee. The name of the great Yukabar is pronounced upon thee. The name of the Mana and his counterpart is pronounced upon thee. The name of the great Mystery, the mystic Word, is pronounced upon thee. The name of Shaq-Ziwa the great, the first, is pronounced upon thee.

The name of Sam, the pure, first-produced, beloved and first radiance, is pronounced upon thee. The name of the Life and the name of Manda-ḏ-Hiia is pronounced upon thee, Adam-Zihrun son of Mahnuš. May illness, malady, accidents, curses, vows and forfeitures [1]), pains, infirmities, violent fevers, the evil eye and the dimmed eye be loosed and removed from thee. They shall depart (rise) to the mountains and heights from thy body, spirit and soul, thy trunk and thy stature and (from) thine entire frame, thine, Adam-Zihrun son of Mahnuš, through the strength of my Father, their Father, Manda-ḏ-Hiia, through the strength of the treasure of the First Life and through the strength of Yawar-Ziwa and Simat-Hiia. And the name of Life and the name of Manda-ḏ-Hiia be pronounced upon thee.

I beseech the Life and my Lord Manda-ḏ-Hiia and the 'uthras and kings of the worlds of the light for a sponsor for this high mystery (ginza) so that no lacking or deficiency may appear therein. Should there be anything missing or deficient, do thou, O Hibil-Ziwa, (thou) great Fulfiller, supplement it from thy treasure which is not deficient and from thy plenty which lacketh in nothing. Rid it and loose it from its sins, trespasses, follies, stumblings and mistakes, (and) mine, Adam-Zihrun son of Mahnuš who have prayed this prayer and (these) devotions. May there be forgiving of sins for me.

O Sunday, receive it, save it, establish it and raise it up to perfection!

175

In the name of the Great Life.

Then, when she reacheth the Seven Mysteries, servitors of the Seven go forth towards her. They come and surround her and question her and say to her, "O soul, whence comest thou and whither goest thou?"

I say to them, "I come from the Body[2]), the name of which is the Earth and I am going towards the Good Consummation [3])".

They say to me, "Whose servant art thou and whose envoy art thou called?"

I say to them, "I am the servitor of the Beloved Consummation, and the envoy of the vast Ether".

[2]) The cosmic Body of Adam Kasia.

[3]) Kimṣa (see p. 119, n. 2.) here has certainly the meaning of final consummation.

Then they bless her (me) 1) and praise her and guard her and say to her, "Everyone who knoweth this saying will rise towards the Good Goal 2)" because they seek to grasp the mysteries of the Body. And they question her and then she riseth towards the Good Goal.

176

O King of all kings, O Father of all 'uthras; O Adatan and Yadatan; O Šilmay and Nedvay, ye guardian 'uthras of the jordan; O Hibil-Ziwa, great Fulfiller who deliverest us from evil plots and deliverest us from all that is evil and ugly, O high King of Light, thou wilt give me comeliness of body, compassion of heart, fullness of hand and integrity of eye. O Life, and my Lord Manda-ḏ-Hiia Thou deliverest me savest me and guardest me. O high King of Light!

177 3)

In the Name of the Great Life.
Vines shone in the water
And in the jordan mighty they grew.
Ye are flourishing offshoots.
Messengers hither I bring you,
I give you great 'uthras.

I have twined for you and bring you
Garlands of myrtle and marjoram
For (lit. "in") the doors of the houses.

1) The poem veers constantly from the 1st to the 3rd person.

2) Kimṣa. (?) See p. 158 n. 3.

3) This prayer exists in several versions and appears to be very corrupt. Its use may elucidate the original meaning. It is recited when, at the Little New Year's Feast, priests hang wreaths of myrtle and willow on the door of every house. I venture on a reconstruction of the hymn as follows: —

(From the fourth line)

[Messengers (not a messenger) I bring you.]
Šgandia lhaka aitilkun yahbinalkun l'utria sagiia
Gadlilkun umatnalkun bbabia d-hilbunia
Klilia d-asa umarwa (see note on this line)

Alma lkimṣat almia brikinun
Yardna sagia brikinhun masbuta ḏ-labaṭla
Mn riš briš. (cont. next page).

I will rear up for you babes
And bring (them) to you.
We bless you unto world's end :
The full river (yardna)[1]) hath blessed you
And the baptism which is unfailing
From beginning to end.

178

Kušṭa strengthen thee [2]), my crown,
Kušṭa strengthen thee, my teacher,
Kušṭa strengthen thee, my turban,
Kušṭa strengthen thee, guardian of my turban,
Kušṭa strengthen thee, Great First Radiance,
Kušṭa strengthen thee, Great First Light,
Kušṭa strengthen you, my brother-priests,
Kušṭa strengthen You, Life, my Parents [3]),
Kušṭa strengthen thee, my treasure,
Kušṭa strengthen thee, Guardian of my treasure!
We kiss thee with a pure mouth. (Sixty-one times)
In an inner vessel they concealed thee [4]).
The Wellspring of living waters hath blessed thee,
And the Naṣirutha which emanated therefrom
Will be thine assuagement, it will be thy portion.
And treasure will arise to its owner.
And Thou, Life, wilt be victorious for ever and ever!
And Life is victorious [5]).

(cont.) I suggest that the proximity of marua to yanqia led scribes to confuse marba ḏ-mrabia yanqia, D.A., p. 11, with the present line, especially as marba is pronounced marua. However, the verse is said at the New Year, when priests visit houses and distribute wreaths which are hung on doors of houses. My translation is free, based on this supposition.

[1]) The rains fill the river at New Year.

[2]) ASA in the sense of curing that which is sick, is unsuitable to the Mandaic form of greeting kušṭa asiak, especially as addressed to divine beings when "give thee thy full power" is implied by asiak.

[3]) The cosmic parents, the Father and Mother.

[4]) The taga (a silk fillet) is kept in a box.

My Lord be praised!
Kušṭa strengthen thee!
In the name of the Great Life
Sublime Light be glorified!

A. Come, Kušṭa, in kindness,
Light which goeth to the house of its friends.
B. Chosen art thou, pure one,
For thou establishest thy people in innocency.
G. Thou art a perfected selected gem [1]
Without flaw.
D. Thou art the Road of the perfect,
The path which leadeth up to the Place of Light.
H. Life art Thou, from eternity,
Who didst go and didst dwell in my true heart.
U. Woe to him who neither obeyeth nor listeneth to Thee, my Lord!
Whose path [2] lieth in courts of gross revelry.
Z. Thou art the armour of the perfect,
Truth without deviation.
Ḫ. Thou art wise and well-pleasing, my Lord,
For Thou teachest wisdom and faith [3] to all who love Thy name.
Ṭ. Well is it for him who heedeth and heareth Thee [4], my Lord,
And walketh his road following Thee.
Y. Thou art a day of gladness
In which there is no mourning or lamentation.
K. Thou art a Wreath of Purities (or "victories")
That is set on the heads of the enlightened.
L. Thou art a Tongue of Praise,

---

[1] Gimra, see p. 11, n. 9.

[2] D.C. 3 and D.C. 38 (p. 9, l. 5) both have šabilḫ. D.C. 53 like G.R. has šbila "path".

[3] In G.R. "wisdom and praise". D.C. 38 agrees with D.C. 53.

[4] Masculine in D.C. 53 and D.C. 38; feminine in G.R.

For every day thou praisest the Life.
M. Thou art the First Mana (Primal Mind),
Which Life constructed and built up.
N. Thou art the Light of Powerful (Life)
For thou didst go, and didst come to the world.
S. Thou art the Medicine that cureth pains,
The Healer who cureth all who love His name,
ʿ Thou art the Eye of the chosen righteous,
Which looketh daily toward the Life.
P. Thou art a Fruit of pleasant taste,
Which hath no blemish in it.
Ṣ. Thou art the First Consort [1])
An Espousal [2]) that none preceded
Q. Thou art the First Cry:
The Life evoked Thee from its Nature.
R. Thou art the Teacher of head-priests,
And Thy glory resteth upon them.
S. The dead heard Thee and lived,
The sick heard Thee and were healed.
T. Thou turnest (to Truth) the elect righteous,
Men who have laid hold of and believed in Wisdom,
Good men, proven and perfect;
Truth dwelt in their hearts.
Life is renowned, (and) victorious.
And victorious the man who goeth hence.

In the Name of the Great Life!
'Uthras assembled and Dwellings [4]) came together
And they set up a throne for Yawar, King of 'uthras,
They set up for Yawar, King of 'uthras, a throne,
And placed on his head fresh wreaths.
And his light shone forth over 'uthras and dwellings.

[1]) Or "association". The reference here is undoubtedly to the Father-Mother union at creation.

[2]) Niṣubta here is better translated thus. It is used poetically for "marriage" or "bride". See p. 135, n. 2.

[3]) M.L. p. 232. These prayers describe the investiture of Manda-ḏ-Hiia and are read for the investiture of a new priest and also for the bridegroom. See Š.ḏ-Q. p. 45, n. 1.

[4]) Škinata: probably the cult-huts, personified.

The 'uthras and dwellings that beheld the radiance of Yawar, king of 'uthras,
All flocked towards him, they all flocked towards him,
And laid their pure right hands on him and blessed him
With the great blessing wherewith Yawar-Ziwa the king
Was blessed in his dwelling (škinta)
And Life is victorious.

181

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that they clad Manda-ḏ-Hiia in his vestment,
His radiance shone forth over worlds of light.
His brilliance shone forth on worlds of light,
And the worlds of light that beheld his radiance
All gathered to him, all flocked toward him,
And opened their mouths and blessed Manda-ḏ-Hiia,
Saying to him, "Blessed is thy radiance
That shineth over the waters!
How bright is thy radiance!
Thine appearance giveth out light and becometh not dim!"
(Give him to drink) [1])

182

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that they tied the girdle on Manda-ḏ-Hiia,
His radiance shone forth over 'uthras and Dwellings.
The 'uthras and dwellings that beheld Manda-ḏ-Hiia's radiance
Were all afraid of his radiance,
At his radiance all were in awe,
And all gathered to him, all flocked towards him
And laid their pure right hands upon him
And blessed Manda-ḏ-Hiia, saying to him
"Blessed art thou, our father, Manda-ḏ-Hiia,
And blessed is this girdle wherewith they have girt thee!"
(Give him to drink.)

[1]) The hamra (wine) given to a bridegroom is water into which grapes or raisins (symbolical of female fertility and of the Mother) and dates (symbolical of male fertility and of the Father) have been macerated into freshly drawn water.

183

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that they invested [1] Manda-ḏ-Hiia with the tunic [2]
His radiance shone forth over 'uthras and dwellings.
The 'uthras and dwellings that beheld the radiance of Manda-ḏ-Hiia
All gathered towards him, all flocked towards him,
Laying theiı pure right hands upon him,
Blessing Manda-ḏ-Hiia and saying to him
"Blessed art thou, our father, Manda-ḏ-Hiia,
And blessed is he who hath transferred to thee these vestments
For all the worlds which behold thee
Are awestruck at thy radiance.
(Give him to drink)

184

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that they invested Manda-ḏ-Hiia
With the stole [3], Šamašiel,
Three hundred and sixty wellsprings of radiance sprang forth therein,
Three hundred and sixty wellsprings of radiance sprang forth.
And the radiance of the wellsprings was visible at the jordans.
And the (radiance of the?) jordans and the radiance of the wellsprings is bright
And illumineth all the worlds of light.
(Give him to drink)

185

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that they set the crown on Manda-ḏ-Hiia
His radiance shone forth upon the Houses [4],
Upon the Houses his radiance shone forth.
And He (that is) King of 'uthras, on beholding
The radiance of Manda-ḏ-Hiia's crown,

[1] Lit. "planted", "transferred" = "conferred on".

[2] The long tunic worn by a Mandaean (whether priest or layman) is called the ksuia or the sadra.

[3] A long strip of white cloth used sling-wise by the priest whilst baptising to secure the staff which he plants in the river-bed, from falling or floating away. This frees his hands. See MMII, p. 31 ff.

[4] Hilbunia = "eggs" (a bita is an egg, and bit "a house"). See p. 121, note 4.

Leapt up from his throne; he arose,
From his throne he leapt up, stood up,
And the three hundred and sixty thousand 'uthras
With the King, stood and, laying their pure right hands
Upon him, they bless Manda-ḏ-Hiia, and say to him
"Blessed art thou, our father, Manda-ḏ-Hiia,
And blessed this crown which they have set on thee.
All worlds thereby shine from end to end.
(Give him to drink)

186

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that they invested Manda-ḏ-Hiia with the šarwala [1]) Nṣab,
His radiance shone forth over the Houses,
Over the Houses his radiance shone forth.
His radiance shone forth over the Houses.
And the niṭufiata [2]) (heavenly spouses) who beheld Manda-ḏ-Hiia's radiancy
Say to one another: "Whence cometh this radiance that shineth upon us?"
And a Youth standing in their presence said to them,
"This is radiance emitted by Manda-ḏ-Hiia's šarwala, Nṣab".
And all the heavenly women [2]) standing on the roofs,
Bless him and say to him, "Blessed art thou, our father,
Manda-ḏ-Hiia! and blessed be he
Who invested thee with these vestments!
This their radiance is surpassing!"
(Give him to drink)

187

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that they invested Manda-ḏ-Hiia with the staff (margna),
Its radiance shone forth on the jordan.
The jordan that beheld the radiance of Manda-ḏ-Hiia's staff
Leapt and rejoiced in the radiance of Manda-ḏ-Hiia

---

[1]) The ritual leggings, part of the rasta or ritual dress.
[2]) Lit. "Drops", see p. 37 notes 1 and 4.

And said to him, "How abundant is thy jordan!
The fruits and grapes and trees that are by it
Will be established.
Great is thy glory, and thy Root shall be preserved
From beginning to end".
(Give him to drink)

[Read these prayers for the staff and the crown both for a priest who celebrates a masiqta (for the first time) and for a bridal pair and chant these hymns.]

188

In the name of the Great Life!
I twined a wreath of myrtle and marjoram
And set it on the head of Yawar, king of 'uthras
And said to him, "Rejoice, Yawar, rejoice in thy living wreath, Rejoice, Yawar, rejoice in the Spouse [1])
Of brightness who hath been bestowed on thee.
Rejoice, Yawar, rejoice
At the kingdom [2]) that is bestowed upon thee.
Rejoice, Yawar, rejoice in the jordans
That they made flow for thee.
Rejoice, Yawar, rejoice in Šahrat [3]),
The Cloud of radiance who is bestowed on thee.
That floateth and floweth onward in thy jordan
From its source to its end [4]).

189

In the name of the Great Life!
Who, amongst the 'uthras, was it,
That placed the Wreath of the Great (Life)
Upon his head?
The Tannas [5]) and the Niṭufiata [6]) embrace one another
In the shade of the Wreath.
In the shade of the Wreath they embrace one another

---

[1]) Lit. "cloud" see p. 37, n. 4. The wreath is the "consort" or spouse of the taga, "crown".

[2]) Malkuta. Or, better perhaps, "kingliness", i.e. status of kingship.

[3]) So in all my mss. M.L. has Šarhat.

[4]) See Š-ḏ-Q. p. 47, n. 3.

[5]) Tannas (tania), see p.9, n. 1. and p. 12, n.6.

[6]) Niṭufiata, "Drops", see p. 37, n. 1.

And they lay their pure right hands upon him
And bless him with the mighty benediction
Wherewith Yawar was blessed
In the Place of Light.

190

Our father, they made thee chief in Tarwan
And gave thee authority (lit. "word "or" speech") in the place of Light
Yawar set a crown upon thee
In the radiance whereof 'uthras shine,
'Uthras shine in its radiance
And the planets are in fear of it.

191

On thee, our father, they have conferred a pure sovereignty
And a command which the Great (Life) hath entrusted to thee.
They have given thee a banner of radiance,
By which all the worlds of light are illumined.
They have given thee a staff of living water,
A rod by which all rebels shall be laid low.

192

Who hath sent thee, new king,
Cause [1]) of all these rites?
Thou hast illumined the world of Ether
And brightened the whole earth from end to end.

[193 [2])

Who sent thee, new king
That sitteth in the saka [3]) of his teacher?
Thou hast watered it with a great watering (?) [4])

[1]) Lit. "that from thee all these doings take place".

[2]) The scribe of D.C. 53 has omitted No. 193, but, a repetition of these hymns includes it as No. 308. It is inserted here in its proper place.

[3]) Saka is translated Bereiche by Lidzbarski, p. 242, l. 10 of the translation. Rbiẖ (quite plainly in the mss.) refers to the teacher. The word probably means that the novice is still under the tutelage of the priest who has initiated him. In Š.ḏ-Q. I translated "booth", but saka is philologically unlikely to be the sukkah.

[4]) Af. MSA (see Af. ܡܣܡܣ). Or (equally) "hast consolidated it by a great solidification". The former meaning seems the likelier.

And thou hast illumined and ordered
The 'uthras in their dwellings (škinata)
From end to end.]

194

Our father, Šihlun-Ziwa, rejoiceth in his crown
And the Mighty (Life) rejoiceth in His Word.
The Dwellings of the Mighty (Life) rejoice and are glad
With King Yawar-Ziwa who hath planted thee [1]) (here).

195

Our father, They will guard thy wreath for thee,
And the fellowship of the Great Life will rest upon thee.
Thine eyes [2]) shall enlighten thee, good one,
For as chief of the communion of Life [3])
Thou camest hither.

196

Our father, thy wreath is from the Vine Ruaz,
And the being who twined it is from the Place of Light.
Our father, the perfume of thy wreath is pleasing,
Like (the fragrance of?) the great Anuš-'Uthra in his Dwelling.

197

Planter of Plants, plant it (or "him") [4])
Twiner of wreaths, twine it [5])
Establisher [6]) of purities, establish
The bridegroom [7]) N. and make him prosperous.

198

I am small amongst 'uthras,
And a babe amongst Rays-of-Light;
Yet I grow great and my soul waxeth great,
For I have drunk water from the mouth of the Euphrates

---

[1]) Nṣablak in most mss: M.L. nṣablun.

[2]) Ainak.

[3]) The exact meaning of this phrase is doubtful. The prayer is also intended for the bridegroom, hence the translation I gave in Š. ḏ-Q "Because thou comest hither for the chief function of life-union", is too free a rendering.

[4]) Either the plant for the wreath, or the new priest or bridegroom; possibly both are included.

[5]) If the priest is meant — "make him great".

[6]) Read mtaqnanin.

[7]) If a priest, "the priest N."?

199

May pure guardians guard thee,
May thy root be raised up and flourish exceedingly,
And thy doings be made prosperous.
And mayst thou rise up and behold the great Place
The House of Perfection.
And Life is victorious.

[These (antiphonal) hymns are to be recited over a priest who celebrates (for the first time) a masiqta, and over bridal pairs(?) These are prayers for the vestments and clothing (investiture) which I have copied who am poor, lowly and striving, small amongst my brother-ganzivri and priests, kissing the shoes on the feet of Naṣoraeans. I endure the world's persecution with a faithful and believing heart. I copied for myself so that there might be a commemoration for me on earth, and yonder in the mighty and lofty worlds of light. A slave, am I, who is all sin. I am Rabbi Adam-Yuhana son of Sam son of Bihram son of Sa'dan son of Msa'ad known as Kamisia, Riš-Draz by name. I copied for myself so that I might work and succeed, I copied from the qulasta of the skilled craftsman Baktiar grandson of the skilled craftsman ʿAziz son of Kiria son of ʿAziz son of Faruk of the sons of the Dihdaria, Sabur by name. It had been copied by the great, lofty and honourable R. Ram-Yuhana son of R. Yahia-Zihrun son of R. Zihrun son of R. Adam known as Manduia, (family) name 'Kuma. He had copied it from a qulasta which R. Ram-Yuhana had also copied for himself — the son of R. Yahia-Zihrun son of R. Zihrun son of R. Adam, name 'Kuma. He had copied it for a "perfect" [1] craftsman Hadaiat son of craftsman Qasim son of Hadat son of Bihram son of Zakria of the children of the Dihdaria, Sabur by name. He copied from the qulasta of the great, lofty and honourable ganzibra, a reliable and tested (priest), a paragon in "treasure", and a high-(minded) and liberal dispenser (or "copyist") of his Naṣirutha (priestly wisdom), namely, R. Sam-Yuhana son of R. Yahia-Adam son of Bihram-Zihrun son of Adam-Yuhana son of Zid son of Sam son of Bihram son of R. Adam, 'Asikir by name. He copied for himself from a qulasta which was (also) copied for himself by R. Sam-Yuhana son of R. Yahia-Adam son of Bihram-Zihrun son of Adam-Yuhana son of Zid son of Sam son of Bihram son of R. Adam son of R. Mhatam son of R. Baktiar son of R. Yihia 'Asikir by name; who copied from the qulasta of R. Yahia-Yuhana son of R. Ram son of Yahia-Baktiar son of Adam-Mhatam son of R. Bihram-Br-Hiia, Kuhilia by name. He copied from the qulasta of his father, (who was also) his teacher (i.e. initiated him into the priesthood) and put the crown on his head (made him a priest), R. Ram son of Yahia-Baktiar son of R. Adam-Mhatam son of R. Bihram-Br-Hiia, Kuhilia by name. He copied for himself from the qulasta of his teacher and also copied it for the great, lofty, and respected, the reliable and tested ganzibra, R. Yahia-Mhatam son of the father of ganzibras R. Sam-Adam son of Zakia son of Ram son of Yahia son of Adam, known as Manduia, 'Kuma by name. He had copied from a qulasta which his brother had copied for himself, R. Sam-Yuhana son of R. Sam-Adam son of Zakia son of Ram son of Yihiia son of Adam, known as Manduia, 'kuma by name. That he copied from the qulasta of R. Yuhana son of Sam son of Adam son of Zakia son of Zihrun son of Adam-Šitlan son of Yahia-Anuš son of R. Baian 'Asikir by name, which was copied by the great, lofty and respected R. Mhatam-Zihrun son of Br-Hiia son of R. Baktiar son of R. Adam-Bihram son of R. Yahia, Kuhilia by name — may Manda-ḏ-Hiia forgive him his sins! — from the qulasta of R. Ram-Bayan son of Sam-Daudania which had been copied by R. Paiiš son of Baktiar son of Sam son of Zihrun son of Adam, Furayih by name, from the qulasta which was copied for himself by R. Yihiia-Šaiar, Tutu by name. He had copied from the qulasta that had been copied by Zihrun-Baktiar son of Adam the Deaf, who had copied it for his pupil Sam-Bihdad son of Bihram-Gadana. That was copied by Bahran son of Adam-Zihrun son of M'ailia, from his own qulasta which was copied from the qulasta of Yahia-Baktiar son of Yahia-Baz, copied by his nephew, he was his teacher — R. Adam son of Zihrun son of Yahia-Baz. And Adam copied from his own qulasta copied from the qulasta of R. Adam-Abulfaraz son of Bihram-Šitil-Barubai, which Adam-Zihrun copied a second time. His father copied it, Yahia-Yuhana-Bihdad son of Anuš-Mu'ailia, who copied it for Sam-Zakia and Anuš, sons of Br-Hiia, who copied it for Yahia-Zihrun son of Anuš who copied it for his pupil who copied it for for Bihram-Zakia son of Zihrun-Sakara, from the qulasta of Anuš-Mu'ailia son of Anuš-Bihdad who copied it for himself a second time from the manuscript of Bayan son of Zakia and his mother was Haiuna daughter of Yahia, which they copied from the library that was placed with them, from Ṭib, the town. And Ramuia son of 'Qaimat was its compiler in it (that city). Ramuia copied from Šganda son of Yasmin and Šganda copied from Zazai-ḏ-Gawazta son of Hawa. His father was Naṭar. And Zazai copied from the scroll of the First Life. And Life is victorious, and victorious are Hibil-Ziwa and his helpers, Hibil, Šitil, and Anuš. Finis.]

[In the name of the great First Strange (Not-of-this-world) Life, from worlds of light, the Ineffable [1] who is above all works, be there health, purity, strength, soundness, speech and a hearing, joy of heart and forgiving of sins for me, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš. In the name of the Great Life
Sublime Light be glorified!
(Lo) the Voice of Life from the fruits
And the voice of radiant-light from afar;
The voice of 'uthras from the Land of Light
Who speak in their sublime voices and say,
"Whence came we into being? By whom was implanted
Our power of reproduction? [2] Why was it implanted,
Our reproductive power? Our form, what doth it resemble?
Whence springeth our strength, that lofty strength
To which all the worlds cannot attain?
Whence came our voice, a pure voice
That is other(-worldly [3]), clear [4] and dignified [5] ?

---

[1] Yatiria could refer either to the worlds (almia) or to the Great Life (hiia rbia). It is difficult to decide to which the adjective belongs. See p. 1, n. 1.

[2] See p. 135 n. 2 and P.S. Supp. under ܢܨܒܬܐ. Here the question concerns the urge to reproduce, the vivifying principle, especially in reference to sex. This is a marriage hymn.

[3] Šanai = "other", "strange", "changed" etc.

[4] Baiar "luminous", "shining", "clear.

[5] Mitraurab (Palpel and Ethpauel of RAB) "magnified", glorified", "magnificent" etc.

Our praise is praise of the Great (Life),
And our form is in the likeness of the Place of Light.
Whence cometh our strength, lofty strength
To which all the worlds cannot attain?
Our voice is the pure Voice by which the bridegroom is summoned
Into the škinta [1]) in which 'uthras [2]) are sitting,
And he is instructed.
The king of 'uthras [3]) came,
He set off and came, the king of 'uthras
To the škinta in which the 'uthras sit.
He said to them "About what have ye been instructed,
(O) 'uthras?"
"About the Mana that is within the Occult,
About the Mana that came into being in the Hidden,
And about the Radiance that gloweth
In a hidden place".

201

O hang up [3]) light, let lamps of glory be hung up therein!
"Whose is this brightness? From whom cometh this light?
From whom doth this effulgence
That is vast and boundless emanate?"
"This is the radiance of Hibil,
This is the light of Šitil,
This is the effulgence of the great 'uthra Anuš,
Which is great and boundless."

202

The radiance of Hibil is beauteous,
The light of Šitil is bright.
And this is the effulgence of the great 'uthra Anuš
That is great and boundless".
O hang up light!
Let lamps of glory be hung therein!
O hang up light,
Let lanterns of light be hung therein!

---

[1]) The reference is to the heavenly cult-hut (or wedding-booth in which the priests and bridegroom sit for the ceremony).

[2]) I.e. the priests, who represent the 'uthras.

[3]) Talai Imperative, feminine: A female attendant is addressed.

203

"This building [1]), whose is it?
Whose is it, this building?
This building, whose is it,
That hath so sweet a fragrance,
Whose fragrance is so sweet
And in which fair trees are set?"
"This is Yawar's building,
This is the building of Yawar,
This is Yawar's building,
This, whose fragrance is sweet,
This, so sweet of odour.
And wherein fair trees are set".
Enjoy the perfume of the trees,
For the fragrance of Yawar hath rested upon them.
Enjoy the fragrance of the trees,
For the fragrance of Manda-d-Hiia hath rested on them."
O hang up light.
Let lamps of brightness be hung therein
O hang up light,
Let lanterns of light be hung therein.

204

They sent Hibil-Ziwa to make report [2])
Unto the 'uthras who sit there.
And he said unto them,
"From the Radiance proceeded Light,
And from Light proceeded Ether:
Ether proceeded from Light,
And glory [3]) is manifest to the 'uthras
Who are sitting here".
"Sweet is thy voice, youth Hibil,
When thou speakest in the garden of Adam

---

[1]) The 'ndruna or škinta in which the priests who perform a marriage sit is a light booth built of reeds and intertwined with myrtle and roses, so that it has a pleasant perfume.

[2]) This is a reference to the marriage ceremony. Here Hibil-Ziwa is the prototype of the priest sent to report that the bride is properly attired etc. to report that the bride is properly attired etc. (See Š. ḏ-Q.)

[3]) Or "companionship", "fellowship". Lidzbarski translates Glanz.

And chantest sublime hymns.
Sweet is thy voice! and its sound went thither".
And Life is victorious.

205 ¹)

When the Proven One, the Pure One, went
To the Place where perfected (beings) ²) dwell
— Great is he, the Good (Spirit)! —
Towards his Father ³) was his course set,
His course was set towards his Father,
To say to Him that which was sublime and ineffable
In the Occult Place.
"If it please Thee, Great (Life),
If it please Thee, Mighty (Life),
If it please Thee, Great (Life),
A Home of splendour ⁴) (and) glory ⁵)
Shall be founded therein,
Glory will be enshrined therein,
And 'uthras will seek one another in prayer,
'Uthras will pray to one another,
Each one will glorify his his brother,
His brother each one will glorify,
By counsel which goeth thither from thee".
"Thou art empowered, great Spirit!
Go, shed glory there,
Go, shed glory there: let them be glorified
With the glory that is Ours and thine.
They shall be glorified with that glory,
And receive the blessing that we have sent them.
The blessing we have sent them they shall receive,
They will grasp Thy benefaction,
It shall be so that 'uthras may know
That thou art the greatest of all the 'uthras;

¹) Lidzbarski omits this prayer till the lines Šaliṭit anat rba ʿzil (see M.L. 249 : 1).

²) So literally. In Š. ḍ.-Q. 4. : 4. I took tušlimia, a plural, to be an epithet for the Great Life (also a plural). Several passages in this group of prayers confirm my original idea, that the Great Life is meant.

³) Plural, because he is speaking to the Great Life.

⁴) See op. cit. p. 54, n. 1.

⁵) Or "honour".

For thou hast opened up and shown to them
And bestowed on them radiance and praise".
"I went thither, thither went I,
And shed upon them a blessing.
The blessing that I shed upon them
They receive, and in their blessing
We bless Thee [1]: We bless Thee with
A benediction, with theirs,
They will glorify Thy praise,
(And) will be glorified by Thy praise.
By Thy Word they will be raised up,
They will be raised up by Thy Word,
And from (that which is) Thine
They will not depart".
Priests bless the great (spirit) in secret
And bless the great (spirit) who honoured them
And honour dwelt upon them.
And Life is victorious [2].

May there come One from Thy radiance before me
And One from Thy light behind me!

In the name of the Great Life
Sublime Light be magnified!
A Vehicle [3] am I, a small one,
Light rested on my thought.
I travel on, I go on,
I and the life's traveller whom they bound to me.
I spoke to her, to life's travelling-companion
Whom they joined to me, saying,

---

[1] The 2nd. person plural indicates the Great Life.

[2] Only the latter a part of this poem is in M.L. p. 249, l. 1 ff.

[3] The word 'gla is derived from the root 'GL "to roll, עגל hence an 'gla עֲגָלָא is a "roller", "wheeled vehicle". The idea of motion is conveyed. Here, in 'gla, the last meaning is possibly a typical Mandaean pun on one meaning of the mana. It is here, therefore, the mana, rolling onward on its life's journey. (The other possible meaning "calf" is, of course, unlikely).

"I travel1) by my own strength;
(But) thou, in whose strength dost thou journey on?"
She spoke, the life-traveller that is they joined to me
Saying to me, "Just as thou travellest onward
By thine own strength, I (travel) by faith.
Kušṭa (ruleth) my heart 2), my eyes are
The eyes of Radiance.
And my heart hath been tested by chosen ones".
We entered into garments and covered ourselves
And the act of reproduction was brought into being.
The act of reproduction came into existence
And elect ones began and will be established.
Life is renowned (and) victorious
And victorious the man who went thence.

(Earth) the bridegroom's pillow, his vault is the sky.
The bridegroom's robes are of pure .... 4)
The bridegroom's girdle is all of well-springs,
Full of wellsprings of radiance, light and glory.
The bridegroom's tunic is of foaming waters,
The bridegroom's wreath is of a pure kind of vine,
The bridegroom's staff is of camel-thorn tree 5)

1) This prayer is said whilst walking from the marriage booth to the bridal chamber.

2) D.C. 38 lbab like D.C. 53. D.C. 3 lbar.

3) I must stress that my translation of these curious and obscure poems is tentative. When translating D.C. 38 (Š.ḏ-Q.) p. 53) I took the "fellow traveller" to be the dmuta, the prototype, or spiritual counterpart. It seems to me now that the reference is to the bride.

4) In Š.ḏ-Q. (p. 15, l. 10) I assumed that D.C. 3's ruhzan was correct, and therefore suggested that the word was ruhṣan from RHṢ "to wash, perform lustration". D.C. 53, however, like D.C. 38, has quhzan. Arabic قهز qahz or qihz = "a cloth of wool and silk". The context suggests a rough cloth of some kind. It is possible, however, that my first conjecture, based on D.C. 3, was correct.

5) A flowering and highly scented shrub or tree common round the Mediterranean and in the Middle East. Its leaves are shaped like the print of a camel's foot in sand.

And they say "Come, that we may make
A great wedding-feast for the bridegroom
As hath been commanded us by the Great (Life),
To make his appearance bright,
To prosper him from beginning to end
And cause good fortune to rest upon him.
And we will say unto the bridegroom, hymning him,
"Rejoice, Bridegroom, rejoice,
Rejoice in thy living wreath!
Inasmuch as thy wreath is fresh,
Thine appearance shall be bright
And thou shalt be confirmed in the happiness (lit. "glory)
Which the Great Life hath sent thee".

They bring in white flour by the khor (heap)
They enter with sacks of fine meal and (household?) requisites[1],
And finest flour[2]) without measure.
Sheep arrive in flocks, and numberless oxen.
They bring in myrtle by the load,
And trails of jasmine in bunches.
Okes of gold they bring in,
And silver tied up in moneybags;
Precious stones and pearls,
All the handiwork of craftsmen;
Oil and wine, all collected by experts.
All of them — a thousand standing on the ground
And two thousand standing on the roofs.
(And) the thousand thousands of 'uthras
Standing by the bridal-canopy, say,
"Come, let us make a great wedding-feast for the bridegroom,
As hath been commanded us by the Great (Life),
To make his appearance bright,
And to make him prosperous from beginning to end.
To cause good fortune to rest upon him.
And we will hymn the bridegroom, saying to him,
'This radiance, whose is it?
This light, whose is it?

[1] Šilia = requests, desires (things asked for or needed) needs, requisites.
[2] simad: סְמִידָא? Or simat "treasure"?

This effulgence, that is great and boundless,
Whose is it?'
"This radiance is Hibil-Ziwa's, this light is Šitil's;
And this effulgence is of Anuš the great 'uthra,
So great and boundless".
"The radiance of Hibil is beauteous,
And the light of Šitil bright,
And this effulgence of the great 'uthra Anuš,
Is great and boundless".

210

Sun in his majesty bowed down before the bridegroom
And shed some of the rays of light which clothed him
And clad the bridegroom therein and said to him,
"I and my warriors and doughty men,
Will stand and take care of thee
From beginning to end".
Moon, lord of crown and wreath,
Placed his crown and wreath on the bridegroom,
And said to him "Our father, thy wreath is the wreath of 'uthras,
And thine ardour [1]) proceedeth from the strength of Radiance.
The king of 'uthras that beheld thee
Removed his robes of radiance;
He clad thee therein and said to thee,
'How lovely are thy robes!
Thine appearance is bright, and shall be confirmed".
Mars, lord of arms and war, put on his armour
And war-harness and standeth before the bridegroom's bridal-canopy.
And slayeth devils and demons,
Putting an end to and slaughtering his foes,
And he said to him "I, with my warriors and mighty men,
Will stand here and will guard thee from beginning to end.'
Mercury, learned and wise, instilled some of his wisdom
Into the heart of the bridegroom,

---

[1]) D.C. 3 has šugandak, D.C. 38, like 53 šgandak. The word is an obvious substitution of a familiar word for one unfamiliar, probably a word derived from the root ŠNG which appears only in Ṣingilan 'utra, the name of a spirit. In Syriac ܫܓܢ = to be in love and ܫܓܢܬܐ (variously vocalised) = love, desire, passion.

And hymned the bridegroom and said to him,
"Who sent thee, new-made king?
These doings all take place on thine account.
Thou hast brightened the Ether-world
And hast made the whole world better
From one end to another".
Jupiter, Son of the water, bringeth his vesture to the bridegroom
And hymned him and said to him,
"Thy vesture, our father, is the vesture of 'uthras,
And the light thrown upon (thy) shoulders
Will make thee (weigh) light [1]) our father, in the Scales.
And sealeth thee with the Pure Sign".
Saturn, in his beauty and his ruddiness,
Bringeth his smock to the bridegroom.
And he hymned the bridegroom and said to him,
"O 'uthra in whose resplendence Naṣoraeans exult,
Vaunting themselves in the Word,
The world of light vaunts itself about thee,
(And) about the king Šihlun-Ziwa(?) who hath transplanted thee."
Venus, Lady of Beauty and Desire,
Brought her wreath and girdle-string to the bride,
Which they placed on the head of the bride;
And they hymned the bride and said to her,
"O crowned bride, who sittest upon columns of water [2]),
Rejoice, and rejoice in the spouse who hath taken thee to wife,
And rejoice in thy living wreath.
Inasmuch as thy wreath is living (refulgent)
So shall thine appearance shine,
And thou shalt be preserved until world's end."
And Life is victorious, and victorious the man
Who goeth hence.

211

In the name of the Great Life
Sublime Light be magnified.

(Refrain)

I and the bridegroom's groomsman
Are the straps of his sandals
And the poles of the bridal canopy.

---

[1]) It is easy to confuse the 2nd. sing. Imperfect of QLL with TQL.

[2]) See Š.ḏ-Q. p. 58 n. 5.

I and the bridegroom's groomsman
Washed in the waters of the sea: in the waters of the sea we washed

We revealed not our secret to the sea,
To the sea we revealed not our secret.
Nor did we broadcast our wisdom to the wilderness !

O crowned bride, who was it,
Fruit that is crowned for bridal [1]), who
Revealed our secret
And broadcast our widsom in the wilderness?
Perchance Sun revealed our secret
And broadcast our wisdom in the wilderness?
(Nay!) Sun revealed not our secret
Nor bruited our wisdom in the wilderness.
Sun, of whom ye spake,
Rose at dawn and set at dusk,
Sun revealed not our secret
Nor broadcast our wisdom in the wilderness!

(Refrain "I and the bridegroom's groomsman" etc.)

O crowned bride, who was it?
Fruit that is crowned for bridal, who
Revealed our secret and broadcast our wisdom in the wilderness
Perchance Moon revealed our secret
And broadcast our wisdom in the wilderness?
(Nay!) Moon revealed not our secret
Nor broadcast our wisdom in the wilderness.
Moon, of whom ye spake,
Rose at dusk and set at dawn.
Moon revealed not our secret
Nor broadcast our wisdom in the wilderness.

(Refrain repeated)

O crowned bride, who was it?
Fruit crowned for bridal, who
Revealed our secret and broadcast our wisdom in the wilderness?

Three 'uthras [2]) not of this world revealed it.

---

[1]) See P.S. Supp. ܟܠܠ.

[2]) The three ʿuthras, Hibil, Šitil and Anuš.

They are like one another in stature and dimension,
They are clothed in one (and the same) radiance
And one light is spread over them all.
When they speak, the speech of these good beings is one,
Like the speech of Mighty Beings
In the Great Place, the House of Perfection.
Betwixt them there is no hatred,
Quarrelling or division.
Life is renowned (and) victorious
And victorious is the man who goeth hence.

212

In the name of the Great Life
Sublime Light be magnified.
There is a Vine for Šitil and a Tree for Anuš [1]
Šitil hath a Vine yonder
In thee, Land of the Leal,
Laden with reward, laden with oblation and laden
With Naṣirutha. The tendrils that are at the leaf-ends
Bore prayers, hymns and sublime recitations.
When I rose in my place
I made a request that was great;
I asked that a tall ladder be given me
That I might place it against the Vine for ascent,
Against the Vine for ascent I might place it,
And might mount into my Vine,
Might wax great and grasp its foliage,
Might eat, be refreshed by its shade
And enjoy its leafiness,
Might twine me a wreath of its tendrils
And place it on my head.
When I rose in my place, they granted the request I made.
They gave me a tall ladder that I could set against the Vine for ascent.
Against the Vine for ascent I placed it.
I rose into my Vine, I waxed great, I grasped its foliage,
I ate, was refreshed by its shade and enjoyed its leafiness;
From the tendrils of my Vine I twined a wreath

---

[1] Šitil (Seth) and Anuš in this poem symbolise the soul and human spirit which compose the personality.

And set it upon my head.
The worlds gathered together, the generations assembled,
Twiners twined (wreaths) in imitation of my wreath,
They twined that which had no resemblance (to it).
They went, they put vines (vine-leaves?) on themselves
And they say, "Man, whence is thy wreath,
And whence (came) the being who twined it?"
To them I reply, "Vanish, begone from my presence,
(Ye) dead, wicked ones who beheld not the Life!
As for me, my wreath is not from here;
The being who twined it is not of this world.
My wreath is of the Vine Ruaz
And the Being who twined it [1] is from the Place of Light.
The Being who brought it and set it on my head
Is from the Eternal Home [2]".
Renowned is Life Victorious
And victorious the man who went hence.

213

In the name of the Great Life
Sublime Light be magnified!
I am a mana of the Great Life,
A mana am I of the Mighty Life,
A mana am I of the Great Life,
A mana that emanated from Manas [3]
A mana that proceeded from Manas [3]
That went towards two lawful spouses [4] of this world.
I came and I opened living waters
And gave them to the terrestial pair to drink
I opened living waters and gave of them
To the bridal pair of this world to drink.
I sowed in them pregnancy and birth
And with sexual desire I enflamed them
And caused love to dwell in both of them.
With Kušṭa [5] I spread them a bed of leaves

---

[1] Three words missing from D.C. 53.

[2] See p. 2, n. 2.

[3] I translated this "the Mana" in Š. ḏ-Q., because the plural here might denote the divine Being.

[4] Kišria "legally-joined-together" i.e.: (allowed by ritual law).

[5] Here "troth", "vow" i.e. the marriage pact cemented by oath.

That were from (living?) 1) trees,
They will live and be happy and I, the Messenger Hibil,
Have performed and arranged
That which my Father 2) commanded me.
And Life is victorious, and victorious the man
Who went hence.

214 3)

In the name of the Great Life
Sublime Light be magnified.
A. Thou art come, Pure Pearl, who hast illumined dark hearts!
B. Radiance sought to be 4), and Light to awaken.
G. I laughed at the planets, at what they plotted and did.
D. I sojourned amongst them, but they, the Seven,
Knew not about me.
H. There shall be benefaction for the Elect who loved the Life.
U,W. Woe to the planets that scheme evil against my Chosen ones.
Z. He is the Great Radiance,
The Light which hath no limit.
Ḫ. He is the first Life
Before Whom none existed.
Ṭ. Well is it for him who obeyeth
And hearkeneth to Thee, my Lord!
And walketh his road behind Thee.
Y. He is the great Yura 5)
Like a soul when she cometh from the great House of Life.
K. He is the pure Wreath which they set
Upon Hibil in his škinta.
L. My heart beseecheth the Life
That He, the Life, will seek me in His škintas 6).

---

1) Some adjective is missing, hiia or rauzia.

2) Plural, for the Life.

3) D.C. 3 inserts a rubric before this hymn. A version of Pet. (r.) 276. It is also in the Ginza Rabba, (p. 274 Lidzbarski's translation).

4) D.C. 3 and D.C. 53 have Bi lmihuia, although the two words have been run together.

5) Lidzbarski (G.R. trs. p. 274 : 30) "Er war der grosse Glanz". Pet.(r.) 276: 17. As Yura is unusual as a form of Yur it is tempting to consider יורה "the first rain", "spring", "early season".

6) In G.R. bškinatun. D.C. 53, D.C. 3 and D.C. 38 lškinatun. Possibly should be read "will build me into his škintas", a metaphor found elsewhere.

M. From the day that Hibil transplanted me
My soul hath acknowledged the Place of Light.
N. Thou art the first (Source of) Rest,
Because of Thee, 'uthras 1) find repose.
S. The Twelve Gates stray from the right path 2),
And do not ascend by roads (that lead) to Light.
The profundity of Naṣirutha is vast and boundless.
P. He is a sweet Fruit,
Pleasing of taste and without blemish.
Ṣ. I hearkened to the call of Life
In the Great Place, the House of Perfection.
Q. It is the Voice of Pure Radiance
Who speaketh and discourseth in his škinta.
R. It is the Pure Sign by which
The living 3) are signed in their *škinta*s.
S. I hear the converse of living (souls)
Who have been established in the Dwelling of Life.
T. He is the lovely Door, the Light which is Boundless.
Renowned is Life victorious
And victorious the man who went hence.

Here D. C. 3 has a rubric: —

[When thou hast recited this hymn "Thou art come, Pearl" and endest it, then recite the wedding songs (hadiata, hidiata) "Behold, the wicked degrade" etc. but thou shalt not recite the wedding songs for a widow. Instead, they shall recite "Pure guardians shall guard you" only, without the wedding songs. (These) thou shalt not recite for a widow.]

The wedding songs are purely lay in character and I do not propose to include them amongst the liturgical prayers and hymns. They are essentially folk-songs and have a popular flavour. For my attempt to translate them, see Š. ḏ-Q. They are: —

215. 'hai qašaflia "Lo the wicked degrade my people" Š.ḏ-Q. 18 : 3
216. 'hai ya daragai "Behold, my portal" Š ḏ-Q. 18 : 8

---

1) Read *'uthra*s as in GR.
2) סור (J. to turn from the right path):Pael.
3) Hiia here refers to spirits living in bliss, not to the Great Life.

217. 'hai ya rabutia[1] "Lo, my little mistress" Š. ḏ-Q. 18 : 13[2]
218. 'hai ya rabutia "Lo, my little mistress" Š. ḏ-Q. 18 : 17
219. 'hai ya rabutia "Lo, my little mistress" Š. ḏ-Q. 18 : 20
220. 'hai ya rabutia "Lo, my little mistress" Š. ḏ-Q. 18 : 23
221. 'hai ya rabutia "Lo, my little mistress" Š. ḏ-Q. 18 : 27[2]
222. 'hai ya ṭawasta ḏ zahba "Lo, O thou (bride) that glitterest (with gold)" Š. ḏ-Q. 18 : 30
223. Brata ḏ man anat "Whose daughter art thou" Š. ḏ-Q. 19 : 1
224. Mn yuma ḏ 'uraš rba atalia "From the day that the great 'Uraš came for her" Š. ḏ-Q. 19 : 4
225. Hiduia man ḏ amarlak "Bridegroom, who told thee" Š. ḏ-Q. 19 : 7[2]
226. Man ḏ araslẖ lhiduia "Who wedded the bridegroom". Š. ḏ-Q 19 : 11
227. Brakinkun hibil ziwa "Hibil-Ziwa hath blessed you" Š. ḏ-Q. 19 : 16
228. Hda 'dai atutia rišẖ "One of my hands beneath his head" Š. ḏ-Q. 19 : 25
229. Atutia diqla qaima "Standing beneath the palm-tree" Š. ḏ-Q 19 : 27.
230. Htimitun b'sqat hiia Ye are sealed with the seal of Life" Š. ḏ-Q. 19 : 23
231. Ṭiriankun (ṭariankun) "Your table" Š.ḏ-Q. antepenult.
232. Ninaṭrunkun naṭria dakiia "Pure guardians watch over you" Š. ḏ-Q. 19 ult.

[This is the conclusion of the wedding songs (hadaiata).]

In the name of the Great First Strange Life from worlds of light, the Ineffable that is above all works, be there for me, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš healing, victory[3], strength, soundness, speech and a hearing, joy of heart and forgiveness of sins, (also) for my father Sam son of Anhar, my mother Mahnuš daughter of Hawa-Simat, my wife Hawa-Simat daughter of Maliha, my offspring Adam Yuhana and Šarat-Mumania the children of Hawa-Simat.

And may our thought, mind and intelligence enlighten us, (enlighten me) and my offspring, for the treasure of the First Life in these hymns and psalms of "When the Proven One, the Pure one went".

[1] Variously spelt, D.C. 3 has rabituia.

[2] See M.L. pp. x - xi.

[3] Or, of course, "purity".

233

In the name of the Great Life!
When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the Place where the perfected [1] dwell
To the Place which is all Radiance
And light and glory abound (there),
The Proven Pure One speaketh to the Perfect One [1]
Hidden and guarded within Its veilings [2],
Set apart by Its glory
And giving out light in all Its wisdom.
The Proven One, the Pure One speaketh
Saying to the Great (Life),
"If it please Thee, Great (Life),
If it please Thee, Mighty (Life),
If it please Thee, Great (Life),
The Ether hath all been made, [3]
Created [3] is the Ether, all of it.
And in it, great Radiance will form itself
And sublime Light be set up therein.
In it there will be 'uthras
And Rays-of-Light will be established therein,
Appearances that shine with lovely radiance.
Enlightenment [4] will be raised up
And will watch over all the 'uthras
'Uthras will shine in the enlightenment
Which went thither from Thyself.
The Great Predestinate speaketh [5]
To the Proven One, the Pure One,
Saying to him "These be (welcome) words
That thou hast spoken to us.
Go thou, and become guardian to them,
And all will shine through thy strength

---

[1] Either "perfected (ones)" or "the Perfect Being". Mandaean theologian apparently accept both meanings

[2] Lit. "coverings", "raiment".

[3] D.C. 53 titbid, D.C. 38 mitbid, D.C. 3 titbar. The difference in meaning is slight.

[4] Or "vigilance". It is personified. As the next phrase refers to guarding, "vigilance" may be more suitable.

[5] Lidzbarski (p. 251 M.L.) begins at this line.

And will praise thy Garment
And will honour thine appearance".
The Chosen One gave praise with a pure mouth
Because of that which the Great (Life) said to him.
And Life is victorious.

234

When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the Place where perfected (beings) dwell,
To the Place which giveth out light,
And its praise is unsullied [1]),
Unsullied is its praise;
Foreordained and blessed is its benediction:
Foreordained is the blessed benediction
Which holy *mana*s pronounced,
Which was pronounced by holy *mana*s
Predestinate, calm and perfected.
The Proven, Pure One speaketh,
Saying to the Great Life,
"If it please Thee, Great (Life),
If it please Thee, Mighty (Life),
If it please Thee, Great (Life),
A world of light hath been made,
Created [2]) is a world of light
And a company hath been established therein,
Dwellings [3]) have been set up therein.
It will be bright in Thy praise
In Thy praise it will shine,
And will be blessed with Thy blessing.
Mystic Sprouts (offspring) will come into being
And at Thy Word they will flourish,
They will flourish at Thy Word
And Sprouts that are worthy will be raised up".
The Great Life speaketh with Its pure mouth [4])
Unto the Proven One, the Pure One.

---

[1]) Taqna "firm", "reliable", "constant" has also the meaning when applied to light, "steady", "unwavering", "steady", "continuous". P.S. Thes. under part. adj. gives "unsullied", which suits here admirably.

[2]) Again, D.C. 3 has titbir "created".

[3]) Škinata, could be translated better by some word like "sanctuaries".

[4]) A few lines of this hymn were translated by Lidzbarski, M.L. p. 252 II.

It saith to him, "Thou art Our Thought,
"Our Knowing and Our Understanding,
Our Heart that is limitless, Our First Voice,
Our Pure Garment and Our well-equipped
First Discerner; for Our sake
Thou wast transplanted.
Go! Perform thy work, and thy pure offspring
Shall attain perfection,
They shall attain the highest, thy pure offspring,
And be joined in union inseparable.
Make a World of Light,
And they will shine therein, yea, it shall be
All radiance and light
And will attain perfection".
And the Great Life be praised.

235

When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the Place where the perfected dwell,
To the Tana 1) of glory
Whose blessing hath blessed 2) the Place
In which the Secret One sitteth 3)
And uttereth in Its Awakening 4)
Giveth utterance there in its Arousing 4)
And giveth out light by Its own thought;
The Proven Pure One speaketh
To Predestinate Perfection,
Saying to Him, to the Pure Vein
And Tongue that is limitless,
"If it please Thee, Great (Life),
If it please Thee, Mighty (Life)
May it be that we transport jordans,
Permit that we transport jordans

---

1) In Š. ḏ-Q. I translated this "glowing heart", a very free translation. See p. 190, n. 1. and p. 9, n. 1.

2) D.C. 3 has brik not brika as in D.C. 53 and D.C. 38.

3) See Š. ḏ-Q., p. 73, n. 2. Plural, indicating the Great Life.

4) Here 'ruta (See P.S. Thes. ܥܝܪܘܬܐ) should be thus translated. The idea appears to be that the Great Life has its periods of quiescence, ceasing to be, and that 'ruta is its awaking, its renewed activity, 'ruta also has a "light" meaning-"light which awakens", "enlightenment".

And a Pure Sign shall be established therein,
A Pure Sign we will establish therein
And there will be increase for all 'uthras,
And 'uthras will be baptised
As ye were baptised, they will confirm themselves
By themselves, [1] (as) ye were confirmed
Completely. They will shine, will enlighten one another
And instruct one another about Thee, and Thy pure Vesture
Which is sublime, and brighter than any (other) appearance;
And about that which was transplanted from its place [2],
And about that which is destined to exist,
And about that which was created in a hidden covering".
The Great Predestinate spoke [3],
Saying to the Proven Pure One,
To His pure Garment [4] (?)
There is nought without limit! [5]
All that thou hast done shall be established.
All thy vines will be illustrious,
And in all thine actions there will be nought
Lacking or amiss. In none will there be blemish
And they will not go foolishly astray".
And Life is victorious!

236

When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the Place where perfected beings dwell,
To the Place where His appearance is lustrous,
His countenance shineth and His Counterpart
Is supported each and every time
That they seek and find and discourse of their Creator.
The Proven Pure One speaketh,
Saying to the Great (Life),
If it please Thee, Great (Life),
If it please Thee, Mighty (Life)
If it please Thee, Great (Life)
Great (spirits) sit in glory,

---

[1] Qualify themselves for grades of priesthood?

[2] I.e. the soul.

[3] Lidzbarski begins here, see M.L. p. 253, III.

[4] Doubtful.

[5] Lidzbarski p. 253, 1. 6, ul'tia ḏ saka litlḫ, which he translates "zu dem Wesen, das endlos ist", probably a better version.

In glory they sit, the great (spirits),
And converse in their speech that is not mortal [1]),
They talk in their gentle voices,
And Thou sheddest upon them some of that which is Thine.
And they sit in fellowship with Thee
And employ themselves with Thy praise;
And in Thy place, in prayer to Thee, do they converse.
We will confirm their works,
Their works we will confirm:
We will raise up the horn on their heads
And will establish their Root.
And we will increase their victories: we will increase
Their victories derived from Thy strength,
Transmitted from Thy strength,
(That) went forth, came and dwelt with Thine own".
The Great Predestinate spoke to him [2]),
Saying to the Proven, Pure One,
"Go! invest [3]) the great (spirits) with radiance;
Settle them in a place which is unsullied [4]), Reveal [5]) and give them pihta [6])
And in praise thy (spirits) will shine!
Act (thus) and support the Mana.
Life will show Itself grateful to thee.
Life be praised: Life is victorious.

237

When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the place where the Perfect One dwelleth,
To the place where His converse is calm
And His appearance wondrous,
To the place where all are kings
And where lust and misdoing exist not,
To the place which is full of goodness

---

[1]) Lit. "not vain", "not worthless", "not temporary", "unending": "not mortal" is a very free translation.

[2]) Lidzbarski begins at this line: p. 254, IV. M.L.

[3]) Lit. "plant", "implant", "transplant", "transfer".

[4]) Taqna, see p 187, n. 1.

[5]) Lit. "open", "open up".

[6]) The sacramental bread, lit. "the opened" ("broken into pieces"? or "revealed"?). See M.L. p. xxiii l. 1 ff.

(And) where Their raiment is prepared
For the pure arriving (spirit) 1)
And for him whose form giveth light,
The Proven Pure One speaketh
And saith to the Great (Life)
"If it please Thee, Great (Life),
If it please Thee, mighty (Life)
If it please Thee, Great (Life),
There shall be built a wondrous building,
A wondrous building shall be built.
Thy right hand shall erect it,
Thy right hand will set it up
And Thou wilt not cut it off from Thee.
Thy first plan 2), it will rise towards Thee,
It will be set up, it will rise Thee-wards,
And thou wilt not cut off from Thyself
The First-born that Thou hast created.
He shall be set up as Thy counterpart.
He is a fair portal, he will rise Thee-wards,
He will be established, will mount,
Will direct himself Thee-wards;
And will converse in Thy speech that is eternal.
He will not sever from Thee nor from Thy society.
Condemn him not!"
All that the Proven Pure One had said 3)
Everything the Proven Pure One said
Pleased the Great (Life),
And Sublime-Light riseth:
He said to him "Thou art possessor of will,
And lord of all victories.
Thou hast conquered and hast prevailed over thy brethren
And thy Father, (Whom) in secret thou blessest.
Go, show light (ziwa) to Yušamin and reassure his heart!
Say to him he shall not fear and reveal to him
That which is established here.
Explain it to him so that his heart may lighten
And confirm it that his mind may be enlightened.

---

1) The couplet is obscure and translation tentative. Read 'taqniẖ for taqnalẖ?
2) Or "thought", or "device".
3) See M.L. p. 254 V.

Be gracious and kindly to him and bless him
And show him the light of thy countenance,
The light of thy countenance show to him,
And say to him that he shall not be cast down,
(But) be meek and humble, and he will illumine
The 'uthras".
The Proven One did that which was commanded him,
And the Mana thereupon supported the Proven One
So that he performed that which was commanded him.
And he went to the House-of-Life,
He went, he said to Them, "Thus have I done,
It hath been set in order. Should it not be so,
Set Ye in order".
The Great (Life) blesseth the Proven One
With His pure mouth for having made his report.
And Life is victorious.

238

When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the Place where Perfection dwelleth,
To the Mighty-in-Glory, to the Well-Ordered and Well-Ordering,
(Who) speaketh in His calm voice
And ordereth His ordinances;
Uttering in His calm voice
His trustworthy teaching, His mystic ¹) prayers,
And His wise discourses ²) which are not vain,
The Proven One, the Pure One speaketh
And saith to the Great (Life),
"If it please Thee, Great (Life),
If it please Thee, Mighty (Life),
If it please Thee, Great (Life),
We will twine circlets ³) of radiance,
Circlets of radiance will we twine,
And will set them on the heads of the 'uthras,
We will bring them from the Great Light.

¹) D.C. 3 has šutaikun.

²) NṬF has as a derived meaning "to let fall a weighty observance" "to prophesy". (The usual meaning of niṭufiata "drops", "consorts of divine beings" is impossible here.)

³) Lit "wreaths": "crowns" of priesthood is the understood meaning.

We will watch over them.
If Ye do not thus,
In what can the 'uthras prosper?
In what can the 'uthras delight?
How can there be certainty for Rays-of-Light?
From what will they derive fame and honour?
And how can we preserve them,
And with what will they seek and find,
Speak with Thee and be heard?"
The Great Predestinate speaketh; [1])
He saith to the Proven One, the Pure One,
"Go, join with (unite with?) [2]) Radiance
Take heed that they .... [2]) raiment.
Give them of my Wreath of Ether [3])
And all the 'uthras will rejoice.
And from Us and from thee
They will acquire renown and honour,
Renown and honour they will have,
And in strengthening honour they will be preserved.
Our name and thy name shall be upon them
And they will give praise in the Secret Place".
And Life is victorious.

239

When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the place where the perfected dwell,
To the place of pure wrappings,
Vestments which radiance illumineth,
To the place of Living Flame
Where all are full of goodness.
All open their eyes in radiance,
In the radiance they open their eyes,
And they shine in that Light;
The Proven, the Pure One speaketh
And saith to the Great (Life),
"If it please Thee, Great (Life),

---

[1]) See M.L., p. 255 VII.

[2]) An obscure line. "Change raiment" is unlikely, but I can make nothing else of it. M.L. has "und bewahre die wundersamen Gewände."

[3]) Read aħbalun klilia ayar ("give them ether-wreaths")?

If it please Thee, Mighty (Life),
If it please Thee, Great (Life),
I would say one word to Thee,
One word to Thee I would say,
That is sublime and illuminating
And not (to be?) cut short!
How superexcellent is Thy Likeness
And how greatly hast Thou increased
And established Thy sublime company!
In the Ether (World) there is no water!
As there is no water in the Ether,
By what can the 'uthras be invigorated? [1]
How can the 'uthras thrive? [1]
And (how can) priestly knowledge be installed into their hearts?"
The Great Predestinate speaketh [2]
Saying to the Proven One the Pure One,
"How zealous thou art, Yawar!
And how dutiful and faithful
Are the words which thou hast spoken!"
They created stocks [3] of living water;
They let it flow down to the ether,
They sent it down, caused it to flow down,
To the ether, to the dwelling of the 'uthras,
All of them savoured it and it was fragrant!
'Uthras savoured it and it was fragrant!
All 'uthras will savour it and it will please.
The 'uthras all drank and throve,
They drank and rejoiced thereat.
And into their hearts Naṣirutha
Was poured. Life is renowned and victorious
And victorious is Manda-ḏ-Hiia
And those who love his name.

240

When the Proven One, the Pure One went

---

[1] Niriuzun: or "will be glad".

[2] See M.L., p. 256 VIII.

[3] So D.C. 53. Both D.C. 3 and D.C. 38 have the singular. The passage was not properly understood in Š.ḏ-Q.

To the Place where Perfection dwelleth,
To the Place where dwelleth the pure perfected Being[1]
Which proceedeth[1] from Itself, and Its speech (Word),
Which proceedeth from Itself —
And its speech and words are from It
And from Its Counterpart[2].
The Proven One, the Pure One speaketh
To the Great (Life), saying to Him,
"If it please Thee, Great (Life),
If it please Thee, Mighty (Life),
If it please Thee, Great (Life),
We will summon Zihrun-Raza,
Zihrun-Raza we will summon — him and his seven
Mystic brethren who are with him.
One is called "Radiance", another is called "Light".
We will plant (them?) and they will shine forth
And will be made manifest.
And we will transfer for them jordans (flowing streams)
That are transcendent, transcendent jordans
We will transmit for them.
They will govern a Kimṣa[3] (treasure?) of living flame
And the Root which the Son of Hidden Mysteries led forth.
They will be baptised and established
And we will establish the Kimṣa[3].
In their vestments we will establish their strength.
There it shall come to pass, and at Thy name
The elect thus far[4] will be established.
If Thou dost not act thus,
Transitory matters may cause the Kimṣa to stumble away from Thee,
Things which lead to destruction may cause it
To fall away from Thee, and all sacramental rites[5]
Will become marred.

---

[1] The verb is plural in agreement with tušlimia, here undoubtedly the supreme Being.

[2] Dmut-Hiia, the female aspect of creative Life.

[3] Kimṣa here seems to refer to the body of believers, the Mandaean "Church" as a whole.

[4] Lhaka lit. "to here"; "up to this point".

[5] Razia, "mysteries" = sacramental rites.

When the Proven Pure One said this [1],
A Voice went down into all the worlds
From the Secret Radiance.
It spoke, it called Zihrun-the-Mystery;
It spoke, it called on Zihrun-Raza,
On him and on his seven mystic brethren
Who are with him. It summoned them
And it transported for them jordans.
And it set them in rule over the jordans;
Over the jordans it made them rulers
And (over) never-ceasing well-springs.
Renowned is Life victorious
And victorious the man who went hence.

241

When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the Place where perfected beings dwell,
To the Place which was self-created
And a Presence (Parṣufa) set up therein,
A Voice issued from the Presence
Announcing to the Chief of Rays of-Light,
And causing the Great(est) Ray-of-Light to hearken:
Teaching him about every matter,
About every principal (important) subject,
So that it was explained: — thus it is.
The Proven One, the Pure One speaketh,
Saying to the Great (Life)
"If it please Thee, Great (Life),
If it please Thee, Mighty (Life),
If it please Thee, Great (Life),
I will tell Thee all that I have seen.
I have seen — and I desire to call forth [2] 'uthras
— If it please Thee!
I will call forth three 'uthras,
And I will instal them in my abode (škintai).
One shall be my companion,
Another shall be, as it were, my counterpart,
Another shall be young, and be

---

[1] See M.L. p. 257 IX.
[2] Or "summon".

Satisfactory to my mind.
They shall chant sublime hymns
And read in secret books
And recite therefrom,
In all their wisdom performing rites that are seemly.
Walking with me in the boundary of the Self (?)
Walking according to my commands
And not departing from (my word)
From (my word) they shall not depart,
Nor alter my pure Word,
Nor change my rites which they perform
And were ordained (to carry out).
I have created them according to my design,
And have set the Sign of Life upon their minds,
Have marked them with the mark of the Great Life
And placed my own name upon them."
And Life is victorious.

242

When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the Place where the Perfected dwell,
To the Place which is all radiance,
And nought is as sublime or of like purity!
(The Place) which is full of serene (beings)
Honouring Thee with their praises [1];
The Proven, Pure One speaketh
And saith to the Great (Life)
"If it please Thee, Mighty (Life),
If it please Thee, Great (Life),
I will call forth from my 'uthras, one,
One from (amongst?) my 'uthras I will summon.
And I will clothe him in my radiance
With my radiance will I clothe him,
And with my light I will cover him.
I will cover him with my light
And he will be protected by my name.
He will have that which was apportioned him;

---

[1] The construction is curious - "in Your praises honouring", i.e. "praises of the Great Life".

He will arise with his great (spirits) and [1] his host
And will take to himself Knowledge of Life (Manda-ḏ-Hiia)
Who went thither.
He will go to the world of Abathur,
From whom imperfection originated,
From him imperfection came into being
And he sowed bad seed [2].
Bad seed did he sow and created creations
Not worthy of him [3], who asked no advice,
Received no baptism, nor did they (he?)
Grasp the right hand of his (their) father,
But did that which was not commanded
And performed that which was useless.
One of my 'uthras shall go and shall confound
All (those) creations, he will confound
All the creations which he created,
(Creatures) that have neither hand nor foot.
He will straighten a road in the world,
Whereby chosen ones will mount hitherwards.
At his call [4] they will come
And will set up my boundary-stone
And testify to the one, great, pure Name.
The horn on their heads will be exalted."
Renowned is Life and victorious,
And victorious the man who went hence.

243

When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the Place where perfected (beings) dwell:
Pure is the place, there is no grief in it,
No infirmity existeth therein, nor is disquiet admitted there,
Friction is not accepted therein,
Wrath and violence have no place therein,
Therein are no wrath and violence

---

[1] In D.C. 53 plainly sagiiḇ. D.C. 38 and D.C. 3 both have niqum bsigia "will arise to go".

[2] "Bad seed" refers to Pthahil, the unsuccessful creator, who was Abathur's son.

[3] Or, which were not accomplished successfully for him.

[4] So in D.C. 53. D.C. 3 and D.C. 38 have "my call".

But all is calm, all is kindliness,
Because they within it are in harmony [1].
The Proven One, Pure One speaketh
And saith to the Great (Life)
"If it please Thee, Great (Life),
If it please Thee, Mighty (Life),
If it please Thee, Great (Life),
Thy will shall be (wrought) on the 'uthras,
Upon the 'uthras Thy will shall be (done);
All that Thou hast willed Thou doest!
I have seen, I have spoken,
And him whom I mention in Thy presence,
I will reveal to him — this Abathur-Rama —
Why he is fallen from his throne,
Why from his throne he is fallen
And went and became Him-of-the-Scales [2],
When I call in Thy name a second time,
Lay Thou Thy right hand upon him!
The Great Predestinate speaketh [3]
Saying to the Proven One, the Pure One,
"Thou knowest all hearts and discernest all thoughts,
Thine eyes are well-open
And thou distinguishest all those who know thee [4].
For thy fame's sake and for Our name's sake,
When he is sinning, who will (can) permit it?
Who will let him be when he offendeth?
And casteth Our root into polluted waters?
(One) who accepteth favour from Us and then goeth
And casteth it nito the abode of the dark (powers)!"
When the Proven, Pure One heard this,

[1] The root is ܫܘܐ, and elsewhere I have discussed the varied meaning of the Ethpe. "Smoothened", "equalised"?

[2] Abathur-Rama is the higher counterpart of Abathur-Muzania (Abathur of the Scales). The latter is in charge of the balances in which souls are weighed, with the soul of Šitil, the purest of all human being) in the opposing scale. See p. 105, n. 4.

[3] M.L. (p. 258) here has twelve lines (only) of this poem. Owing to ignorance of the context, Lidzbarski has misunderstood it. Yawar is pleading for Abathur but the Great Life explains that he cannot allow Abathur's conduct to pass.

[4] Yadak = "thy knowers": see N. 177: 18 and for paršit, ibid p. 22 n. 4.

He prostrated himself before Him and worshipped:
He bowed himself and prostrated himself before Him
And uttered much praise and said,
"How sublime 1) is this that I have heard from Thee!
I have accepted and am corrected by Thee!"
And Life is victorious.

244

When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the place where the Perfected (One) dwelleth,
(He said) "I will speak to Thee, Mystic Perfection,
Who art hidden and guarded by Thy Veilings:
I would tell Thee, Mystic Perfection,
Secrets told by the 'uthras.
One whom, according to Thy plan, I created,
I sent to that world.
How hideous and without beauty
Was everything that he saw in that world!
A world of sons of perfection
From whom there was imperfection.
He who went from here a noble 2)
Yonder they made him a slave,
A slave they made him yonder.
From the seven planets he suffered,
He suffered from the seven planets
And was tormented in the world.
He who went from hence rich 3) (or "having plenty")
Was in need in the world.
Yonder they made him their fellow,
Yonder their associate they made him.
From the seven planets he suffered,
He suffered from the seven planets
Was reduced to misery in the world".

---

1) D.C. 53 omits šanai. D.C. 3 has kma šanai etc.

2) Or "free".

3) Both D.C. 53 (p. 263 text) and D.C. 3 omit the lines in italics, viz. lhil abda šawiuiḫ sawiuiḫ abda umn šuba šibiahia sbal sbal mn šibiahia asniq bgauḫ ḏ alma yatira ḏ azal mn haka. For the missing lines see No. 272 (D.C. 53, p. 312 text), D.C. 3 p. 411 text, and D.C. 38, Š.ḏ-Q. p. 24, l. 11 ff.

4) Or "virtuous". Yatira from יָתַר to be rich.

The Great (Life) with pure mouth (speaketh) 1),
Saying to the Proven, Pure One,
"This that one of thine 'uthras hath told thee,
If virtuous is he about whom one spoke,
He about whom one of thine 'uthras spake,
One of thine 'uthras shall bring thee information,
We are creating (?) 2) an earth of fire,
And the planets who enslaved him
Will go to fiery chains.
Pthahil, who made the earth shall be baptised
Here in the white Jordan.
The thousand thousand vestments 3)
That will go out towards him
And presences without end
Will have compassion 4) and will together
Stretch forth (their hands) in pact and peace 5)."
"How sublime is that which Thou sayest to me!
Thou hast reassured my heart!
Thou dost indeed support and lift up,
Equippest with arms and givest enlightenment!"
And Life is victorious.

245

When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the Place where the Perfected (Being) dwelleth,
To the Place where the Almighty
Empowereth Itself and its Presence (Parṣufa),
And steadfast and shining is its Countenance,
Showing forth Its Likeness in the Secret Place;
The Place where Their Voice is lovely
And the sound of Their speech is sweet;
And sublime is the Place where the Great (Life) abideth!
Praise of Them is unbounded 6)

---

1) M.L. p. 258 has the following lines only in a slightly different form.

2) Lidzbarski (M.L., p. 259 1. 2 f.) anin tibil nura qria. Read qrainin we have created". (Š-ḏ-Q qrainḫ)

3) A punning equivalent for mania.

4) Lit. "will be theirs", i.e. compassion for Pthahil.

5) A free translation, they "extend (their hands) in kušta".

6) An idiomatic form, see p. 197, n. 1 and elsewhere. In this type of hymn it is always difficult to distinguish whether the plural refers to the Supreme Being or the spirits surrounding Him.

And mighty (beings) shine in their hierarchies
And perform all that They (He) desire (desireth);
The Proven Pure One speaketh
And saith to the Great (Life)
"If it please Thee, Great (Life),
If it please Thee, Mighty (Life),
Reveal to me the mysteries of blessing (prayer)
And about the armour [1] of their souls,
And about the radiance transmitted to Thyself".
The Great (Life) with His pure mouth (speaketh) [2]
And saith to the Proven One, the Pure One,
"Thou art blessed from the Place (in which) we are blessed [3]
And from the Place in which We came into being Thou camest into being.
And from the Place in which We were (self-) planted
Firm and implanted was thy native strength? [4].
Our radiance and thy radiance are victorious,
Victorious is Naṣirutha [5] that is of Us
And victorious is he whom I summon into it.
And (those whose) eyes open in radiance and light".
And Life be praised!

246

When the Proven One, the Pure One goeth
To the Place where Perfection dwelleth:
When, filled with innocency
And bright in all his goodness,
When beautified by his great radiance
And by his pure being [6]
They(?) travel to that Place,
The Proven, Pure One spoke,
Saying to the Great (Life),
"If it please Thee, Great (Life),

---

[1] Širiana = (a) a vein, artery, channel", "stream", (b) "body-armour, cuirass".

[3] The verb is passive.

[4] As indicated on pp. 135 and 171 the meaning of the verb NṢB and the word niṣubta is wide and vague. Hence the couplet is paraphrased with misgiving.

[5] Here, the vocation of priesthood.

[6] The verse is obscure. My former translation is impossible. Should it be "with a pure being"? 'tia is always abstract!

If it please Thee, Mighty (Life),
If it please Thee, Great (Life),
Support my words! Let there be thrones
And we will set them up in the worlds of light.
So that 'uthras shall sit (thereon)
And recite thereon.
So that their ranks [1]) will shine thereon.
By their words they will edify them,
So that their ordered array may beseem their splendour.
And the revered ones, when sitting on their thrones,
Sitting on their thrones,
Will shine with a steady light.
He spoke with His pure voice,
The Great (Life) who dwelleth in that Place [2])
Spoke with His pure mouth
And said to the Pure One,
"Thou art a pure Helper! (Go),
Do all that thou desirest (to do)".
"According to Thy will and mine
I have constructed thrones,
Thrones I have provided
And have instructed the 'uthras who sit on them.
The 'uthras who sit on them I have instructed,
And they praise the Great (Life) Who counselled me.
They praise me, for I prepared for each one
His throne. The 'uthras stood and praised
That which I had sought and found
Through the goodness of the Life.
For them had I sought and found
Through the goodness of the Life
Who supported them."
Renowned is Life and victorious
And victorious the man who went hence.

247

When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the Place where perfected beings dwell,
The Chosen One, whose vesture becometh him

---

[1]) Sidria also means "recitations", "chants".
[2]) See M.L., p. 260, XIV.

And maketh his personality[1] greater
Than all the ʻuthras,
His personality maketh him greater than all the ʼuthras
Greater than all ʼuthras doth his personality make him,
Because he beheld the Form of the Great (Life),
Because he hath seen the Likeness of the Great (Life)
Their radiance controlled his thought
And Their thought: it was reciprocally outpoured.
And They pray a prayer for the ʼuthras.
All ʼuthras trust one another,
Love one another in sincerity.
There is no division amongst them
Such as the Second[2] brought about,
So ʼuthras are undivided from one another,
All are armed with one armour,
They are equipped with one armour
And their speech is one in sincerity,
In sincerity their speech is one.
And they dwell in lovely radiance,
In lovely radiance do they dwell
The Being whose love filled them,
And whose tranquillity and love rested upon them.
Life be praised and Life is victorious.

248

When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the place when perfected (beings) dwell,
—Great is he, the good (spirit)! —
He set his course towards his Father,
Toward his Father was his course set,
To say to Him that which was sublime and precious
In the secret place.
"If it please Thee, Great (Life),
If it please Thee, Mighty (Life),
May it please Thee, Great (Life),

---

[1] In these poems nafša is often used for "soul". Properly speaking it is a thir component of man's make-up; the self, or individuality as distinct from the ruha and nišimta

[2] "The Second", "Second Life"; the manifestation of the material world. ?

[3] Read rhamtḫ. . .šidqḫ.

(That) a home of splendour [1], honour within it,
Be established, dignity resident therein,
And 'uthras will seek one another,
'Uthras will seek one another (in prayer).
Each will reverence his brother,
Everyone will reverence his brother
According to the counsel which went thither
From Thee".
"Thou art empowered, Great (Spirit)!
Go, let Honour abide in that place.
Let Dignity rest on that place.
And in Our glory and thine they will become glorious,
They will become glorious with that glory
And will accept the blessing that We sent them:
The blessing We sent them they will accept
And be grateful to thee.
It will take place so that 'uthras may know
That thou art the greatest of all 'uthras;
For thou hast revealed and shown them light
And dost give them the praise".
"I went, I went yonder,
Yonder I went;
I caused blessing to rest upon them.
The blessing I shed upon them
They (thankfully) receive.
And we will bless them with a benediction [2],
Benediction we will pronounce upon them
And in Thy praise they will (themselves) gain honour.
They will gain honour in praise of Thee,
They will establish Thy word.
Thy word they will establish
And will not depart from Thee."
Priests in secret bless the great (spirit)
Who honoured them and caused honour to rest upon them.

---

[1] A pun on 'qar and 'qara follows; play on words is characteristic of Mandaean poetry.

[2] Read dilkun for dilun? ("and bless Thee with a benediction").

249

When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the Place where perfected beings dwell,
To the Place where dwelleth the Perfected [1]),
Hidden within its Self and aloof,
He goeth towards Him, speaking to Him,
(Uttering) a sublime saying.
"If it please Thee, great (Life),
If it please Thee mighty (Life),
If it please Thee, great (Life),
I will speak: accept Thou mine (utterance).
There shall be pure signings;
And there shall be perpetual watchfulness.
It will be Thine armament;
With it 'uthras will equip themselves.
Thou equippest them with Good-Faith (kušṭa)
And Good-Heed [2]).
Nor will they rest idle when Thou hast armed them
With Good-Faith and Good-Heed.
They will keep silence and observe obedience.
Thinking like Thee and acting like Thee,
Thinking and acting like Thee.
And their deeds will be honest,
Reliable will be their rites [3]).
And zealous counsel will issue from them.
Kings, they will counsel one another
And unite, great and small, in communion."
And Life is victorious.

250

When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the Place where the Perfected One abideth,
To the Place where the sound of His voice [4]) is mild,

---

[1]) I.e. the great Life.
[2]) Or "Truth and obedience".
[3]) Both translations of this line are possible.
[4]) Again here the reversion to the singular points to tušlimia as an epithet for the Great Life. The narrative returns to the plural after "luminous and lovely".

His appearance fair; and luminous and lovely
Are Those 1) who dwell there
And to Themselves absolutely true;
Truth and armed-readiness are at Their head;
In Their place They discern, know and distinguish
And in their inmost 2) Self They are watchful.
The Proven, Pure One speaketh,
Saying to the Great(Life)
"If it please Thee, Great (Life),
If it please Thee, Mighty (Life),
If it please Thee, Great (Life),
Speak 3), open (reveal) Thy treasury, Speak 3), reveal Thy treasury
And take therefrom a boon,
A boon take out of it
And grant to me a servant.
A servant give to me in whom
There is no lacking or fault.
With him bring my brethren, with him bring
All my sons, bring my sons;
So that in him and in Thee they may be raised up,
Be raised up in Thy resurrection
And be blessed with a benediction
That is from Thee."
The scheme which the great (spirit) planned 4),
He planned it for good. (At) the place
That the great (spirit) thought out
The 'uthras bow down and give praise,
The 'uthras worship and praise
The Being who opened His treasury,
The Being who sent them a benefit.
The 'uthras bowed in adoration
And were grateful for all His favours.

---

1) See p. 206, n. 4.
2) Lit. "in their heart of themselves".
3) Malil Or, (Biblical Hebrew, demon. of מול' 'to present, show") "Reveal" ? (See J. under מָלל III).

4) M.L. has the final lines, p. 260, XV.

251

When the Chosen One, the Pure One went
To the Place where the Perfected (Being) dwelleth,
To the Place where deeply reverenced
Is His steadfast Form, he (the Chosen One)
Spoke, saying to the Great (Life) Whose Form is constant,
"If it please Thee, Great (Life),
If it please Thee, Mighty (Life),
If it please Thee, Great (Life),
(Let us) open a Light-Euphrates,
A Light-Euphrates we will open up
And set therein a sturdy root
So that from the root there will be pure Vines
Who will offer up praise to Thee;
So that from the Vines which appear
Sprouts may grow out, healthy offshoots;
So that from the offshoots that show forth
We may institute, reward and oblation [1]).
We will institute reward and oblation,
We will lead in a congregation of souls [2]),
In a congregation of souls we will take the lead.
From it (the Euphrates) water will gush out,
There will be assurance for all Rays-of-Light,
They will be full of faith and put their trust in Thee".
"Thou hast spoken and thou hast established ,
Do thou confirm it and bring it to a successful conclusion".
"I came, and I opened up a Light-Euphrates
And established therein a baptism that is efficacious [3]),
I set up thereby a sturdy Root
That giveth forth light and is bright
And will not be cut down".
And Life is victorious.

When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the place where the Perfected (Being) dwelleth,

[3]) Lit. "that is not void", "not useless".

To the Place where His speech is pleasant
And His converse sublime and foreign (to the earthly world),
To the place where personality and manhood exist not;
[He spoke to the Great (Life) saying:]
"If it please Thee, Great (Life),
If it please Thee, Mighty (Life),
If it please Thee, Great (Life),
We will set up a pure Crystal,
A pure Crystal will we set up
And arcana that are within it
Shall be established. The 'uthra Hibil
Shall come, shall dwell on the Euphrates
And will guard it. At his right hand
Two beings will come. We will establish and found [1]
Three škintas. On them Thou wilt cause blessing to rest:
Blessing Thou wilt bestow on them.
The arcana concealed therein, one by one
Will come into being [2]. There will be
A Pearl that will enlighten darkened hearts.
All will be filled with faith,
It will arouse the fallen (who have stumbled).
He who is aroused by it will get up,
(But) he who causeth stumbling
Will perish on the spot.
He who is worthy, deserving and perfect
Will not be cut off from his place.
He will be completely confident,
(For) the Life will be his support,
His support will be the Life
And he will he protected in his own place."
And Life be praised!

When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the place where the perfected dwell,
To the place of Safe-keeping
That is set apart for the company [3] of the Great (Life).

The Proven, Pure One speaketh
And saith to the Great (Life)
"If it please Thee, Great (Life),
If it please Thee, Mighty (Life),
If it please Thee, Great (Life),
I will speak a word [1]: uphold it!
I word I would speak, uphold it!
If it please Thee, Great (Life),
This shall be done [2]; a secret watcher
(Be appointed?) set over Man,
His guardian. I will remain a long time,
— And I will guard him! —
To cheer [3] him and to raise him up toward Thee;
To cheer him and to raise him up
Towards Thyself, so that he may come
And behold Thy countenance, may come
And grasp Thy right hand in fealty [4],
May rise up and listen to Thy converse
Which is not of this world [5]".

"Thou hast said it! Go, seek him out
And bring him here: seek him out [6]
And bring him hither
And the Life will be mindful of thy goodness".
Bringing abundant radiance and boundless light.
Bringing radiance in abundance I went;
To the secret watcher I came. "Rise up",

[1] I.e. "make a suggestion".

[2] D.C. 38 (Š. ḏ-Q. p. 26, ult.) nitbad hazin.

[3] I have been in doubt about this word. In D.C. 53 it is spelt biuiḫ and in Š.d.-Q. p. 27: 1 buiuia. The verb BAA (Arm. בעי "to seek" is the first and easier solution, but the unusual first 'i" in biuiḫ makes this unlikely. It may come from a verb equivalent to the Aramaic בוע "to rejoice" בעי and this is confirmed by the Syriac Pa. ܒܝܐ "to console" (i.e. "gladden") (ܒܘܝܐܐ consolation). According to the poem, there is no need for the speaker to seek the watcher, since, apparently he is already with the watcher (a priest, or priesthood, personified?).

[4] It is usually necessary to paraphrase sentences which refer to the act or rite of kušṭa.

[5] Mnakria lit. "estranged" foreign, removed i.e. "not of the mortal world". "transcendent", "ineffable" convey the meaning.

[6] Buiḫ.

(I said to him) "Rise up! Watchers [1] are many.
Thou hast kept thy watch; arise, put on
(The robe) which the Great (Life) hath sent thee
And go towards Him. Come! He hath required thee with Him
And I have sought thee, so come to us
And hearken to His converse which is ineffable [2].
The Great (Life) hath stretched forth His right hand to thee [3]
Put away passion from thy thought.
Thy thought shall be filled with Ours
And thy garment and Our garment will be one".
Life be praised and Life is victorious.

[These two "responses and two hymns are to be recited for the owner of a crown [4] when thou celebratest his wedding. Recite them after the chant "To the place where speech is pleasant". And recite them for the novice in the škinta: (but) do not recite them for a layman's wedding. Beware! for they are recited for the owner of a crown [4]. And then recite the hymn "To go and to perform his works" unto its conclusion [5].]

254

When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the place where the Perfected dwelleth,
To go and to perform his works
And to be manifest therein
And to institute a guardian [6]

....

I, whom the Great (Life) had commanded
To relieve [7] all the *škinta*s,
I, the First (Life?) enlightened Him.
"Because of me, the 'uthras were set at rest,
Because of me, the 'uthras were satisfied
And the Rays-of-Light ranged in their degree;
All of them shone in one another's radiance

[7] Or "to serve", "to gratify".

And light was established in all minds.
Over all the works that I had made
I set up the Great (Life).
And I became a guardian in them
I was a guardian within them
And I upheld[1] all the worlds of light
In their places."
And Life is victorious over all works
And victorious the man who went hence.

255

When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the place where the Perfected One dwelleth,
To the place of veiled radiance
(Where) His Likeness is beauteous;
The Proven Pure One speaketh
And saith to the Great (Life),
"Thy disciple am I, for I have grasped
And understood some of Thy wisdom
I stood before Thee like a son
Who standeth before his father.
Thou spakest to me and I hearkened,
And that which Thou didst command I did.
The glory which Thou didst bestow on me
I transmitted to all the worlds of light.
With that which Thou didst vouchsafe to me
I benefitted all the Rays-of-Light.
From Thee I have not departed
And the speech of others existed not for me".
The Great (Life) praiseth the Proven One, the Pure One,
With His pure mouth, (saying to him)
Who had made his report,
"How submissive and humble thou art, Yawar!
What an alleviator[2] and peacemaker thou art!
Thou makest 'uthras agree and pacifiest them
And givest stability to the Rays-of-Light!"
And Life is victorious.

256

When the Proven One, the Pure One went
To the Place where the Perfected One dwelleth,
To the place in which the Transcendent [1] abideth,
Dwelling therein in a set limit
Within an appointed limit abiding therein,
Resting within it, in the Holy [2] Place,
The Proven, Pure One speaketh
Saying to Them, the Great (Life),
"If it please Thee, Great (Life),
If it please Thee, Mighty (Life),
If it please Thee, Great (Life),
The works which I have performed are set in order,
They are set in order, the works I have performed.
And all that I did in Thy presence
Will be established, and these words
Which I spoke before Thee (also).
And (as for) me, they will realise my vision.
I have acted as thou didst desire".
When the Proven Pure One had spoken thus,
The Great (Life) rejoiced thereat, embraced him
And kissed him with His pure mouth.
And he veiled him with esoteric veils [3]
With esoteric veils did He cover him.
And a cloud which emanated from Himself
He spread over him: it hid the great (spirit)
Which He had concealed therein.
And they called him "All- 'uthras-confirm him"
And "One who arrangeth-ordinances-and-sublimates-
All-minds" is he called [4] (?)
And Life be praised.

Translator's note. — The preceding hymn-cycle, known as the Kt azil bhira dakia must be a selection from a volume of gnostic poems with this title. Three other poems from this lost composition are included in the G. R. (right side). The first two of these were translated by Professor Mark Lidzbarski in his Ginza, der Schatz oder das grosse Buch der Mandäer, (in these pages referred to as G.R.) pp. 355-370. They were also translated into Latin and transliterated into Syriac by M. Norberg in his Codex Nasaraeus (3 vols. 1815-1816) pp. 3-23. (Lidzbarski belittled Norberg's work in a somewhat unfair fashion.) The third poem, included in some codices of the Ginza Rba, as in my own copy, D.C.22 (dated 1274 A.H.), but missing in copies seen by Lidzbarski and Norberg and also in Petermann's facsimile (1867), is undoubtedly from the same lost book.

[1] Lit. Strange.

[2] Yaqra = "precious", "venerated"; "holy" conveys the idea.

[3] Mania gawaiia "inner vessels", "inner garments", "inner vehicles"? — in any case, something which conceals, or covers up.

[4] My translation of the last few lines is very tentative, it is obscure.

To take the first two of these, both deal with 'uthras who have in some manner bungled their parts in the cosmic plan; namely, Yušamin, Abathur and Pthahil. The first two become reconciled to the Great Life. Yušamin's re-instatement after intercession by the "Pure, Chosen One" is the theme of the latter half of hymn 237 in the present collection, and hymn 243 is an attempted intercession for Abathur. Pthahil, however, persists in rebellion and turns to the planets and demons for support. The Great Life intervenes in Yušamin's plan to punish Pthahil, and, softened, the latter at last makes his submission.

In the second Ginza poem the 'uthras urge Manda-ḏ-Hiia to reprove Yušamin for mistreating the "pure pearl" (the soul) and Manda-ḏ-Hiia tells Hibil-Ziwa to remove the "pearl" from material creation. Light, loveliness and perfume thereupon depart from the earth. Yušamin and Pthahil protest, Pthahil from the chains into which he was cast for his rebellion.

The story is a complicated one, but all ends satisfactorily with the restoration of the soul to earth and the triumphant supremacy of light and order.

The third poem, that which is missing in G. R., is in the style of all the poems of the collection, including the formula "If it please thee, Great (Life)". It describes the resentment of Pthahil who is still in bonds. He complains and threatens 'u haizin akšalta makšlitlia hašta mšawina lpisusta ḏ-lahuat (If thou hast made me fall thus, then now I will make such a breaking-up as has never been") and he summons the planets one by one and arms them.

Just in time, a message reaches him from the Great Life, and meditation and repentance change his attitude to one of humility. He is immediately surrounded by hosts of 'uthras and re-instated in favour, whereupon he calls the planets to order.

Translator's note. — Following the Kt azil bhira dakia in D.C. 3. D.C. 53 and D.C. 38 there is an astrological section bound into the prayerbook for the convenience of priests performing marriages, for they are always consulted by bridegrooms as to the propitious day and hour for the consummation of the union. It would endanger the happiness of the pair if the act took place under unfavourable astrological conditions. The section, known as the Šabania Šaiia was translated by me in the Šarḥ ḏ-Traṣa ḏ-Qabin ḏ-Šišlam Rba (Š. ḏ-Q.) so that I propose to omit it here together with the long colophon which follows it. A third part therefore begins on page 257 of D.C. 53. It contains prayers which have occurred earlier in the manuscript, for the same prayers serve on a variety of occasions: those for marriage are used at the consecration of a priest, and so on. When duplication occurs, I shall refer back to the prayer by number and page of both translation and text, but will not retranslate.

(These are hymns of "When the Chosen One, the Pure One went" I copied for myself so that there should be commemoration (of my name) on earth and yonder in the mighty and celestial worlds of light, and for love of holy truth and (with) reliance on the high King of Light, His name be praised in the great place of light! I am poor, lowly and infantile, a slave that is all sin and as dust beneath the feet of Naṣoraeans, one who kisseth the shoes on the feet of the pious, the least of my brother-ganzivri. I am Rabbi Adam-Yuhana son of Sam son of Bihram son of Adam-Yuhana son of Msa'ad known as Kamisia, family name Riš-Draz. I copied for myself from the qulasta (collection) of the great, lofty and revered R. Ram-Yuhana son of R. Yahia-Zihrun son of R. Zihrun son of R. Adam son of R. Yahia-Adam son of R. Šitil son of R. Baktiar son of Mhatam-Zihrun son of Bihram son of Adam-Yuhana son of Yahia son of Zihrun son of Yahia-Anuš son of the great, lofty and revered R. Mhatam son of Yahia-Baian son of Yuhana-Šadan son of Zakria, from (one of) the Beni-Dihdaria Sabur by name; who copied from a collection that R. Ram-Yuhana also copied for himself (he was) the son of R. Yahia-Zihrun son of R. Zihrun son of R. Adam, family name 'Kuma, who copied it for a šalmana (a "perfect one"[1]) Hadaiat son of Qasim son of Hadat son of Bihram son of Zakria of the Beni-Dihdaria, family name Sabur. He copied it from the collection of the great, lofty and revered one, a reliable and chosen ganzibra, a copyist[2] of his library and a lofty paragon in priestcraft (Naširuta), (namely) R. Sam-Yuhana son of R. Yahia-Adam son of Bihram-Zihrun son of Adam-Yuhana son of Zid, son of Sam, son of Bihram son of R. Adam son of R. Mhatam son of R. Prayers 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, and 292 are identical with prayers 180-187, pp. 162-166 of the translation, and pp. 202-207 and 330-335 of the Mandaic text, D.C. 53.

Following, prayers 293 to 304 inclusive are identical with prayers 188-199: trs. pp. 166-169 and pp. 335-338 Mandaic text, D.C. 53. The colophon which follows differs from other colophons in the book, and I omit it. The series of hymns which occupies the next section are for the ordination of priests, known as their "coronation". All the features of coronation are present, the immersion, oath, unction, and investiture with royal insignia. The "crown", however, is a tubular silken fillet. Šišlam-Rba is the prototype of priest and bridegroom.

305

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that they placed the crown on Šišlam-Rba
Jordans formed themselves at his right,
At his right jordans formed themselves.
In them signs were graven,
Signs were graven in them,
Banners and holy vows[2],
Banners and vows,
And kings, Tannas[3] and Drops
All bow down and worship the great Crown
And the Vine which they had transplanted from it[4]
For ever and aye.

306

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that they placed the crown on Šišlam-Rba

[1] Haqiriun

[2] Kuštia yaqria (Or, "precious pacts").

[3] Tannas and Drops are mentioned together in Prayer 189. Lidzbarski translates "Drops" as "women". The reference may be to bystanders, probably women of two classes.

[4] Some obscurities in these hymns defy translation! The "vine" which has been transplanted is, presumably, the new priest. Could the "crown" (taga) at one time have been of vine-tendrils?

Treasure of Life (Simat-hiia [1]) shone therein.
And in his vesture twelve mirrors were formed,
Twelve mirrors were formed in his vesture
And seven others in his seal-ring [2].
And five Drops...(?) [3]
And eyes discern in them sublime treasure.
They twine [4] trees with gold (Trees are twined with gold?)
Bountiful is their load of pearls!
Who, amongst all the kings,
Will confirm and view the crown
Which they set on him
For ever and aye?

307.

In the name of the great Life!
On the day that they set the crown on Šišlam-Rba,
The jordans, frolicking and dancing,
Restless, and giving the two banks [5] no peace
Rejoicing, laughing and disporting themselves,
Say, "Our glory hath shone here,
It hath shone in this new crown,
The like of which existeth not.
Blessed is this new crown
And blessed are its leaves, which shall not fall!
For ever and aye.

308.

In the name of the great Life!
On the day that they set the crown on Šišlam-Rba
The jordans all assembled, and Rays-of-light,
And wellsprings and Tannas;
And palms are interwoven [6] into the tendrils
Of the crown and brighten Šišlam-Rba's crown.
And they submit themselves to the glory

[5] For the missing line, lkifh trin see D.C. 53. No. 389 p. 470 text) and B.M. Or. 6592 : 352. (It is also missing in D.C. 3.)

[6] In all versions 'strik, except D.C. 3, which has 'utrik.

Conferred upon it. And all kings
Do homage to its radiance, light and effulgence.
Eternally.

309

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that they set the crown on Šišlam-Rba,
Rays-of-light summon the kings,
They call to the kings, the rays-of-light,
And *škinta*s say to one another,
"Come! let us go and see Šišlam-Rba
Upon whom the Great (Life) hath set a crown;
Seven reliable kings [1] set it upon him
And King Manhiriel confererred the sign (insignia) upon him
And took his hand in holy troth [2],
And raised him, set him up
In the House of the Perfected,
For ever and aye.

310

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that they set the crown on Šišlam-Rba
Channels of light were formed [3] therein
Channels of light formed themselves (therein)
And the glory (or "praise") of the 'uthras shone bright.
There was radiance, there was light!
Sublime ether was in them,
It was diffused into flowings of water
And streams without end.
They (all?) come and kiss the crown of Šišlam-Rba
And rest in its shelter
Evermore.

311

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that they set the great crown

[1] At the "coronation of a king", i.e. ordination of a priest, seven "kings" (priests) must assist the ganzibra who is chief celebrant.

[2] A free translation: the rite of clasping the right hand in oath. "King Manhiriel" = the chief celebrant at the "coronation".

[3] For 'ṣṭria read, as in No. 392 (the same prayer) 'ṣṭararbḫ. D.C. 3 p. 336 has 'ṣṭria, (so has D.C. 34 and B.M.O. 6592 : 380).

Upon the Teacher of 'uthras, Šišlam-Rba,
Jordans formed themselves at his right,
At his right jordans formed themselves
And the cloud Šašqaliel 1) (journeyed?) 2) with them,
With them (journeyed?) the cloud Šašqaliel
And a škinta was founded for (him her ?) in the jordan;
For (him her ?) in the jordan a škinta was founded 3).
And in the ether a banner was unfurled for him.
Kings of the worlds of light assembled,
All laying their pure right hands upon him,
Laying their hands of troth (kušṭa) on the crown of Šišlam-Rba,
And blessing it and honouring it
In the highest degree.

[These seven prayers of Šišlam-Rba shall be recited by the ganzibra when placing the crown on a postulant and the priests shall recite these seven other hymns and make the antiphonal response.]

312

In the name of the Great Life!
Blessed is this pure voice and blessed your planting!
Blessed is this new crown and blessed this hymning!
And blessed is this sanctuary (škinta) in which kings are sitting!
For ever and aye.

313

In the name of the Great Life!
O king, thou art a mirror! (Yea)
Radiance art thou, of genuine form;
Oh thou art a lofty force!
For all strength 4) is derived from thee!
Blessed is this new crown
And blessed its treasure which thou hast shared with them
For ever and aye.

---

1) The root ŠŠQL (Šaf. ŠQL) is used with sails or wings. The "cloud Mašql'il" (var. Mišql'il) is mentioned in the (Lidzbarski's trs. p. 402) l. 26.

2) Here rdibun, but in the same prayer later (No. 393) qrabun. B.M. Or 6592 : 391 rdabun. D.C. 3 p. 337 : 6 has rdubun. The reflection of a cloud in water is a symbol of marriage. Cf. Prayer No. 188.

3) Probably "for him".

4) Lit. "all strengths" in the plural.

314

In the name of the Great Life!
How wondrous is the strength of the Great (Life) [1],
And how great is the glory which thou sheddest on us!
Thou hast illumined us with thy great radiance
And we praise thee and the crown of Šišlam-Rba.
We magnify it and honour it
And bring it our homage
For ever and aye!

315

In the name of the Great Life!
Our father, thou art a king, a son of kings,
For thou puttest on the crown for kings,
The crown thou puttest on is for kings [2]
And thou bestowest victory on palm-trees [3].
Šišlam blesseth his crown
And 'uthras and sanctuaries (škinata) establish it.
Cause some of thy glory, which is great,
To rest upon us, and give us ..... [4]
So that our minds may rejoice in it
For ever and aye.

316

In the name of the Great Life!
Hail to him! Again, hail to the king of kings,
Šišlam-Rba! Hail to him on whom the hand of a king
Hath set his crown[5]; whose kingdom abideth and passeth not away.
It passeth not away, the kingdom of a king
As long as air and water flow -
For ever and aye.

317

In the name of the Great Life!

[1] D.C. 3, p. 338 : 9 "of 'uthras".

[2] In Prayer No. 397 the couplet is tagia lmalkia tarṣit tagia tarṣit lmalkia (thou puttest crowns on kings).

[3] The palmtree is the symbol of "the Father", (see p. 14, n. 6.) also of priesthood.

[4] "Give us thereof? No. 397 has uahbilan ḏ 'uṣran hadibẖ; D.C. 3 p. 339 : 1, uahbalan etc. ("Give us that in which our minds delight").

[5] Bis.

Thou art the Teacher [1]) of ganzibria [2]),
Thou art the King of all 'uthras!
Good is it for him who beholdeth Thee with his eyes,
Good is it for him who discerneth Thee in his thought! [3])
He shall rise with Thee to the Place of Light.

318

In the name of the Great Life!
My day, what is it amongst days? A day.
My day, what is it amongst hours? A single hour.
What is my day amongst the days?
The day on which a kingdom was accepted.
My day, what is it amongst days?
The day on which treasure was divided.
The King divided His treasure
And gave his kingdom to Šišlam-Rba.
Šišlam-Rba shone in his crown
And we praise and magnify Thee
Because Thou art called the Teacher of 'uthras
For ever and aye.

[These are seven antiphonal hymns. The response [4]) to these hymns of "Šišlam-Rba" shall be recited by the priests. Should the ganzibra recite those hymns, the ganzibra shall recite one and the priests one.]

319

In the name of the Great Life!
Thy strength shall increase, our father,
And grow mighty by means of this secret mystery, Zihrun,
By which all 'uthras are fortified.
Be strengthened and increased in might and power
By this seal-ring [5]) which is bestowed upon thee,
And thou hast authority over it.

---

[1]) Rbaihun = "their teacher".

[2]) Ganzibria, (plu. of ganzibra). Now the title of the chief priest.

[3]) The words b'uṣriḫ, "in his thought", omitted in No. 317, are in No. 398 (which includes both Nos. 316 and 317), and also in D.C. 3, p. 339 : 12. The line is repeated in No. 398.

[4]) Pasuk = response; the part read by the priests in an antiphonal hymn.

[5]) At coronation (ordination), the new priest is invested with his ring of office; a gold seal-ring upon which are engraven the words Šum yawar ziwa ("the name of Yawar-Ziwa"). It is worn on the little finger of the right hand.

Thou hast been given authority over a treasure [1]
Of living flame, and over a Root
Which is the product of gardens [2].
Go, become great and glorious! [3]
Guard thyself, be confirmed (in office)
By this seal-ring which is set upon thee
So that thy strength may increase Yonder,
And the Elect righteous may be uplifted by thy fame!
And Life is victorious!

[This hymn for the seal-ring shall be recited by the ganzibra and priests over the seal-ring for the novice-priest when he assumeth thereby his kingship.]

320

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that they set the crown on the king
And the king accepted his kingship,
His radiance was seen in the light of the banners [4],
And the water-springs that were in the jordan
Waltzed [5] with one another!
The king took his crown
And was resplendent in its sublime radiance.
And he distributed crowns to the kings,
To the kings he distributed crowns [6].
And his brilliance, his light and his great glory
Rested upon them
For ever and aye.

[The ganzibra chants this hymn to them (whilst) distributing crowns amongst the 'uthras[7] and kings, and the 'uthras and kings give him myrtle;they give him myrtle.] [8]

---

[1] Kimṣa, see p. 195, n. 3 and p. 119, n. 2.

[2] A play on words br gninia, lit. a son of mysteries (things hidden) is also "a son of gardens".

[3] In D.C. 3 'tgadal is repeated.

[4] The word drabša comes from the P. درفش = a bright or glittering object "anything glittering or flashing".

[5] Or "whirled round together", i.e. danced for joy.

[6] At the coronation rite of a postulant to priesthood, newly woven fillets ("crowns") are distributed to ganzivri and priests present at the rite.

[7] The word 'uthras refers to the ganzivri, just as malkia ("kings") means "priests".

[8] The rubric in D.C. 3 differs: it directs the ganzibra to distribute myrtle with the crowns.

321

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that the kings assembled (to be)
In company with the king, the son of kings,
And he distributed crowns and treasures to the kings[1]),
The kings extended their right hands,
Their right hands the kings held out,
And they received crowns from the king,
Crowns they received from the king.
And they bless him with a great benediction
And honour him who gave them crowns and treasures
For ever and aye.

[The priests shall repeat this hymn, taking the crowns from the ganzibra who set the crown on the postulant.]

322

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that a vision was verified by eyes [2]) (?)
And the newly-inaugurated [3]) banner was purified (?) [4]) thereby
Its inauguration (consecration) [3]) was shared amongst the banners
And the banners shone in its radiance,
They shone with great radiance and praised the king's crown.
They praised the king's crown [5]) and said to it
"Thy counterpart [6]) shineth in the ether,
In the ether thy counterpart shineth
And the ether delighteth in thee!
'Uthras, kings and jordans praise thy counterpart
For ever and aye.

[The ganzibra shall recite this prayer for the sewing of the postulant's crown. When praying the devotions before the secret prayer is said, he shall sew the postulant's crown and shall recite this prayer over the crown.] [1]

---

[1]) Lines in italics are missing in No. 321, but are given in No. 402 (p. 477 in the text), also in D.C. 3 p. 341, and B.M. Or. 6592 : 423.

[2]) Or "his vision". Tiqnat = was stabilised i.e. realised.

[3]) Mšaria = "begun", "new, "inaugurated": as a derived meaning "consecrated". The new priest has his own banner, a new one. Read drabša here as in Prayer No. 403 (text p. 347) not drabšia.

[4]) Both D.C. 53 and D.C. 3 have here 'ṣṭalalbh ([illegible] = "prepared "purified") B.M. Or. 6592 : 4 has 'ṣalalbh. D.C. 53 No. 403, however has 'tkalalbh = "is perfected thereby".

[5]) No. 404 has "praised the great crown".

[6]) Or "thine archetype".

323

In the name of the Great Life!
Shine forth, give out light, pure Mirror!
For in all worlds thou wilt be called "Illuminator".
Rise to thy feet, great 'uthra!
Let all thy treasure awake [2] for us
That we may shine and rejoice thereat:
'Uthras and kings who sit in this sanctuary
Will beam and rejoice thereat!
From beginning to end.

[The priests and ganzivri who are sitting in the sanctuary shall recite this hymn when the postulant comes and sits upon a chair. Then he shall rise to his feet and recite the appointed prayers (mandiz) as far as the prayer "Darkness is crushed down"; with witnesses, one on his right and the other on his left.]

324

In the name of the Great Life!
Thou enlightenest them by thy word(s)
Sublime [3] and pure,
And glorifiest the worlds by thy glory.
Our father, thou enlightenest them
By thy pure eloquence
And thy root shall be exalted
And attain the summit.

[The priests and ganzivri shall recite this hymn when the postulant is ending his set pieces, and the witnesses shall sit and recite this hymn, as below.]

---

[1] The crown is tubular. At the consecration of a priest long tubes of woven silk and cotton are cut by the ganzibra into short lengths: two of silk for himself and the postulant, 24 of cotton for other priests (if the postulant is the ganzibra's first pupil). Women present sew the ends together so as to form "crowns", but it appears from the above insertion that the ganzibra himself completes the silken crown of the new priest.

[2] The "treasure" which the new priest is to "awake" or "illumine" (the word means both), is his accurate recitation of the Book of Souls before the assembly of examining priests.

[3] Only D.C. 3, p. 342 has šania. B.M. Or. 6592 : 126 also omits.

325 [1]

In the name of the Great Life!
The Great (Life) rejoiced, It was glad
That Yawar hath looked [2] for a banner of radiance.
And the Rays of Light rejoiced because
We have crushed down darkness
And brought to nought the rebellious Voice.
If thus we have acted, and thus it was ordained,
Then it is You, the Well-Ordered,
(Who hath) ordained it.

[The witnesses recite this hymn whilst sitting on chairs, and shall recite all the hymns (given) below.]

326

In the name of the Great Life!
Our father, thou art a pure mirror!
In all worlds thou hast become an Illuminator.
Rejoice, our father! and take joy
In all thy kingliness!
Thou, our father, art he in whom we shine and glory,
And (in whom) the 'uthras and kings
In this sanctuary shine and glory
For evermore.

[All shall recite this hymn; then the postulant (when) he has risen [3], shall kiss them on their heads, give them myrtle to smell at, and shall kiss the ganzibra and take the book [4]) from him.]

327

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that Myrtle emerged from the Wellspring [5]
And her waters, it grew upward [6] in its glory.
The waters rushed forth and were divided
And ether emanated from light.

---

[1] This prayer (No. 325) is the only one of the coronation series translated by Lidzbarski; (M.L. p. 272).

[2] I suspect strongly that the original had *sakakl*ḫ = "planted", ("stuck in") the banner. The pointed end of the pole is driven into the earth.

[3] The Perfect tense.

[4] The Book of Souls.

[5] The "Wellspring" = the "Mother", see p. 14, n. 5.

[6] 'tgadal = "became great", "was raised up" (to dignity).

The king took the first myrtle [1]
From the hand of the new king
Who by him had been instructed in the sublime mystery.
He twined him [2] a (myrtle-) wreath;
On the jordan he bestowed its purity.
The king was ratified (?) [3] by the myrtle
And the jordan crowned [4] by the king,
They are reciprocally crowned [5], mutually aggrandised
And rise and behold the Place of Light.

[The ganzibra recites this hymn, takes the myrtle from him, smells at it, twists a wreath for himself, twists a wreath for the postulant and gives it to the postulant who takes the wreath and staff. Then he gives the order that they should honour (their crowns).]

328

In the name of the Great Life!
Blessed be this škinta of the Mighty (Life)
In which crowns have been formed
Crowns have been formed in it
And a crown for a king, son of kings, was set on,
A crown was set on a king, son of kings.
All the kings pay homage to thee [6]
And kings, 'uthras, Tannas and Drops
All bow down and reverence thee
In whom crowns (or "his crown") and mysteries
Have been confirmed
And škintas; an indwelling of the Mighty (Life)
Hath proceeded from thee (?) [7].

---

[1] One would expect "from his first-born", but the bukra refers to the first myrtle that the new king twines as a king into a wreath.

[2] D.C. 3 omits gdalḫ and has asia for asa.

[3] D.C. 3 has triṣ for tqun. Cf. the barsom as confirmation of Persian kingship.

[4] The Ethpe. and Ethpe. pf KRK (to turn, surround, enfold, encircle etc.) have many derived meanings. 'tkarak "crowned" occurs in the phrase hu taga 'tirṣa ḏ-malkia bgauḫ 'tkarak (D.C. 36) "it is a crown set on, wherewith kings were crowned".

[5] D.C. 3 has the correct mitkarkin: D.C. 53, No. 408 p. 480 1.1. has mitgadlin

[6] In the other mss ldilak. The cult-hut, scene of the coronation, is addressed

[7] Škinat kabiria minak praš, The meaning appears to be that the Great Life is incarnate in the priest's office. Škinat here might be rendered as "shecinah", "indwelling"?

And in thee the elect righteous will be uplifted;
They will worship and give praise
For thou wilt be called
"A škinta which nourisheth sucklings"
For ever and aye.

[This is the prayer for the consecration of the cult-hut (škinta) when thou intendest to take thither the first postulant on the Sunday. The priests recite this hymn before entering the cult-hut; (they recite it) and then they enter the cult-hut.]

329 1)

In the name of the Great Life!
Oh a burnished treasure art thou!
Oh a glittering thing 2) art thou!
(Thou) mirror 3) of kings!
In its glory kings shine; they shine in its glory.
They prepare crowns with his; 4)
Crowns they fashion with his.
Watersprings are crowned (?) by his (crown) 5)
And watersprings, radiancies 6) and mirrors
Worship the great Crown: they praise it, guard it
And say to it "Blessed is this (thine) appearance
Which we praise; and by it, in thy škinta
We shall be guided aright, we shall be rightly guided 7)
In thy škinta, and with thee we shall be united
For ever and ever.

[This is the hymn for the releasing 8) of crowns on the Sunday

1) This prayer is the last in Lidzbarski's collection, but his version differs from those in my collection, cf. the two texts. He takes it as an address to the banner (which it is not, even in the Oxford version, see l. 2 of the prayer) for it is addressed to the crown and its wearer.

2) Drabša here is "that which glitters" see p. 226, n. 4; not "banner": the crown is meant. (P. درفشان = "to shine".)

3) Or "vision".

4) The reference, as the insertion which follows it shows, is to the preparation and presentation of crowns to all the priests present at the ceremony.

5) Lidzbarski (and the Oxford ms.) bziwḫ mitkarkan. Bziwḫ is missing in D.C. 53, and I translate mitkarkan in the same sense as "And the jordan crowned by the king". see p. 230, n. 4'

6) Or "radiant beings". (Lidzbarski Glanzwesen.)

7) Nitriṣ. (TRṢ to make or set right, etc.)

8) Or "inauguration", "consecration" see p. 227, n. 3.

when the ganzibra wishes to consecrate [1] the cotton crowns for the priests [2]. Wearing all his vestments [3] and all his clothes [4], the crown in his right hand and the staff in his left, he goes to the bank of the Piriawis, the jordan, and takes also in his right hand with his own crown the cotton crowns which he wisheth to consecrate. Then he performs the ritual ablution in the jordan and comes towards the kinta [5] and the banner. And he examines all the clothes and recites the Asuta [6] to the Gate of Mercies [7] and the kings as much as he is able. And after that he entones this prayer over each crown, once over every one. And Life is victorious.]

These are the antiphonal hymns of Šišlam-Rba and their refrain, the hymn of the ring, and all the hymns for postulants (ordination hymns). I copied this collection from beginning to end for myself, so that I might act and be successful in the world and that there may be one to mention my name on earth and yonder in the mighty and lofty worlds of light. For I have copied with a sincere and believing heart: my heart hath testified to the Life and to my lord Manda-ḏ-Hiia, so that they would be my support and my saviour. I am poor and lowly. . . (etc.)

(The colophon resembles other colophons in the book) . . . .

This miscellany of the Coronation was set in order and brought to successful conclusion from beginning to end in the name of the Life and as a token of Knowledge-of-Life and trust in the high King of Light, and in the names of Hibil, Šitil and Anuš — praised be their names in the great Place, the House of Perfection! It was completed on Friday (yuma ḏ-rahaṭia) which is 'rufta (Friday), the fourth of the month Akir-Paiiz (Last-of-Autumn) which is Ṭabit, Capricornus, in the year of Wednesday (i. e. which began on a Wednesday) in the year 1217 by Arab computation — may the world founder upon them and Manda-ḏ-Hiia bring to nought their rage against the congregation of souls!

It was copied in Huwaiza, by the waters of Karka. . . (etc.)

[2] Plural in D.C. 3.

[3] Mania in D.C. 3

[4] I think that this means the new priest's clothes later inspected at the kinta.

[5] An altar in box form.

THE BANNER HYMNS [1]

In the name of the Great Life! may there be health, victory and forgiveness of sins for me, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš because of these antiphonal hymns for the banner.

330

In the name of the Great Life!
When radiance came forth the white land, Paris [2],
A young lad, Arsapan, son of radiant-beings,
Unfurled a banner [3]. He unfurled a great radiance
So that 'uthras and *škinta*s shone in the banner's brilliance,
They shone in the brilliance of his banner
(That was) like the radiance in the House of the Mighty (Life)

331

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that Šišlam-Rba [4] unfurled his banner
Over corporate beings [5],
Three hundred and sixty wellsprings
Of radiance, light and glory were formed by him.
The glory of Šišlam-Rba's banner
Shone forth over three [6] Wellsprings of Radiance
And the three wellsprings of Radiance
Who beheld the brightness of Šišlam-Rba's banner
Prostrated themselves before its glory:
They prostrated themselves,
The three wellsprings of radiance,
Praising the banner
To all eternity.

---

[1] Lidzbarski included nineteen of the banner hymns in his collection (M.L. pp. 264 ff.).

[2] Lidzbarski (M.L. p. 264, n. 1) suggests that "Paris" is "Pars, Persis im Gegensatz zum Schwarzland (sawwād) Babylonien so benannt".

[3] For the banner as a light-symbol see p. 231, n. 2 and p. 226, n. 4.

[4] The great Šišlam is the archetype of king (priest) and bridegroom.

[5] 'Usṭunia = lit. "bodies" (headless). 'Usṭuna is the word used in priestly commentaries to connote the physical; the trunk (column) of Adams "Body", i.e. the universe conceived as a human shape.

[6] "Wellsprings" are, I imagine, a poetical name given to the three celebrants necessary for a masiqta: other ceremonies require seven concelebrants. See l. 5 of the next hymn.

332

In the Name of the Great Life!
On the day that Šišlam-Rba unfurled his banner
Its glory shone out over three hundred and sixty thousand jordans,
The glory of the banner of Šišlam-Rba
Shone out over seven wellsprings,
And the wellspring Ṣihmai[1] spurted upward
Before the radiance of Šišlam-Rba's banner.
The perfume in the banner was delightful
And (as) it appeared over the škinata (sanctuaries).
How it becometh Šišlam-Rba when he is illumined
By the wondrous banner Zihrun!
How beauteous it maketh Šišlam-Rba
When he is proclaimed King of all beams of light!

333

In the Name of the Great Life!
On the day that Šišlam-Rba shook out the banner Pirun
And unfurled it at the head of the škinta,
Its glory shone out over Wellspring and Palmtree[2].
(When) the Wellspring and Palmtree beheld[3]
The glory of Šišlam-Rba's banner,
A gush of radiance inundated Šišlam-Rba's banner
And made his banner, Pirun, bright
Beyond measure.

334

In the Name of the Great Life!
On the day that the banner Šišlamiel was unfurled,
Its radiance beamed forth over three hundred and sixty
Worlds of Light.
Over three hundred and sixty worlds of light
Its radiance beamed forth.
And the three hundred and sixty worlds of light

---

[1] ṢHM = "to be brilliant".
[2] See p. 14, notes 5 and 6.
[3] ḏ hzatẖ is influenced by the gender of aina.

Which beheld the brightness of the banner Šišlamiel
All flocked towards it,
Towards it they all gathered
And uttered a benediction on the banner of the Great Bihram 1), Saying to it, "Thy radiance, (O) banner Manhariel,
Hath dawned and thine appearance shone out,
And thy jordan hath strength and flow 2)
From end to end.

335

In the Name of the Great Life!
On the day that Bihram the Great unfurled the banner Šišlamiel,
Its radiance shone out over the waters,
Over the waters its radiance dawned,
Its radiance dawned over the waters
From the waters its radiance flooded upward
Its radiance surged up from the waters
And shone out over the worlds.
Worlds and kings who beheld the radiance of
The banner Šišlamiel, all gather towards it,
All gather towards it and utter blessing
Upon the banner of Šišlam-Rba and say to it
"Blessed be thou, Šišlamiel-Banner,
And blessed be the man that hath unfurled thee.
Great glory hath he given thee
And great is the crown 3) he set on thee!
He hath given thee myrtle which strengtheneth 'uthras:
Jordans exult 4) in thy radiance
And 'uthras delight in thy fragrance Exceedingly".

336

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that Šišlam-Rba unfurled his banner

---

1) In the Vendidad (19:37). Varathragna's epithet is barō-χᵛarəna: usually translated "glory".

2) Motion.

3) At the consecration of the banner, which is extended full length before the white silk is draped over the crosspiece, a myrtle-wreath is slipped over the peak by the priest or priests officiating.

4) D.C. 3 has šahfia "flow out", D.C. 53 (like M.L.) šahbia (ŠHB to exult in, vaunt, joy in etc.).

The radiance of Bihram-Rba's banner
Shone forth like the great mirror
That resteth in the Jordan.
Its radiance appeared and his škinta
Shone, and his people [1]) were confirmed in victory.
And Life is victorious.

[Recite these seven hymns for the banner when unfurling it [2]).]

337 [3])

In the name of the Great Life
It hath risen, it hath shone forth
Thy radiance, king of 'uthras!
It came; upon the 'uthras and *škinta*s it shone.
The 'uthras and the *škinta*s who beheld thy glory
All bless thee with a blessing,
A blessing they pronounce upon thee
And the 'uthras honour thee
Because thou camest into existence
Through the hand of a king.
The king blessed thee with a great blessing
And gave it (thee?) to me, Hibil-Ziwa.
To me, Hibil-Ziwa he gave it
To give light to worlds, to kings
And to jordans and *škinta*s
All of them, fully.

338

Hibil blessed thee with a great blessing
And gave thee to the Occult Adam [4]),
Adam blessed thee with a great blessing
And gave thee to the Chosen Elect.
He gave thee to the Chosen Elect
To enlighten and stabilise their counterparts [5])
Fully.

---

[1]) Šurbta, a race, tribe, family, descendants, kinsfolk.

[2]) These seven prayers are said by a priest over the banner during the recitation of his daily office.

[3]) This prayer and 348 are said whilst crouching and holding the staff of the banner.

[4]) This Occult Adam, is the cosmic Adam, archetype of the physical Adam.

[5]) The dmuta is the over-soul, the counterpart of the earthly being in the ideal world of Mšunia Kušṭa. It often acts as conscience or guardian angel, according to commentaries,

339

The Chosen Righteous rose to their feet
And grasped thee with their right hands.
They went to the jordan of living water
And set thee up, so that thy radiancy
Might be shed on the jordan.
The water and thy brightness become blended together;
Thy brightness and the water are combined
Enhancing (the brilliance of) Šilmai and Nidbai.
And these, the elect who go to the jordan,
Are illumined by thy radiance.
Do thou guard them and establish them
And make their baptism successful!
Life is victorious.

[Chant these hymns before thou conveyest the banner to the jordan.]

340

In the name of the Great Life!
Who took up the banner Zihrun
In which the worlds and generations glory
And went to the bank of the jordan Piriawis?
The jordan Piriawis on beholding the brilliancy
Of the banner Zihrun, leapt towards its radiance:
The waters and jordan and springs which dwell
In the jordan (Piriawis) leap towards the radiance
Of the banner Zihrun and exult exceedingly.

341

In the name of the Great Life!
Yawar took up the banner Šišlamiel
In which the worlds and generations exult,
And went to the bank of the jordan Piriawis.
The jordan Piriawis when it beheld the banner Zihrun
Rejoiced with a great joy, exceedingly.

[Chant these hymns and take the banner to the jordan and plant it on the bank of the jordan. Then recite "Shine forth, shine forth, brightness of Yawar".]

342

In the name of the Great Life!
Shine forth, let Yawar's radiance shine forth
Over the jordan. The brightness of the banner
Hath shone forth over the living waters! It shone forth:
The waters dance towards its radiance
And the radiance towards the waters. Waters and radiance
Are intermingled [1]), are interlaced, and its brightness
Inspiriteth the 'uthras in their *škinta*s
Immeasurably.

(Recite these hymns when thou graspest the banner on the jordan-bank. Then recite "As the head of three škintas".)

343

In the name of the Life,
As head of the three škinata [2]) —
Who was set up as their head (Chief)?
Whom did they set up as their chief?
Who unfurled the banner at the jordan,
Who at the jordan unfurled the banner?
And who took the staff into the jordan?
As the head of the three škinata
Who placed the great crown on their heads [3])?
On their heads and banners Yukašar placed the great crown;
He unfurled the banner at the jordan,
Yukašar unfurled at the jordan the banner
And Yusmir took the staff into the jordan.
And Life is victorious.

[Recite these hymns whilst grasping the banner on the jordan bank [4]), then perform thy baptism).[5]]

344

In the name of the Great Life!

---

[1]) Or "embraced one another".

[2]) Three cult-huts? Or are, as I think may be the case, three concelebrants meant?

[3]) D.C. 53, p. 363 and D.C. 3, p. 235 have brišaiin udrabšaiin. Lidzbarski, using De Morgan's transcription, (D.M. p. 175) has brišaian. "on our heads" and omits mention of the banners.

[4]) The banner is grasped first below the peak and then, standing, above the peak.

[5]) Or "perform thine immersion".

The Great (Life) rejoiced; It rejoiced when Yawar looked [1]
Towards the banners of radiance and beams of light.
It rejoiced that we have trodden down darkness
And have brought to nought the rebellious Voice.
If we have done thus and it was brought about,
Nevertheless it is You, the (well-)ordered,
Who have ordained it!

345

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that 'uthras put into order
A jordan of living water
And a baptism was performed therein,
They took the banner Bihram
And brought it into the škinta of Šišlam-Rba.
And at the door of his House of Radiance
They unfurled it so that 'uthras and *škinta*s
Might shine in its brightness and rejoice
Exceedingly.

[Recite these two hymns after thou hast performed the baptism, and take the banner into the cult-hut.]

346

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that great Bihram furled his banner
Three hundred and sixty guardians presided thereat [2].
They concealed it in its strong-box [3]
And set the seals of the mighty (Life) upon it.
The mighty (Life) blesseth with His pure mouth
The Being who had settled here, and saith to him
"Lend with increase some of thy radiance,
And illumine the whole world with thy light!"
Our father enlighteneth with his wondrous voice;

[1] For skarlḫ, D.C. 53, p. 363, 1.17, read skalḫ as in D.C. 3, D.M. and other mss.

[2] I.e. were present, lit. rested upon it.

[3] Lidzbarski (M.L. 273 : 9) transliterates בסאפטיא and translates "Ketten von Edelsteinen". D.M. however (178: penult.) like D.C. 53 (364 : 11) and D.C. 3 (236 : 21) has bṣafṭia hiliḫ. Safṭa (the more usual form of the word) in Arabic and Persian = "chest for valuables", "wallet", "purse" "casket" etc. and occurs several times in Mandaean texts in this sense. (e.g. bsafṭia ḏ-zahba, D.C. 36 II no. 189). The banner is, in fact, kept in a box.

And he said, "Any man who is pious and believing,
Who went not early in the morning to the jordan
Nor is signed with the sign of the jordan...... [1]))
Utterly.

[Recite this hymn and fold up the banner on the great day of Daima [2]), by itself. And, any day on which thou baptisest, fold the banner [3]) and cover it up with this hymn.]

347

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that the radiance of the banner Šašlamiel [4])
Was hidden in its casket of radiance,
All the 'uthras rose from their seats.
And pronouncing a sublime blessing upon Zihrun-Šašlamiel [5])
The banner, they took it from its pedestal [6]) of radiance
To inner houses [7]) so that it was hidden.
They cover it, bless it, guard it and say to it,
"As surely as thy radiance waiteth safe in its casket,
Will thy form be kept safe. All worlds which behold thee
Will bless and praise thee for ever and aye".

[Recite this prayer and furl the banner when thou hast finished all thy rites. Recite it by itself alone and fold it before they cover (put away) the banner of the day, whilst thy crown is on thy head, except at the festival of Daima. (On that day?) read both hymns. Then roll up the banner and hide it in its chest (or "casket"). And Life is victorious!)[8]]

348 [THE BLESSED OBLATION PRAYERS]

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that Ayar (Ether, Air) emerged from the Wellspring
The waters flowed hither, hither flowed the waters
And radiance in the jordan. (The use of)

---

[1]) A line must be missing, condemning such a man, for the daily ablution and signing at the jordan is a religious duty. The version given is on all copies I saw, including D.M. p. 178.

[2]) The feast of Daima, a baptism-feast, occurs ninety days after Panja (Parwanaiia), the five intercalary days.

[3]) The banner is about three meters long and an ell wide.

[4]) Var. Šišlam'il.

[5]) Not Zihrun and Šašlamiel as written (v. D.M. op. cit. pl. 178 : 10).

[6]) Its base, its column, i.e. the banner-pole.

[7]) Lit. "to inner eggs".

[8]) Here Lidzbarski's collection has No. 329 (given in this book on p. 231).

Myrtle was appointed. 1) they twine its sprigs
And its destination 2) is the sacred table 3).
We ašgandia (acolytes) have become acolytes 4)
And were admitted into the radiance of the mighty (Life);
By the radiance of the mighty (Life) we are sheltered.
And the Wreath is set up, into circlets it was twined,
It was plaited with myrtle leaves.
Trees bore their fruit (lit. "burden")
Naṣirutha was manifest in the full jordan
And they were refreshed in the full jordan,
Before you, 'uthras, my brothers,
Fully.

The šganda reciteth this hymn for the Blessed Oblation when the myrtle and phial are in his hand. Then the ganzibra taketh the myrtle and phial of wine 5) from the acolyte and reciteth "Come, come, lofty acolyte, from the House of my Father".]

349

In the name of the Great Life!
Come, come, lofty messenger 6),
Come, come from the House of my Father!
Come and irradiate us with the radiance of Life,
With the radiance of Life irradiate us!
And refresh us with some of the good things 7) Provided there 8). For thou 9) art called Sustainer 10) of 'uthras for ever and aye.

---

1) Myrtle and its ritual inhalation is an important rite in the "Blessed Oblation". Cf. the barsom in early Zoroastrian ritual.

2) Lit. "its course, ("its journey) is to".

3) The patura, corresponds to the sacramental table or altar. It may be a clay table, or a mat, or a purified washed surface. The sacred meal is arranged on it, see p. 61, n. 5.

4) Ašganda, šganda, see p. 5, n. 4. Usually a young man or boy who must be of priestly birth. He is consecrated for his office every time he officiates.

5) The "wine" is unfermented.

6) Šganda, in its more ancient meaning, see p. 5, n. 4.

7) Ṭabuta ("goodness", "good things") here refers to the food-offerings.

8) A better version of this prayer occurs in D.C. 42 ls. 617 ff. uṭaibinan mn ṭabuta ḏ-'šra (var. 'šria) 'lḫ aminṭul ḏ-mṭaibana ḏ-'uthria 'tiqrit. The same version occurs in D.C. 50. The form is Afel. Cf. Hif. שׁרי (J., 2) "to provide a living for".

9) 'tiqria in both D.C. 3 and D.C. 53. I prefer 'tiqrit, see n. 8.

10) Mṭaibana = one who refreshes or provides with food and drink, "sustainer", "food-giver" etc.

[The ganzibra shall recite this hymn and take the phial of wine and the myrtle from the acolyte]

350

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that a root of fresh myrtle
Was set up before the king,
The king stretched forth his right hand for it
And gave it to the 'uthras and acolytes
And said to them "Take from me this fresh myrtle
And bless the škinata [1] with a blessing,
A blessing pronounce on the škinata
And illumine and restore the 'uthras and škinata
Situate at thy right and at thy left
For ever and aye. [2]

[The ganzibra shall recite this hymn and distribute myrtle to the 'uthras [3] and priests. Then they shall recite the "sealing" prayers, [4] to the end of that which blesseth (bless) the Blessed Oblation, and he shall seal (conclude) it.]

In the name of the Great First Strange Life from worlds of light, the Ineffable who is above all works, may there be health, purity, and forgiving of sins for me, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš ...... (etc., the usual insertions with family names occurs in all mss.)

And we shall be blessed by means of these prayers and benedictions of the pihtania [5] of the Blessed Oblation, and our thought, mind and understanding shall be enlightened by the might of Yawar-Ziwa and Simat-Hiia.

351

In the name of the Great Life!
This is the Blessed Oblation!
Kušṭa regaleth his friends,

[4] Hatamata = confirmatory or concluding prayers.

[5] Pihta (= "opened"). Bread broken ritually and distributed and eaten sacramentally is so called. Cf. the Aramaic "piece", "bread (Targ. O. Gen. xviii t.; Targ. Y. ib.xl, 16); etc. See p. 37, n. 3. pihtania appears to be the plural form, "pieces of bread").

Kušṭa his friends regaleth,
He hath prepared and blessed it with his blessing.
I testify to Yawar-Ziwa
Of whose bounty we have partaken(?) [1]

352

In the name of the Great Life!
I am the white Pihta [2]
From Life's treasure-house was I transplanted;
I was transplanted from the treasure-house of the Great Life,
With [3] the jordan they sent me to earth,
With the jordan to earth they sent me
To spread truth in the world,
In the world to spread truth,
To enlighten darkened hearts,
My treasure, which I instilled into it [4].
I illumined and transformed it completely
Completely did I illumine and transform it.
I brought and [5] set down in it a good [6] (gift)
I removed from it the misery [7]
Which the Seven had brought to bodies
(That) the Seven had brought to bodies
And they dwelt in darkened hearts.
Pihta they ate not. (but) his Creator spoke
And made man, who ate not pihta,
Listen to Him. And He said,
"Look to it lest ye eat with a lie!
Beware that ye eat not falsely!
Look to it lest ye partake of it hypocritically!"
For the wicked and liars who eat it with falsehood

[1] Or, if we read, as in D.C. 53. pp. 376, 379, 380, 382 and D.C. 3,pp. 247, 248, 250 and 251, "who quickeneth us with his bounty".

[2] Wheat for the pihta is the best and whitest. Ground by the priest, it is mixed with water from river or jordan (salt being first added). Formed into discs, the dough is baked over the ritual brazier just before use. The pihta consumed during the masiqta by the priest as proxy for the deceased is made otherwise. See W.W. pp. 242-255 for full description of the rite.

[3] Or "from the jordan".

[4] I.e. into the world.

[5] D.C. 3 has atit "I went" (as translated in Z.D.M.G. Band 105, Heft,1 p. 134, 1. 5.)

[6] Ṭabta = "a good thing, gift", etc. or "goodness". See p. 254 n. 1.

[7] Lit. "sighing" "lamentation".

Will be bound and lie in darkness,
They will be bound and lie in darkness,
Darkness degraded 1) and lay heavy upon them.
The eyes of the wicked look on darkness
And their feet find nothing stable.
(But) the good, who eat it with sincerity
Arise and behold the Place of Light.
Their eyes behold the light
And their feet find firmness.
And Life is triumphant.
I testify to Yawar-Ziwa
Of whose bounty we have partaken 2).

353

In the name of the Great Life!
The white Pihta am I!
The creature of light, I came into existence.
Pihta am I, the white,
For Yawar was my Transplanter 3)
My Creator was Yawar, from his treasury he brought me.
Yawar-Ziwa took me and gave me to Nṣab-Ziwa.
Nṣab-Ziwa took me and gave me to Zarziel-Nhura-Rba.
Zarziel-Nhura-Rba took and gave me to Hibil-Ziwa.
Hibil-Ziwa took and brought me into the earthly world;
He took me, brought me down; set me down in the earthly world.
As food for Adam and all his sons.
Whilst the first generation existed
They ate me in good faith,
In good faith did they eat me;
No trickery 4) did they perform with me,
They performed with me no misuse 4).
Nor did they omit or subtract from 5) me
They committed no omission or subtraction

2) See p. 243, n. 1.

3) Or "creator".

4) Hargta = (a) friction, rubbing (b) "distortion", "obliquity", "false dealing", "misuse": e.g. kušṭana damia lmuzania ḏ-mutaqin ulaiit bgauḫ hargta (G.R. r. 214, Lidzbarski's trs. Der Wahrhafte gleicht einer Wage, die gerade gerichter und an der keine Schiefheit ist. The crookedness is intentional (hrig = "cunning").

5) Lit. "they performed me with nothing lacking or deficient".

And the creatures of the Seven
Had no dominion over me.
When a second generation came into being
They (too) ate me aright,
Sincerely they ate me:
No trickery did they perform with me,
They performed me with no crooked dealing,
They did not omit or subtract from me,
From me they neither omitted nor subtracted
And the creatures of the Seven had no power over me.
When a third generation arose,
Adonai [1]) built a House,
A house did Adonai build,
And the Seven obtained a hold [2]) in it,
Then it was dispersed amongst the three hundred
And sixty two nations [3]).
And then I was taken from their midst
And they cast me amongst the three hundred
And sixty-two nations.
Then they ate me with falsehood,
With falsehood did they eat me,
Wrongly did they use me,
They used me falsely
And did with me that which was deficient and lacking,
That which was deficient and lacking they did with me
And creatures of the Seven gained dominion over me.
Then strength was taken from me,
And radiance, order, taste and glory.
And they made me the fodder of beasts.
Souls departed from bodies without their measure.
Naṣoraeans who eat me falsely
Will be burnt upon coals of fire.
The baptised [4]) in water who eat me with a clot of blood [5])

[4]) Or "immersed in water". (not in mia hiia?).

[5]) Hrara used in a double sense, (a) "illusion", "delusion, (b) "a clot of blood". The reference may be to the Christian chalice, in which the wine is spoken of as "blood".

Will be made to dwell with the demon Mahzur[1].
Any woman who believeth not in prayer and praise

They assumed an air of arrogance;
An air of arrogance they assumed
And going into the presence of Pthahil[4]
Bend and bow themselves before him
And prostrating their forms and uttering compliments
They say: "By thy life, our father Pthahil,
Grant us a commission, that we may go
And may create a creation from start to finish".
Then their father Pthahil arose and gave them commission
And said to them "Go, create the thing that ye have wished (to create)".
Thereupon, with the mystery of ashes and red dust[5]
And the overflow and dregs of the clouds
They went, they created Rice,
They went, they created Rice.
And held it before Pthahil.
Pthahil, when he saw it
Clenched his fists and beat on the forecourt of his breast
And he said "From this creation that ye have created
How can bread (pihta) come therefrom?
How can bread be produced therefrom?
Or food from that thus prepared
From beginning to end?"
Then They summoned an angel, one of (those)
Before Them, by whom Pihta was produced,
By him was Pihta produced.
And they held it before Pthahil.
When Pthahil saw it he brightened

In His benevolence.
In the strength of Hibil-Ziwa
He sent me to this world;

I came, and became an offering set apart
For the world, and source of strength for the priests. 3)
I held a portion of Life,
And called with the voice of a son of the Mighty (Life);
I set apart Sunday and the morn of the day

I revealed (it) to the priests
And dwelt in their hearts.
Goodness I give to them: enlightenment in plenty
So that they be not lacking or faulty.

And Life is victorious.

In the name of the Great Life!
The voice of Manda-ḏ-Hiia
Calling to the chosen righteous,
To the chosen righteous it calleth
Warning them about my Oblation.
It uttered to them a first warning,
Admonishing them about my Oblation.
He said to them: "Behold my oblation,
Behold my oblation, behold my oblation
That was transplanted from the House of the Great Life;
My oblation translated from the House of the Great Life!
Partake thereof in sincerity, silence and purity".
With a second warning he admonisheth them about my oblation
He said to them "Behold my oblation,
Behold my oblation, behold my oblation
Transplanted from the House of the Great Life!
Partake thereof with prayer and praise".
With a third warning he admonisheth them about my oblation.
He said to them "Behold my oblation,
Behold my oblation, behold my oblation
Transplanted from the House of the Great Life,
My oblation transferred from the House of the Great Life.

2) D.C. 53, p. 378 ult. has aklḫ man; D.C. 3 p. 249: 13 f. aklḫ mn. The latter appears the more likely version.

3) Ṣibia. My attempted translation in Z.D.M.G. p. 141:12 (op. cit.) is unconvincing. The whole passage is obscure. The mention just below of the lion lying in the road suggests that ṣibia was in the original ṣidia (hunted, ambushed), but such a simile appears out of place. Ṣibia are evidently people who misuse the zidqa in some way.

4) See n. 3. Rmia (past part. RMA = "cast", "placed", "laid down" or "lying". In Z.D.M.G. I took it as a miscopying of ramia.

My zidqa (charity) [1] is like a mountain,
A mountain over which no highway hath been levelled.
My charity is like a sea,
A sea over which there is no way of crossing. [2]
He who eateth my oblation but surrendereth nothing [3]
Is cut off and will fall into the great Sea of Suf; [4]
He that hath but giveth nought,
His eyes will not behold the Light.
This is a Blessed Oblation!
Kušṭa regaleth his friends,
Kušṭa his friends regaleth!
He prepared and gave it his blessing.
I testify to Yawar-Ziwa [5]
Who refresheth us with his bounty.

357 [6]

Behold my oblation, behold my oblation, behold my oblation!
Who ate it?
The Jews, an evil nation, accursed and blasphemous ate it.
The Kiwanaiia [7] ate it, who cut it (?) in flames of fire.
The demented Yazuqaeans ate it, who reverence fire
Crazed creature who reverence fire
Serving a thing that is powerless.
Idumaeans ate it, who destroyed their virility,
Cast away, destroyed is their manhood,
And they set up Death [8], worshipping him.
Zandiqs (Manichaeans?), who rest on supports of falsehood, ate it,
On pillars of falsehood do they rest
And cut off their seed from the world.
Arabs ate it, evil liars, a wicked race
Who drink blood. Naṣoraeans ate it,

---

[1] Here zidqa has the more abstract meaning of "charity".

[2] D.C. 3 has mabuta, D.C. 53 mabra "traversing".

[3] Or "Is not made perfect therein". Again obscure. My translation is influenced by what follows.

[4] The Sea of Reeds, which swallowed up Pharaoh and his host.

[5] Here, and at the end of the next hymn, D.C. 53 omits Ziwa.

[6] This hymn is not separated from that which precedes it.

[7] Kiwanaiia: "people of Saturn", "Saturn-worshippers"?

[8] Or "a corpse" (מְיתא).

A people, a stock, a family group 1).
The faithful of heart ate it,
Righteous and believing people ate it,
Those baptised in water ate it who at their baptism
Arise and behold the Place of Light.
And Life be praised! Life is victorious!
I testify to Yawar-Ziwa who quickeneth us with his bounty.

In the name of the Great Life be there healing and victory and forgiving of sins for me, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam!

358 2)

In the name of the Life!
When He opened His Garment 3)
And when Radiance was formed,
When Radiance appeared, to whom was light given?
To whom was light given and to whom was enlightenment revealed?
Enlightment, to whom was it revealed,
And on which of the 'uthras did They bestow it?
When He opened the Garment of Life
And the radiance of the Mighty (Life) appeared,
(When) Radiance appeared in its Place,
Light was given to Yawar,
Light to Yawar was given,
And he, Yawar, told it 4) to all the 'uthras.
The 'uthras who listened to the enlightenment (teaching)
Of Yawar, rejoiced and gloried therein to the uttermost.
Without measure they rejoiced and gloried therein
And were stablished thereby completely
He said to them "Rejoice and be edified, (ye) 'uthras
By the enlightenment which your father hath transmitted to you

1) ama kana umkanana (a free translation).

2) The series which follows is devoted to praise of Yawar. The name is derived from YWR or 'WR, and illustrates the use of a regular but rare form of Peal active participle of roots ending in 'r', usually connoting an active agent, e.g. dakar (a mentioner), pašar (a loosener, exorcist) naṭar (watchman, guardian). See N. p. 230. Hence Yawar means one who blinds or dazzles with light.

3) "Opened His Garment", a mystical expression meaning "revealed Himself", "appeared".

4) 'mrḫ in in both mss.: better perhaps "caused it to rest on all the 'uthras".

From the Mighty (Life)!" And they say to him,
"Blessed art thou, our great [1] First Enlightenment
Brought hither for our sakes, by virtue of which
We (too) give light. And we praise the Great (Life)
Who gave thee". And Life be praised!
I testify to Yawar, who quickeneth us
With his bounty!

359

When He opened His Garment
And when Radiance was formed,
When Radiance appeared, to whom was construction [2] entrusted?
To whom was (the work of) construction given?
And who was named as head of reproductive power [3])
Who was named as head of reproductive power?
And who became chief of mighty ones?
When the Life opened Its Garment,
And the Radiance of the Mighty (Life) appeared;
When Radiance was manifested at its place,
Production was entrusted to Yawar,
To Yawar was (the work of) construction given.
He, Yawar, was named head of reproduction [3],
He was created chief of mighty ones.
He implanted the reproductive power
In his brethren, and set them up
And instructed them in their places,
He established them and instructed them
And showed them archetypes
So that all should not pass away.
For the radiance of Yawar [4] is not cut off
From above them in the Secret Place.
The Life accepteth [5] the dues and oblations
Of Yawar who quickeneth us with his bounty.
And Life is victorious.

---

[1] D.C. 3, 252 : 5 'rutan.

[2] Tuqna in both its meanings, "light" and "construction".

[3] See p. 135, n. 2.

[4] Or "dazzling", "dazzler". Yawar is not a loan-word from the Persian yawar "assistant". See p. 252, n. 2.

[5] D.C. 3 hiia qabliḫ, D.C. 53 hiia qabluiḫ. The sentence is somewhat suspect.

360

When He opened His Garment
And when Radiance was formed,
When Radiance formed itself,
On whom did the Great (Life) bestow a good [1] gift
On whom did the Great (Life) bestow bounty?
And whom did They endow [2] with blessing?
When Life opened His Garment,
And the radiance of the Mighty (Life) appeared,
(When) Radiance manifested in its place,
The Great (Life) bestowed bounty on Yawar,
Yawar took the good gift
And therewith refresheth (both) great and small.
He refreshed Yušamin and refreshed the 'uthras his sons,
And the 'uthras, sons of Yušamin.
Rejoice in the benefaction [3]
In the benefaction they rejoice
Wherewith Yawar had refreshed them completely.
Of his benefits they partook [3], all of them,
For the radiance of Yawar is not cut off
From above them in the Occult Place.
And the Great (Life) accepted the fee and oblation
Of Yawar. They partook of his bounty fully.
And Life is victorious.

361

When He opened His Garment
And when Radiance was formed,
When Radiance appeared,
Upon whom was Understanding [4] bestowed?
To whom was Perception given,

---

[1] It must be remembered that these hymns refer to the sacred bread, fruit, vegetables and wine of the Blessed Oblation, i.e. to natural products eaten sacramentally. Hence ṭabta and ṭabuta refer to the good gifts of the Life, and the Pa. of the root ṬUB applied to the sacramental acts of eating and drinking, which impart life and strength to body and soul, is best translated by such words as "refresh", "quicken" and "partake of". The latter word is employed in the same sense that Christian communicants employ it.

[2] Lit. "in whom They made blessing dwell".

[3] Ṭabuta, see above, n. 1.

[4] Madihta = Understanding, perception, discernment. Part of the line missing in D.C. 53.

To whom did They give explanations?
To whom did They explain about all the distinctions 1),
And whom did They proclaim as the Voice of Life
That is not interrupted?
When Life opened His Garment,
And the radiance of the Mighty (Life) appeared,
Radiance appeared in its Place,
Understanding was given to Yawar,
Perception was bestowed on Yawar,
And he, Yawar, hearkened and received understanding of Life.
He was instructed by by Their Word,
And he hearkened to Their pure Voice.
And he came and summoned all the 'uthras.
They came, and heard that which the Life had said to him.
Heed that which the Great (Life) taught!
Heed that which the Great (Life) explained!
And following it, be ye all united!
Hear its praise from me. Rise to the Place of Light!
And Life is victorious.

362

When He opened His Garment
And when Radiance was formed,
When Radiance appeared,
(As) envoy, whom did They send? 2)
Whom did they send as Life's messenger?
Whom did They set in command over them all? 3)
Whom did They put in command over them all?
With Their warning whom did They warn?
When Life opened His Garment,
And the radiance of the Mighty (Life) appeared,
When Radiance appeared in its place,
Yawar They sent (as) Envoy
As Envoy They sent Yawar.
They sent not all (any of) the 'uthras

1) D.C. 3 has lkul afrišta: "about every explanation" (or "distinction"), D.C. 53 lkul afrišata, as translated.

2) The construction is curious but, the context makes it evident that Yawar was the Envoy and not the being to whom an Envoy was sent.

3) For kulhun D.C. 3, 255 : 8 and kulhin D.C. 53, 385 : 3 read lkulhun as in the next line.

They did not send all 'uthras;
Nor did they teach all worlds (persons),
All worlds they did not teach
That they will rise, that they will see Us
That they will rise, and will see Us
And be established in praise of the Mighty.
They say to him [1]), "Blessed and lauded be the Great Life
Who raised thee up that we might praise the Life
And thyself who art sent to us as Life's Envoy".
And Life is victorious!

363

When He opened His Garment
And when Radiance was formed,
When Radiance appeared,
To whom was prayer and praise given?
Prayer and praise, to whom were they given?
And for whom was glory (ziwa) reserved and appointed?
The Great (Life) invested Yawar:
He (They) called him and gave him command, saying to him,
"Go, go, Yawar and make thine appearance
To the Elect Righteous yonder.
Come! rejoice in Us, and gladden the 'uthras with thee.
'Uthras shall be joyful: 'uthras shall rejoice
And 'uthras shall know who is more revered
Than any other [2]).
And Life is victorious.

364

When He opened His Garment,
And when Radiance was formed [3])
When Radiance made its appearance.
To whom was mystic converse [4]) given?
On whom was mystic converse bestowed?
And into whose heart was it poured?
Into the heart of whom was it poured,

---

[1]) I.e., the 'uthras say to Yawar.

[2]) Lit. "than whom".

[3]) 'ṣṭarar in this line is missing in D.C. 3.

[4]) D.C. 3, 256 : 14 has šuta kasiata "talk (of) secret things", but below like D.C. 53, šuta kasita.

Awaking all its perfections?
When the Life opened His Garment
And the Radiance of the Mighty (Life) appeared in its Place,
Mystic converse was given to Yawar.
Yawar was on guard 1) and was watchful!
And came and kept watch over all the 'uthras!
And Life is victorious.

365

When He opened His Garment
And when Radiance was formed,
When Radiance appeared,
Who was the architect of the ether-world?
In the ether-world who was the architect? 2)
Who built a building therein,
In it who built a building?
Who designed it 3), set it in order, 4)
And upheld it so that it shineth
From end to end?
It was to Yawar that They gave charge of it,
Because of his radiance They set him in charge,
And he whose glory is sublime sheddeth light upon it;
In his building he standeth 5).
It is not vain, or void, not hath it come to naught
Because he consulted the Life,
Because he was advised by the Life about it.
Life designed and founded the building
And Life is victorious.

366

When He opened His Garment
And when Radiance was formed,
When Radiance appeared,
Radiance (Ziwa) appeared with Yawar.

---

1) These two lines might also be an address to Yawar (naṭar is an alternative form of nṭur).

2) A line is missing here in D.C. 3, p. 257.

3) J. בִּיְּנָה to lay out, plan (a city) (Pi. BNA?)

4) D.C. 3, 257 : 7 tiqnḫ

5) Or "confirmeth his building".

They (the Great Life) created Light within the Garment.
When Light approached[1]) Radiance,
They called to Yawar and commissioned him, saying,
"Go, go thou Dazzling One,
Show thy divine image to the elect righteous
That they may see thee and shine
And may exalt Laufa (communion)[2]) to its rightful place.
At its rites[3]) they will behold Us
And will be confirmed in praise of the Mighty (Life).
They will behold the Great (Life)
And the Place which hath no end!
And Life is victorious.

367

When He opened His Garment
And when Radiance was formed,
When Radiance appeared,
To whom was his mystic archetype[4]) given,
A mystic counterpart, to whom was she given
And for whom was she guarded and established?
When He opened His Garment,
And when Radiance was formed,
When the radiance of the Mighty (Life) appeared
And Radiance appeared in its place,
A mystic counterpart for Yawar
Was concealed and guarded.
And Life is victorious.

368

When he opened His Garment
And when Radiance was formed,
When Radiance appeared,
For it, Transmitters were appointed
For it, there were appointed Transplanters.

[1]) In such texts as the Alf Trisar Šuialia it is assumed the nhura (light) is the (female) complement of the (male) force ziwa (radiance, glory).

[2]) Laufa (union, communion), is the simplest form of commemorative meal for the dead. See W.W., pp. 232-5. Its modern name is lofani.

[3]) D.C. 3 p. 258 : 2 l'bidatak "at your rites".

[4]) Dmuta, translated in No. 366 as "divine image", is the ideal counterpart; also "appearance", "likeness". See p. 236 n. 5.

(But) yonder, yonder They covered up its arousing [1] brilliance,
It doth not flash forth amongst dull-witted Plants!
But was reserved for one, one (only),
And will rise with him to the Place of Light.
And Manda-ḏ-Hiia will watch over him in his place;
He will guide him, will rejoice with him
And be his companion for ever and ever.
And the Great Life be praised in his light!
Life is victorious!

When He opened His Garment
And when Radiance was formed,
When Radiance appeared,
Who was king over the Light?
Who became king over Light?
And who, in his realm, was named chief,
Who was named chief in his realm
And who became Captain of the mighty?
Who was it who twined (wreaths) of virtues [2]
And set them on the heads of enlightened ones?
When Life opened His Garment
And the radiance of the Mighty (Life) appeared,
Radiance appeared in its place
Yawar became king over Light,
He it was who became King over Light.
In his realm he was named Captain,
Captain he was called in his realm
He became Captain of the Mighty.
He twined [3] (wreaths of) virtues
And set them on the heads of enlightened ones.
(Yea), Yawar arranged all, and did nought therein
Amiss or lacking, Nought was wanting, nought defective.
Nothing grieved him, (for) in it all
There was nothing awry!
And Life be praised!

In the name of the Great Other Life, be there health, purity, strength and soundness, speaking and a hearing and the aid of mighty 'uthras, sons of light, for me, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam, and for my offspring, Adam-Yuhana and Šarat-Mamania children of Adam-Yuhana.

---

[1] 'ruta (from 'WR, YWR, AWR) I have translated by two words to convey the double meaning here.

[2] Or "purities".

[3] 'Uṣṭun, 'uṣṭuna (see p. 233, n. 5.) I.e. the body of the cosmic Adam.

May it establish our names in the House of Life and may the eye of Manda-ḏ-Hiia be directed upon us, with the help of Hibil, Šitil and Anuš!

370

They appointed, and the Body [1] consisteth of Radiance within radiance, ether within Ether,
Counterpart of Life within Counterpart of Life [2]
Piriawis within Piriawis!
The Being who came and opened their eyes
To the living waters (Water of Life)
And poured them into their hearts
And (bestowed) wisdom and faith on the 'uthras:
He, (that) Being, will come and will open my eyes,
Mine, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
And pour into my own heart wisdom and faith,
So that I may stand and may worship and praise
The Mighty, Other-world (Strange) Life;
That I may bless this kana ḏ-zidqa [3] and Table.

……

And (bless) thee (also), our father, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam [4],
And the priests and laymen of the škinta (cult-hut)
Who sit at thy right and thy left,
For an age of ages and for world without end;
And Life is victorious.

371

In the name of the Great Life!

---

[1] See p. 259, note 3.

[2] Both have dmut hiia bgu dimat hiia. Here dimat undoubtedly is dmut, counterpart" and not "tear"! See p. 40, n. 3.

[3] Kana ḏ-zidqa. The word kana (receptacle, storing-place, assembly, assemblage, gathering, congregation; base, fundament, origin, place of origin etc.) in the series of hymns which follows refers to the various ritual foods set out on the holy table or platter for the sacred meal, in short, the foods collected for the purpose.

[4] This part of the hymn refers to the celebrant, and is chanted antiphonally by the priests present. (Today, owing to the lack of priests, the celebrant himself repeats the whole hymn.)

At the Source of the great Stream 1)
Of the predestined 2) Ether-World do I stand!
I am the Word of the First Life.
Pre-existent am I to all 'uthras,
For the Life created me and blessed me
And gave me strength, benison and goodness 3),
And sent me to bless my mystic brethren,
All the 'uthras; to speak and to be obeyed.
And I came and blessed them and gave them strength,
Benison and goodness, just as my Father 4)
Had given them to me.
And I, likewise, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam —
Or any man who is sincere and believing
And utters this saying sincerely —
Will receive a blessing like the blessing
And outflow 5) of the Ether-Land,
Foreordained and blessed by the Second Life.
And all 'uthras of the world of Light
Are blessed by it.
It came to this world which is all birth
And to sons of the great Family of Life.
And Life is victorious.

372

At thy name, Predestinate One,
Predestined by the Life, and at the source
Of the great Outflow of the Ether-land,
— Predestined and blessed is all the Ether,
Son of plenteousness 6) (?) from which Light emanated!—
Again it happened: the Life produced 7) Radiance.
The Tanna dissolved: 8) waters came into being

---

1) Or, "vein", "channel". See p. 228, n. 5.

2) 'tita ("ready", "prepared", "future", "designate" "predestined". Lidzbarski G.R. trs p. 403, n. 4 says "עתיתא findet sich an einige Stellen als Bezeichnung für höhere Wesen".

3) D.C. 3, p. 261 omits a line here.

4) Plural, i.e. Life.

5) Širiana, see p. 202, n. 1.

6) Br malia.

7) Cf. these lines with that obscure hymn, No. 12, substituting ham ziwa for sam ziwa.

8) D.C. 3 p. (262 : 8) has praš for pšar.

There were freshet springs [1],
There was union without division,
Abundance that never lacked
And blessing never incomplete.
Lift up thine eyes!
Behold yon great mystic primeval Šar-Ziwa! [2]
He is from the lofty, secret and protected Place,
From mighty and celestial springs of light (he emanated),
A being who spoke and heard,
Was judged and was vindicated
Before the celestial Mara-ḏ-Rabutha [3].
Come! Lay thy hand of truth (kušṭa)
Thy great right hand of healings
Upon this kana ḏ-zidqa [4] and thy table,
(And upon?) our father, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
And the priests and laymen of the škinta
Who sit at thy right and thy left.
Bless these (persons) and those souls
Of the living [5]; bless (also) and mention
(Their names) with "forgiving of sins"
("Be there for them") and with "Thy blessing shall Rest upon them for an age of ages
And world without end".
And Life is victorious.

373

In the name of the Great Life!
And in the name of the Manda-ḏ-Hiia
And in the name of the great powerful Mind [6]
Who thought and evoked companionship for Himself,
And said "There shall be companionship for Me

---

[1] Mambuhia = mambugia, i.e. natural springs, in ritual the sacred drink.

[2] Šar-Ziwa is an epithet applied to Hibil-Ziwa (See G.R. trs. pp. 163, 28).

[3] Mara-d-Rabutha, "Lord of Greatness" is, in the texts which describe the ordination of priests, the prototype of rba or rbai, the priest who initiates and trains the young postulant to priesthood.

[4] See p. 260, n. 3.

[5] Haiania. This might mean either the dead who are commemorated, or living persons, the relatives or teachers of the priests.

[6] Mana here has this (foreign) meaning (Avestic manah), and not the Aramaic meaning ("garment", "vessel" etc.) Mandaean writers love word-play, and therefore references to a robe or vessel are sometimes hidden references to mana meaning "soul" or "mind".

In my dwelling! And I will administer all works
And will create a world of ether
And make a durable [1] Abode.
There shall be mystic 'uthras
By whom elect righteous (people) will be set up (fortified)
Prepared for the everlasting [1] Abode.
And then He, the great and powerful Mind [2]
Pondered and created mystic 'uthras.
And he created one mild 'uthra
Who was sublimer than all the 'uthras.
And He blessed him, established him and strengthened him.
To him he gave the waters, and spread
Abundance in the worlds of light.
He set him over all jordans and streams
And over the Root which originated therefrom.
He showed him favour, blessed him and confirmed him.
And over the kana ḏ-zidqa (Oblations) and the Table [3]
He made him ruler. And He made him ruler
Over all sanctuaries (škinata),
So that they should exist through his strength.
And they will thrive in their sanctuaries
For through him all the 'uthras are refreshed,
They rejoice and are completely enlightened.
And they praise Manda-ḏ-Hiia who instituted for them
This kana ḏ-zidqa and Table
In their sanctuaries. So that from him
There was ṭabuta [4], and by him it was bestowed
Upon the righteous elect who were worthy
Of the Everlasting Abode. Because it was prepared for them [5]
By him. And by (means of) that kana ḏ-zidqa and Table
By which their souls are uplifted [6],
Everyone who partaketh thereof in silence
Shall have strength and firmness like 'uthras,

---

[1] Daura taqna, a firm (or steady, durable, lasting, abiding) abode is the antithesis of daura baṭla — the vain (or void, perishable, null, useless, ceasing) abode.

[2] See p. 4, n. 1.

[3] Patura "table", see p. 61, n. 5.

[4] I. e. the sacred meal on the ritual tables.

[5] D.C. 3, p. 264 : 9; D.C. 53 has 'titlḥ.

[6] Read mitqaimia? nitqaima is obviously wrong.

And increase and knowledge like sons of salvation,
And his name shall be established with his Father.
(But) he who doth not partake of the Oblation in silence,
- And there is nought which hath not its limit! —[1])
Will have neither lot nor portion[2]) in the House of Life.
The great Mighty Mind (Mana) taught and revealed:
He said "From him who refresheth himself[3])
By this Kana ḏ-zidqa and Table in silence,
And pronounceth over it the name of the Life
And the name of Manda-ḏ-Hiia,
My charity will not be cut off".
So I worship, laud and praise the Life,
My Father, who planted me and raised me up,
Gave me strength and water
And set me in authority over
Kana ḏ-zidqa and Table.
I accepted[4]) it from Him and went towards the škinata,[5])
I came and established the 'uthras in their škinata
So that in them they should speak and be heeded,
Should have strength and increase
And praise the Being who placed them therein.
(But) any man who doth not partake
Of this kana ḏ-zidqa in silence
And doth not pronounce the name of Life
And of Manda-ḏ-Hiia over it,
A great retribution will befall him,
He will no more be counted among 'uthras.
For when this kana ḏ-zidqa and Table were transported hither,
I was its guardian, it was I who transferred it (them?)
From my Father, and distributed it (them)
Amongst the škinata of all the 'uthras.
When elect righteous (men) have come into existence
I will go towards them with guardian(-spirits);

---

[1]) This tag, probably a proverb, occurs in several Mandaean compositions, it means roughly, "and there is always an exception". See G.R. pp. 75, 290, 291 and 292.

[2]) Hlaq umnaq = hlaq umna.

[3]) Or, in ritual language "partaketh of".

[4]) Lit. "I took it from Him".

[5]) The škinata of the 'uthras are the prototypes of earthly sanctuaries (the cult-huts), and 'uthras are depicted as performing in the world of light the sacred rites which men perform on earth.

I will give them strength, and water and abundance,
And knowledge like (that of) mighty 'uthras,
Sons of light. I will set up for them
A kana ḏ-zidqa and Table.
In their houses, and by association therewith
Their souls will be uplifted.
For this kana ḏ-zidqa and Table
Were the product of the great First Vine.
And when He appeared and came into being
And created companionship [1]) for Himself,
He said, "For me there shall exist an Ether-world,
And in it there will be sanctuaries (škinata)
We will set up 'uthras in them.
Upon them will rest (my?) glory [1]):
They will speak with the voice of Life
From beginning to end. And we will transport to them
Sublime and illumined jordans [2]), and we will bless them
With a blessing. So that there will be bounty [3])
From them, and the kana ḏ-zidqa and Table
Will be given (furnished) by them.
Strength and soundness will result to all the worlds of light,
And (also) to the elect righteous who are refreshed
By this kana ḏ-zidqa and Table.
And they will speak and will be heard.
Now I worship, laud and praise
That great First Vine who ruleth all the worlds of light
And blesseth the elect righteous with His blessing
And with the bounty (good food) brought to them,
By which they are strengthened and increased in might.
Their hearts leap for joy: they are elated
And their appearance becomes bright in every way.
They praise Manda-ḏ-Hiia who bestowed upon them
This kana ḏ-zidqa and Table
Set up for them in their sanctuaries.
(But) anyone who doth not partake in silence

---

[1]) Ṣauta has at least six possible meanings (including "thirst" and "obedience"!)

[2]) Rivers are meant here, I think.

[3]) Ṭabuta. Here better rendered "wholesome food"? See p. 254, n. 1.

Of the kana ḏ-zidqa and Table and omitteth to mention
The name of the Life and the name of Manda-ḏ Hiia, thereon,
All demons and devils will not absent themselves from his table![1]
Because he heedeth not every word of his Father [2]
The Seven will become his persecutors [3]
He will be put to the question before his Father.
The great and mighty Mana taught and told
The elect righteous and the Naṣoraeans
Who are to exist in the earthly world [4],
"When ye beget generations and when ye teach them
Their knowledge, Explain to them,
Show them and tell them
About the rites which ye have performed;
About the kana ḏ-zidqa and Table.
(Teach them) to partake thereof in silence
And to mention the name of Life and the name
Of Manda-ḏ-Hiia thereon. "Partake of it,
And when ye have refreshed yourselves
Pronounce this blessing upon it
And a Helper will be yours!"
Then I worship, praise and laud
That Mystic, Great First Cloud [5] (Spouse)
From whom all good things came forth,
And all the 'uthras who (were found?) worthy [6]
When these wholesome things were transplanted.
They gave me orders concerning them
To set them down and protect them everywhere
In every place where partakers refresh themselves.
And they shall have strength and (bodily) soundness in their škinata (dwellings);
When they refresh themselves therewith
They rejoice and their souls exult exceedingly.
They praise Manda-ḏ-Hiia who gave them
This kana ḏ-zidqa and Table of which they have partaken
And praise him eternally.

---

[1] Lit. "From before his table".
[2] Plural, (Hiia rbia).
[3] Lit. "his persecution".
[4] D.C. 3 has mistakenly šaiatlḫ for šaialtḫ
[5] Anana: "Cloud", see p. 37, n. 4.
[6] Or zealous".

Manda-ḏ-Hiia revealed and said
"Any man who partaketh in silence
Of this kana ḏ-zidqa and Table and pronounceth thereon
The name of Life and the name of Manda-ḏ-Hiia,
'Uthras of light shall bless him with their blessing;
He shall be protected by the Secret Name
And it will protect all the 'uthras.
There shall be one Helper for him:
All that he hath said will be heard by hosts
Of 'uthras of the Ether-world".
And Life be to (those who) know,
Life to the believing and Life to men
(Who) instruct us (in the faith)
And Life is victorious over all works.

374

In pure raiment do I stand;
In that glorious splendour in which I stand
I worship, praise and laud
The four hundred and forty four thousand names
Of Yawar-Ziwa, son of Nbaṭ-Ziwa, King of 'uthras,
The great Viceregent of škinata (sanctuaries),
Chief over mighty and celestial worlds
Of radiance, light and glory;
Who is within the Veil, within his own škinta,
Before whom no being existed.
Then I worship laud and praise
The One Great Name, which is great
And the Name which is powerful.
Moreover I worship laud and praise
That Mystic First Mind (Mana) of Glory,
Who emanated from Himself, Whose brilliance
Exceedeth all (other) mystic glories;
It is greater than word of mouth (can describe)
And His light mightier than lips can express.
For He is the great mystic First Mind (Mana)
Whose glory was transmitted
Neither from the uttermost ends of the earth
Nor from gates within it.
For He is the Mana (Mind),

The great, the Mysterious, the First,
Whose glory was transmitted by redoublings [1] of radiance
By intensifications [1] of light.
Then I worship, laud and praise
The redoublings of radiance
And intensifications of light by means of which
The great mighty Mana was formed and made.
Then I worship, laud and praise
That pure Staff [2] which was conveyed to him
By Šar-Gufna, the great mysterious First.
Then I worship, laud and praise
That pure Wreath which was transmitted to him
By Pirun, the great, mystic, First Vine,
Then I worship, praise and laud the pure vestments,
And the coverings of radiance which were transmitted to him
From the mighty Tannas [3] of the jordan.
Then I worship, laud and praise
That banner Zihrun, which was unfurled before
The great mighty Mana, in the radiance of which banner
Three hundred and sixty-six mighty celestial worlds of light shine.
Then I worship, laud and praise
That 'Uthra whom they summoned
From amongst a thousand thousand 'uthras, 'uthras
Innumerable. They clothed him with radiance,
Covered him with light, transmitted to him strength
From the strength of the Great First Life his Father,
And "speaking and being heard" [4]
From the "speaking and being heard" of the great Mana,
The mighty, mysterious, First, of the glory of Life.
They called him, armed him and sent him saying to him,
"Arise, go to Mšunia-Kušṭa [5], to the chief of worlds,

[1] A typical play on words. "Aufia = increase, doubling, output, sprouting, foliage. (Cf. Syriac ܥܘܦ and ܥܦ "to fold over, double, multiply, increase".

[2] The ritual olivewood staff, part of the regal insignia of priests.

[3] Like Lidzbarski, I am mystified by this word. It dissolves, (ham ziwa pšar tana No. 19), it is personified in company with niṭufiata, "Drops", suggesting "vapours" No. 308, also No. 378, p. 284. (See p. 9, n. 1).

[4] This is a religious expression for prayer and communion in thought.

[5] I cannot understand why Mšunia-Kušṭa, a world of immaterial ideals or prototypes, should here be called "of the darkness". The line may have been inserted by accident.

That which is called 'of the darkness',
And teach pious, believing and amiable Naṣoraeans
That they should set up their Table,
(A Table) replenished with food;
And their Cup (a Cup) full of mambuga [1]).
So that the good may behold and be refreshed [2]),
The wicked be discomfited and the children of the world
Put to shame.
The righteous [3]) will see that the Life existeth.
They will raise their eyes
Toward the great First Father of Glory
And toward the Lord of Celestial Greatness [4])
Who giveth light (and?) sure strength
To the righteous,
And [5]) to thee, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam, (be there)
Lofty strength, great and mighty confidence,
Grace, fame and honour!
And shouldest thou seek the honour that is hidden,
The Mana will come and will rest upon thee,
Our father Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
And (upon) thy brother-priests here.
And the right hand of the 'uthras
Will be laid upon thee, thyself, our father
Adam-Yuhana son of Sam and (on) all the priests
And laymen of the sanctuary (škinta).
And Life is victorious.

375

I have blessed, my Lord, all the good things [6])
Which Thou didst make for the ancient world in the beginning,
(For) from Thee they opened and came forth.
This is a tree [7]) which is a Tree of Life,
And a Vine, a Vine of Life!

---

[1]) Mambuga, see p. 262, n. 1.
[2]) Or "partake thereof".
[3]) Šalmania = those who are perfect, the righteous.
[4]) Mara-ḏ-Rabuta, see p. 262, n. 3.
[5]) This part of the hymn is probably chanted by the assistant priests.
[6]) Food, ritual food, wholesome food.
[7]) "The tree" here probably refers to the priestly bridegroom, and the "vine" to his bride? See the rubric at the end.

Satisfying (fare) that is superior to all means of healing
Is that which thou hast brought, revealed
And given to these souls!
Blessed is this pure oblation
Which goeth before its Giver.
In joy he (or "it") opened his mouth
At the Judgement and pleadeth his cause
Before the Being sitting in judgement!
(It is) a deliverer of the bound,
It cheereth those who are in affliction,
Causeth sucklings to flourish,
Is the sight of the blind
And the hearing and pleasure of the deaf.
It establisheth speech in the mouths of the stammering,
And the deaf and the dumb.
Its presence is praised,
For thereby souls are held together.
And (it provideth?) means of ascent
To the Great Place of Light
And to the everlasting Abode.
And blessed art thou, our good father!
For we have eaten of thine Oblation
And have lived[2].
And we have drunk from thy mambuga[3]
And were refreshed (have benefited by)
Thine unction, thine oblation, thy bounty[4],
Thy basket[5] when full of food
And thy bowl when full of spring-water[3].
And may this kana ḏ-zidqa and Table
Increase and be plentiful in thy house,
Our father, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
As was the table of Adam the First Man,
Which lacked nothing, nor was it stinted.
(So be it with) this kana ḏ-zidqa and table

---

[1] Lit. "talketh its speech", i.e. makes a speech in defence of the soul to the judge.

[2] D.C. 3, p. 273 uyainin: D.C. 53, p. 406 uhiainin.

[3] See p. 262, n. 1.

[4] Here probably the sacramental food.

[5] Sala (or "a straw or reed food-mat").

In thy house, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
For an age of ages and for ever and ever!
And Life is victorious.

[This petition of "The great Father of Glory" is a blessing bestowed on a bridegroom,]

(Note. — Probably for the marriage of a priest. One such marriage forms part of the consecration of a ganzibra.)

376

In the name of the Great Life!
And in the name of the great Father of Glory!
Now thou shalt be blessed, our father Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
With that benediction wherewith
The great first Palm-tree [1] was blessed.
And the Palm-tree blessed the bursting forth [2]
Of its foliage. It was so, and the sprouting [2] (branches)
Blessed runnels (of sap) and established them
And established the waters of life.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
With that blessing conferred upon
The eight hundred and eighty thousand banners [3]
And conferred upon the great Mirror.
And the jordans were blessed thereby and the running streams
And (that) whereby the seven mystic mirrors were blessed.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
And the 'uthras and the škinata, by that blessing,
Bestowed upon the [4] Tanna and Ham-Ziwa (Radiance-glowed [5]),
And upon the First Word given them.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
With that blessing wherewith the Great Mystery was blessed.
And the Great Mystery blessed the two manas
Who dwell with one another.

[1] The symbol of the male principle of creation, see p. 14, n.6. ("it sprouted, gushed forth", "burst forth" see p. 84 n. 7).

[2] Nbaṭ the name of a life-spirit), with which here nbaṭ is confused; one would expect nibṭa, as in the next line. The context makes the meaning clear. Nibṭa = "a shoot, sprout, a sprouting outward and upward, hence newly-sprouting vegetation and branch. Fig. "an emanation".

[3] Or "rays of light" (see p. 226, n. 4).

[4] D.C. 3 p. 274 inserts latiqria before tana ('tiqria "not created"?)

[5] See obscure references in prayers Nos. 12, 18, 106 and 372.

Then thou shalt be blessed, our father, with that blessing
Wherewith the secret and guarded Treasure was blessed,
And a mystic Sprout [1]) emerged therefrom.
And the mystic Sprout [1]) blessed the Eggs (hilbunia [2]))
And the Drops concealed within them.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father Adam-Yuhana son of Sam
With that blessing wherewith Smandr'iel [3]) was blessed,
Whose fragrance is pleasing like the fragrance of the Vine
When in leaf, like the foliage of the fresh myrtle
Which was set up before the King, also the blossom
Which came from them.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father, with that blessing
Wherewith the mystic Table was blessed,
And wondrous apparel, and the great Crown,
Were blessed therewith.
Then thou art blessed, our father Adam-Yahia son of Sam,
With that blessing wherewith were blessed
Zihwat-Aina, Kihwat-Aina, Piršat-Aina and Nibṭat-Aina [4]).
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father, with that blessing
Wherewith Nbaṭ-Mana-Kasia was blessed
When He was sitting in his House (hilbuna) and had no consort.
When He was blessed with this blessing
A Wellspring gushed up [5]) before Him
And She, the Wellspring, parted for the niṣubta [6]) Planting? (Bridal?) Within the Tanna [7]).
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
With that blessing wherewith was blessed
King Ganzaiel, so that the treasure of 'uthras

[1]) See p. 271, n. 2.

[2]) Hilbuna: (usually a poetic term for "house", "dwelling", p. 121, n. 4): the word here may refer to testicles.

[3]) The Blossom-spirit, a spirit of fertility, often mentioned. In J.B. text p. 5, 1.16 Samandiriel receives praise and prayer and keeps them in his treasury.

[4]) The Wellspring moved (or "trembled"), the Wellspring kihwat (was troubled ?), the Wellspring parted, and the Wellspring gushed forth (or sprang upward).

[5]) See p. 271, n. 2.

[6]) The whole of this very obscure passage seems to deal with the union of the two creative principles, see p. 135, n. 2.

[7]) Tanna, see p. 9, n. 1.

Was set up (?) with him [1]).
Then thou art blessed, our father, with that blessing
Wherewith the covering seal was blessed;
And the covering seal blessed the drops
Which were directed towards it, and the seven drops
Blessed the 'uthras, the lords of seals.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father, with that blessing
Wherewith the great kinta [2]) of two kings was blessed
So that they were completely established.
And the great kinta blessed the two kings.
And the two kings blessed the 'uthras, guardians
Of the kinta. And they said to them,
"As abundantly as flow the waters in the jordans which travel on,
May your love and favour flow to the 'uthras." [3])
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
With that blessing wherewith was blessed
The great kindly Aether-air of Life.
And they (the Life) said to it,
"Just as rare air delighteth (the soul)
So doth thy fragrance give delight,
O lord of the house and these benefactions! [4])
And thou shalt have increase like holy manas
In their perfection [5]): Thou shalt have the lustre and glory
Of (like?) the jordan [6]). As abundantly as jordans (rivers)
Flow, so will love of thee [7]) increase before thee
In the minds of thy brother-'uthras!
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
With that blessing wherewith was blessed
The mystic Tanna. And the mystic Tanna

[1]) All this is very doubtful.

[2]) Kinta (Lidzbarski "ein Wort kosmischer Bedeutung"). In modern ritual a clay box used as altar, it is found in such varied meanings as "wrapping", "veil", "receptacle", "box", "cavity", "hole", "community", "foundation", and "constitution". D.C. 3. p. 276 : 15 has kinta ḏ-rba trin malkia for kinta ḏ-rabtia trin malkia in D.C. 53 410 : 4f.

[3]) See line 24 f.

[4]) The house of the priestly bridegroom (a ganzibra must be married himself, and must perform a marriage-ceremony for a priest before he is properly consecrated in his office).

[5]) Klulaihun. Klula = (a)veil, wrapping (b) fulness, completeness.

[6]) D.C. 3 ḏ ardna; D.C. 53 uyardna.

[7]) Lit. "thy love" (for "love of thee").

Blessed the rivers and running streams
And said to them, "Whoso amongst 'uthras drinketh water from you,
Shall have strength, increase and perception;
Strength and soundness will abide with him
Like beams of light".
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
With that blessing which Ham-Ziwa bestowed upon
The Beam-of-Light whom he set beside him,
And he endowed her with his wisdom and his faith.
And from them proceeded fertility (niṣubta).
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
By that blessing which two pure manas
And holy kings pronounced.
And They say to him "Arise,
Go, lay down an earth: spread out a firmament
And hang up therein three hundred and sixty lamps.
Found a dwelling-place, draw down rivers
And distribute streams; make worlds of light;
Cause kings to dwell therein and give them fame,
Honour and increase. Bestow on them the power of reproduction [1])
And mystic treasure, so that they may worship,
Praise and raise up prayer and praisegiving
To the great Father of Glory."
And the great Father of Glory gave them living waters, [2])
And wholesome food [3]). And he conferred on them Pregnancy and birth and increase and benefaction [3]).
And He set up a Table for the good
So that they might eat well and be refreshed
He gave them banners of radiance and beams of light
And He gave them pure-air (Aether) [4]) which delighteth them
And sweeteneth the sanctuaries (škinata).
He gave them rays (of light) in which the Table (might be) set up
And draw (the faithful) into their sanctuaries
And running streams of living [5]) water —

[2]) Or "Water of Life".
[3]) Ṭabuta.
[4]) Ayar, see p. 86, n. 2.
[5]) Hiia is omitted in D.C. 3.

That for which their hands had pleaded,
(So that) they praise Thee for evermore.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing wherewith the Vine of Life
Was blessed and liveth 1)
And the wondrous Vine blessed her young vines 2), her sons,
And said to them "Ye shall have strength and increase,
And the lustre and glory of the Jordan, 3)
And an assignment in the worlds of light".
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father, with that blessing
Wherewith the great Ganzaiel 4) was blessed;
And he blessed three 'uthras
And gave them strength and firmness and said to them
"Like as the bud which appeared in that Vine
And remained and sent forth a shoot 5),
May the radiance that resteth on its tendrils
Have blessed thee" 6). And he said to them
"As long as water flows will the lovingkindness
Of the mystic Mana 7) flow on, and He will enlighten thy mind
With Naṣiruta (priestly wisdom) and thou wilt receive Fame and honour from the ether".
(And he said to them) Ye will shine like the brilliance
(Of the sun?) 8) and your forms will give out
A sublime effulgence 9) Ye will beam like Hibil-Ziwa
Amongst the 'uthras. And thou shalt (ye will?) have Increase like the sublime Vein 10) which They created. 11)
And They constructed škintas, made 'uthras,
Drew down rivers, distributed streams
And gave them food (ṭabuta) and a Table,
And bestowed upon them the blessing

1) Qaima as in D.C. 3, not qaimḫ.

2) "Plants", "offspring", i.e. "shoots", "suckers".

3) See above, p. 273, line 23 f.

4) Ganzaiel appears to be the archetype of a ganzibra and the "three 'uthras" the three concelebrants.

5) Niṣ(u)bta (נִיצְבְתָא J.).

6) The construction is obscure.

7) D.C. 53 has Tana (for Mana as D.C. 3, p. 279 : penult.).

8) Ziwa is attributed in Mandaean poetry to the sun, tuqna to the moon.

9) Tuqna, see n. 8.

10) "The sublime Vein" probably means the jordan.

11) D.C. 3 has "which 'uthras created" (ḏ-qrun ʿutria; p. 280 : 4).

Which They bestowed upon kings 1).
Then thou wilt be blessed, our father, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
With that blessing wherewith the three kings blessed Ayar 2),
They appointed and made him Chief of the škinata
And he was signed with a great seal
And set up (as chief?)
For ever and ever. They erected a throne for him;
Spread above him a canopy of radiance,
Hymned him and said to him,
"Since the day that the great Jordan extended itself
And a channel 3) was allotted to each of the škinata,
They made thee a king, our father!
A collector of dues (of) portions allotted 4) to the Life,
And a twiner of the wreath for postulants (to priesthood).
Instruct the young plant (niṣubta) 5) about the škinta
(O) establisher of its treasures! Our father!
O mana which passeth not away!
Troth is not broken and Union
In which there is no imperfection or fault!
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
By that blessing wherewith Ziwa-Kasia (Mystic Radiance)
And Nhura-Yaqra (Holy light) 6) were blessed:
And ye shall have abundance, renown and honour.
And honour, "speaking and being heard" will be thine,
Our father, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam
Like the great Father of Glory by Whose word
Worlds were created, and by Whose utterance
Dwellings (škinata) came into being.
And He gazed, looking upon His Likeness,
And created 'uthras in His likeness;
Made Seed and gave (it) to the 'uthras.

1) Priests. (D.C. 3, 280 : 7 brakbin malkia).

2) Ayar, or Ayar-Rba, see p. 86, n. 2, in ritual scrolls which describe rites performed by spirits as prototypes of those performed on earth, (see p. 264 n. 5), is always cast for the role of chief celebrant.

3) D.C. 3, p. 280 : 15 has the probably correct version, giuza, "channel". D.C. 53 (414:ult.) has ginza, "treasure".

4) מָנָה, and מָן = "portion", "food".

5) Here probably the young priest.

6) The reference is to the "holy union" of the male and female principles of light.

Then thou wilt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing which the great Father of Glory
Bestowed on His First-born, and the First-born Blessed the Palmtree and Wellspring 1)
Which proceeded from Him.
Then thou wilt be blessed, our father.
With that blessing which King Nbaṭ bestowed
Upon the Egg, the secret mystery which proceeded
From himself.
Then thou wilt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing which the Egg, the Secret Mystery,
Bestowed upon its inner covering
Which proceeded from the Hidden.
Then thou wilt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing which Yawar bestowed
Upon the Living Flame.
And it increased and was increased.
And (may) the kana ḏ-zidqa, Table, and this mambuha
Increase and become plentiful in thy house,
Our father, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
And the 'uthras and škinata
Who sit at thy right and thy left.
Then thou wilt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing which the mystic Vein 2) pronounced
And burst forth into sixty watersprings.
And it said to them, "Your images will shine
In my image, and your roots 3)
Will become numerous 4), and my root,
And ye will have renown and honour
Like holy manas in their škinata.
Then thou wilt be blessed, our father
Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
With that blessing bestowed upon
The great mystic First Škinta.
Then thou wilt be blessed, our father,

1) Palmtree and Wellspring, see p. 14, notes 5 and 6.
2) The mystic Vein (or Mystic Channel) = the Jordan.
3) "Root" (širša) here has the extended meaning of "stock", "kin".
4) The double meaning of the root NFŠ is implied, i.e. refresh", "revive".

With that blessing bestowed upon the great Sacred Unique One [1]:
And He blessed the 'uthras, his sons,
And the 'uthras and škinata blessed the postulants
Who stand before them.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing which was bestowed on the three holy manas
When remaining in their hilbunia [2] ("eggs", "houses"?)
So that none can behold their forms.
Then thou wilt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing bestowed on the pure Niṣubta [3]).
From the jordan she arose, she endowed 'uthras with radiance,
Gave light to the škinata, wreaths to the Drops
And a chart [4] to postulants. Blessed is this (chart):
By it they are strengthened and praise
The prolific Vine and the source of the flowing channel
Which hath no end.
The three holy manas will bless thee,
Our father, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam.
They will hymn thee and say to thee,
"As a leader of radiant spirits [5] art thou come hither:
As a captain of light thou goest thither,
As head of the škinata thou twinest a wreath
For the rays of light.
Jordans will come into being, Yawar, in thy brilliance,
And in thy Root [6] (amongst thy kindred) rays of light will be set up
At thy call and at the sound of thy preaching
'Uthras gather about thee.
Many vines will be raised up for thee.
And they said to thee, "Just as jordans become many,
So may thy charity to 'uthras increase".
Then thou wilt be blessed, our father, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,

[1] This mysterious Person is often mentioned in the religious texts. A masiqta is in his name. In the secret scrolls he is Adam-Kasia.

[3] What are we to make of niṣubta here? Is she the personified spirit of procreation, or "the Bride", or..? See p. 171, n. 2 and p. 135, n. 2 for possible interpretation.

[4] Paršigna P., = "information (conveyed by a document) as chart, declaration, explanation, report, manual".

With that blessing bestowed upon Simat-Hiia [1].
And Simat-Hiia was blessed when she arose,
(And) came from the worlds of darkness.
They retreated(?) [2], and worlds of light were established.
And all the 'uthras gather about Yawar,
Blessing him [3], Yawar, father of all worlds
And founder of all škinata.
The 'uthras and škinata arose [4]
Blessing the sublime one, Yawar, great ruler of the škinata,
And saying to him, "Blessed art thou, Yawar,
And blessed is the Bride of Life who was thus proven [5] (?).
Blessed is the breach which thou, Yawar, hast broached!
Thou didst come and didst broach a breach.
Thou hast exalted horns and hast separated
The goodness of the good (good beings?) from the evil (evil beings?)
And the wicked from the good and orderly.
(Of all worlds of light) [6]
And the Disposer (of all worlds of light and? [7])
Of worlds of darkness transported his Bride [8])
From her pit [9], that Place.
The škinata were blessed, and their Disposer,
So that they were illumined
By the blessing he bestowed on 'uthras. (?) [10]
And he set up a Table for kings,
Spread out the firmament
And stars appeared therein.

[1] Simat-Hiia is the consort (here the bride) of Yawar, and they are usually mentioned together as a pair. From this passage it would seem that Simat-Hiia is identified with Zahriel, who came form the worlds of darkness as bride of Hibil-Ziwa.

[4] D.C. 53 (419 : 5) qam; D.C. 3 (284 : 9) qum.

[5] D.C. 3 (284 : 16) ḏ-šarat; D.C. 53 (419 : 8) ḏ-šrat.

[6] I suggest that "of all worlds of light" is obviously misplaced, and should follow msadrana, making the next line "and the Disposer of all worlds of light and of darkness".

[7] See n. 6.

[8] That is to say, Simat-Hiia who had left the worlds of darkness to become his spouse.

[9] Gibta (Gubta "hill" or "pit") Or, "by her choice"? Doubtful. The word is rare, but occurs in Pišra ḏ-Ainia (J.R.A.S. 1937, 590 : 20).

[10] The construction makes translation doubtful.

Then thou wilt be blessed, our father,
Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
With that blessing bestowed upon beloved 'uthras
Formed from the loins of Radiance
And nurtured by beams of light.
Then thou wilt be blessed, our father,
With that benison bestowed upon the holy Mana
When He was in His own škinta.
He blessed the jordan and extended it before Him
And blessed the Table and set it up before Him
So that they might eat at it and be refreshed,
And be sustained thereby on their thrones
Of radiance, light and glory.
And He created the Crown, set it upon His head,
Blessed it and held it on his right arm [1]).
And He, the Holy [2]) Mana taught and said,
"Any man who crowneth himself
Will have neither lot nor portion [3]) in the House of Life".
Then thou wilt be blessed, our father Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
With that blessing wherewith the great First Mana
Blessed Himself [4]). And the great First Mana
Blessed the eight hundred and eighty 'uthras
Who grasped the banner [5]) of the king.
And they hymn Him, saying to Him,
"When Yawar was successful, (with his Bride?)
She was neither wanting nor unworthy,
There was nought in her imperfect or amiss".
Then thou wilt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing bestowed on the disembodying (spirits [6]))
Of good ganzivri, and thou wilt be blessed

[1]) The crown, when not on the head, is slipped over the right arm and kept there until the preliminary prayers are over.

[2]) For qra in both mss, read yaqra as translated.

[3]) Hlaq umnaq = hlaq umna.

[4]) The First Mana was without predecessor.

[5]) A reference to the consecration of the banner before baptism. The priests (and later persons to be baptised) grasp, first the lower part of the pole and then the peak when reciting the banner hymns.

[6]) See J.B. trs. p. 181, n. 4, "für die den Körper abstreifenden Seelen"; i.e. spirits casting off the body.

(With a blessing bestowed) by Dmut-'Qara, and Niṣubta-Qadmaita[1]
And The Drop upon whom the seal of a king was placed.
And the Beloved 'Uthra[2] blessed thee when he was baptised
In those jordans. They immersed him, but he was not purified,
(He was still imbued with) the hue of darkness
Until Simat-Hiia arose. She took a pot of frankincense
And a king's crown, cried in the jordan
And blessed Yawar. And Simat-Hiia spoke
Hymning the jordan and saying to it, (and) say ye it (too[3])!
"From two mountains didst thou come into being!"
How fitting it is that 'uthras pronounce blessing
Upon Yawar, blessing him and uplifting him,
And raising his Bride up to the Place of Light!
They twine for him a wreath, a wreath of purities,
So that Darkness on beholding it
Is confounded and ashamed. When (thus) confounded
The plots which it had in mind are nullified".
When Simat-Hiia had said this,
All the 'uthras observed silence[6]
(But) Yušamin and Simat-Hiia bless Yawar
Saying to him "Blessed art thou, Yawar;
And blessed are 'uthras who abide with thee
With that benediction wherewith the copious
Flowings and upsurgings of mighty springs of light
Were blessed; and wherewith was blessed,,
. . . .[7], the mystery which resteth within the Well-spring.
Further, thou wilt be blessed, thou, Yawar;
And thou, our father Adam-Yuhana son of Sam;
With that blessing wherewith Šišlam was blessed

---

[1] Literally the names of these personifications are "Counterpart-of-Glory" and "First-Bride" or "First-Propagation". Obscure allegorical references make the text unintelligible.

[2] "The beloved 'uthra" "is probably Hibil-Ziwa, who was baptised after his sojourn in the world of darkness and marriage with Zahriel.

[3] Timarulḫ D.C. 53, 421: penult, but D.C. 3 has himarulḫ.

[4] This could mean "I came into being".

[5] Niṣubta. Could here be either "his procreation", "his fertility" or "his Bride"!

[6] More literally "held their peace".

[7] D.C. 3, (287 : 15) has sar udnasar, D.C. 53 (422 : 14) sar utnasar. Possibly a miswriting for saq udna "rose up and appeared".

When he ascended and abode in his škinta,
In his own House (Egg).
Then thou wilt be blessed, our father with that blessing
Bestowed upon the Occult Radiance and sublime Light
(Which) inspired the 'uthras.
Then thou wilt be blessed, our father with that blessing
Bestowed upon the mystic Vein [1] that dwelleth
Within the Wellspring.
And thy root will multiply (branch out)
And the root of the 'uthras, thy sons,
Like the Vein which is lodged within the Jordan.
And thou wilt have chosen righteous ones
Who will exalt Treasure of Life.
And we will assign thee thy Niṣubta [2] of Life
(Spouses?) who bear witness [3] to Life,
Acknowledge Knowledge-of-Life
Give alms and offer up this (prayer of) blessing
Which was bestowed on the holy Mana.
And Life is triumphant over all works,
And victorious is Knowledge-of-Life
And his devotees and his people for ever and ever.

377

And they address a hymn to him:
"The Egg, the Hidden Mystery, hath blessed thee
And establisheth thee.
The Vein [4] which hath no end hath blessed thee;
Jordan and Table have blessed thee; Holy Kušṭa [5] hath confirmed thee;
The three Wellsprings which give benediction in the Jordan
Bless thee, our father! [6]
Crowns, and the secret treasure of the Egg of holy Manas
Have blessed thee. The Spouse (cloud) hath blessed thee;
A sublime Vine confirmed thee.

[1] Širiana. See p. 277, n. 2.

[2] Reproducing power? Or "planting" in the spiritual sense?

[3] The verbs which follow niṣubta are fem. plu.

[4] The references appear to allude to the various offices of a head priest, beginning with simple baptism.

[5] The kušṭa rite in all ceremonies, and at marriage.

[6] The triple baptism necessary in cases of pollution. (Read birkak).

The Great Life blesseth thee with His pure mouth
And the sublime Treasure which is with thee confirmeth thee 1).

[This prayer seeketh blessing on an infant, a postulant, or a masiqta. And when they brought Adam into his body, it consecrated him.]

378

In the name of the Great Life! may there be health, purity, joy of heart and forgiving of sin for Adam-Yuhana son of Sam!
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing which Hibil-Ziwa pronounced upon Adam,
The first man. Moreover, thou shalt be blessed,
Our father, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
And all thy škinta and the ritual food (ṭabuta)
And these priests and Mandaeans (laymen)
Who sit to right and left of thee,
With that blessing wherewith Manda-ḏ-Hiia was blessed
When he sprang forth and proceeded from the waters
And from celestial springs of light.
Then thou wilt be blessed, our father,
With that benediction wherewith Sam-Gufna was blessed.
And Sam-Gufna blessed jordans and running streams
And said to them "Just as ye have increased,
(Ye) jordans and running streams,
So shall the progeny of Adam the first man increase.
His race, his planting and his disciples 2) (pupils),
Adam's", and thine (also) our father, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
Shall be plentiful as this spring of living water —
And how profound it is no man knoweth! 3)
Thou wilt be blessed, our father, with that blessing
Pronounced upon Hibil-Ziwa by three 'uthras.
They said to him "Go, bring us joy, purity and goodness!
And bring us living waters (Water of Life) to the škinata (sanctuaries).
And bring us a sturdy stock 4) by which sanctuaries and 'uthras

1) This prayer, like some of the more ancient and obscure prayers in the early part of the Book of Souls, makes the translator despair. It is full of esoteric and forgotten symbolism.

2) Šualania and ašualania i.e. postulants for priesthood.

3) D.C. 3 has, instead of this line, ulika ḏ-adam 'utra (a miswriting).

4) Širša, see p. 277, n. 3.

May be maintained.
In it they will shine and Rays-of-Light thrive".
Then thou wilt be blessed, our father,
By that blessing conferred upon the jordan Sindiriawis [1])
And the great and lofty Fruit-tree [2]);
And that which the great and lofty Fruit-tree
Conferred upon its offspring, that is, its foliage.
Then thou wilt be blessed, our father, that that blessing
Conferred upon the jordan Hus and the torrent Pirun,
Conferred upon jordans (rivers) and running streams,
And upon the Table [3]) which is without stint
And given to 'uthras and to škinata so that
They may eat thereof and be refreshed.
And pronounce the blessing of the Table
Laying their pure right hands on it
And saying to it, "May this kana ḏ-zidqa and Table be life-sustaining [4])
And plentiful" (and) in thy house, thine,
Adam-Yuhana son of Sam, (thy table and that of) thine [5]) offspring,
Adam-Yuhana and Šarat-Mamania the children of Adam-Yuhana,
Shall resemble that kana ḏ-zidqa and Table which the Great and Mighty Mana
Brought and bestowed upon His offspring and sons.
Then thou wilt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing conferred upon Šar-Ziwa,
The First Being, who emanated from the vapours [6]) (?) of the waters,
When he rose to the bank of the jordan, blessed the jordan
And blessed (all) jordans and running streams.
And he blessed the abundance-producing [7]) utterance
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
Like that speech that bestoweth plenty [7]).

---

[1]) The "jordan" or river Sindiriawis is often mentioned, in G.R., as "a jordan of Life" (145 : 4, 146 : 37) and J.B. (p. 12 n. 1).

[2]) Pira = "fruit" and "fruit-tree".

[3]) See p. 260, n. 3 and p. 61, n. 5.

[4]) The root NFŠ has two meanings, and there is a play on these in this passage: i.e. also "abundant and increased".

[5]) In D.C. 53 "my offspring", D.C. 3 "thy offspring".

[6]) Tanania: see p. 268, n. 3; p.9. n. 1.

[7]) Pa. YTR, active participle fem. yatarta.

So that thy treasure, thy oblation and thy goodness 1)
And thy prayer and thy praise may be much;
Be increased, be life-giving and refreshing 2);
— Thine, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam —
Like the Sprout 3) which came and grew great
In the worlds of Light.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing imparted to the mystic Crown
They set upon the 'uthras.
Thine appearance will be radiant and bright
Like that crown that they set upon Manda-ḏ-Hiia 4).
And thou wilt have plenty and renown
Like the great Crown, which hath 5) great renown
In the worlds and ages. Thou wilt have honour
Like that of teachers 6) and postulants
When they perform (rites) and give instruction
And (so) acquire fame and increase.
Then thou shalt be blessed our father.
With that blessing wherewith Sar-and-Sarwan 7) was blessed,
The Emanation which came into being of Itself;
And thy radiance will be vital and wax great 3)
Like His radiance, and thy light increase
Like His light. Thou shalt have jordans.
And abundance like His abundance,
That of the Emanation which emanated from Itself.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing bestowed upon the living waters
And given to škinata. And they (the waters) spread and come8)
To the škinata: Hibil drew them down
And sent them to the worlds.

---

1) Here again probably refers to the food-offerings.

2) The word-play on the two meanings of NFŠ occurs repeatedly in this hymn.

3) Naṣiruta (the cult, priestly gnosis, etc.) here might have this unusual meaning of "offshoot", "sprout". (J. נֵצֶר ii) (Cf. Tan Lekh, ed. Bub. 9).

4) D.C. 3 ḏ-traṣlun, D.C. 53 ḏ-traṣlḫ.

5) Read ḏ-'tlḫ for ḏ-tla.

6) Rbania (the rabbis) i.e. the priests who initiate postulants into the priesthood.

7) Sar and Sarwan, usually a pair, here an "emanation" are mentioned in Prayer 45, also in G.R. 172 : 5, 221 : 4 and 374 : 14.

8) D.C. 3 (293 : 3) ṭafin bisšar qiriš (uatin etc.) Corrupt.

(And thou shalt be blessed with) the blessing
That Hibil-Ziwa gave to Adam. He pronounced benediction
And said to him "Thou art blessed, Adam, First Man,
And thy plants (offspring) [1] shall be blessed,
And thy dependants [2], and thy basket when full of bread
And thy cup when full of mambugia [3], and thy sons
When they stand before thee."
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing wherewith the 'uthra Smandriel [4] was blessed.
And the 'uthra Smandriel blessed fruits, grapes and trees.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing wherewith mighty fruit (trees) were blessed,
And wherewith was blessed the Living Flame
And the Table that lacketh nothing.
Rham and Rhamiel-'Uthra were blessed by it
And Rham and Rhamiel-'Uthra blessed clouds of mist and rain.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
Adam-Yuhana son of Sam, with that blessing
Which blessed all clouds so that they are not wanting or lacking,
And so that this kana ḏ-zidqa and Table
Shall be neither wanting nor ill-provided
In thy house, our father, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing wherewith those seven stars
Were blessed, and sovereignty was given to them.
Thou shalt be blessed, moreover, our father,
With that blessing wherewith were blessed
Those twelve constellations of the Zodiac.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
Wherewith the five sensitory organs [5] were blessed.
Moreover thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing bestowed on heavens and earth;
And they blessed the covering of Smandriel [6]-'Uthra
And spread it out. Then thou shalt be blessed,

---

[1] Šitlia.

[2] Or "postulants"?

[3] "Watersprings", i.e. the sacramental drink.

[4] The spirit of blossom, see p. 272, n. 3.

[5] Gidia.

[6] The "covering" is over the earth only, since here it must mean vegetation, the province of Smandriel.

Our father, with that blessing wherewith
The two pure mountains are blessed,
In which (lie?) outstretched [1] the earth and sky,
And they do not move, and are not removed.
(Neither) shall be removed this kana ḏ-zidqa and Table
From thy house, Adam-Yuhana, son of Sam.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing bestowed upon the First Word,
Assigned to 'uthras and škinata.
And on beholding the First Word,
The 'uthras and škinata all rose from their thrones,
And addressed a hymn to Him saying to Him,
"Our father! the Guardian of Truth (Kušṭa) hath blessed thee
And the Naṣiruta from which thou camest into being hath blessed thee.
Our father! the Cloud that gave thee being blesseth thee
And a sublime Beam-of-Light will establish thee".
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing wherewith the holy Tanna was blessed,
And by which the three hundred thousand 'uthras
Who sit on the bank of the Tanna are blessed.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing wherewith Ṣihmai [2] was blessed,
The Pure Mirror into which all the worlds of light gaze.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing wherewith the Mystic Vein was blessed,
And it was divided into three hundred and sixty thousand channels,
And was given to the 'uthras and škinata.
And 'uthras and škinata shine therein,
And are established thereby.
And thine appearance, our father, shall shine
Just as 'uthras and škinata shine, and thou wilt be established,
And plants (offspring) will be raised up unto thee,
Thy sons, like those. There came a glory
Which resteth on 'uthras, and it shall come and shall rest upon thee,

---

[1] The probable meaning is that from these two mountains a wide horizon, sky and earth, lies extended below?

[2] ṢHM = to beam, gleam.

Our father, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam!
Then, our father, thou shalt be blessed
With that blessing wherewith are blessed
Fruits, grapes and trees, and that conferred on
The beloved 'uthra. And the beloved 'uthra
Blessed the plants, his children: he gave them strength
And increase and water.
Then thou, our father, shalt be blessed,
With that blessing wherewith was blessed
The holy Splendour (Banner) [1]: it was endowed with radiance
From beginning to end, and to the 'uthras
It gave the pure Word which they speak
And which they hear (and obey).
Hence those 'uthras blessed the holy Banner.
And they come and bless thee [2],
And hymn thee, our father. They shed radiance,
They blessed thee and the škinta of the mighty (Life)
Blessed thee, and the great Tree which is all-healing. [3]
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing wherewith were blessed
The Seven Ships [4] which float and traverse the Dwellings.
Thou shalt have progress-onward [5] like those Ships.
And thou shalt have speech and hearing
Like the 'uthras who dwell in them.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing wherewith are blessed
Books and reliable teachings; moreover, our father,
Thou shalt be blessed with the blessing
Which 'uthras pronounced upon Yawar
When he brought his treasure and came towards them.
Those 'uthras who blessed Yawar
Will come and bless thee and hymn thee
Saying to thee "(O) Advent of a pure Mirror! (Thou art)
Chief of all enlightened beings!"

---

[1] See p. 226, n. 4. Here personified as a divine light.

[2] D.C. 3, (297 : 1) has "bless us".

[3] Lit. "all healings".

[4] The planetary ships. The illustrations to D.A. show the planetary ships and their occupants.

[5] Sagia (a) way, moving forward, "procedure" etc. (b) "abundance" "plenty".

They pronounce blessings in the jordan
(Saying?) "An Overlord 1) (?) of fair mirrors (art thou),
Bestower of blessing in the jordan,
And an Establisher 2) (?) of all purities" 3).
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
With that blessing wherewith holy manas were blessed.
And the holy manas blessed the jordan of living waters
Which they drew down hither and it cometh from its place.
(So also) may kana ḏ-zidqa and Table
Be drawn to and come to thy house,
Our father, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam!
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing wherewith was blessed
Sindiriawis, jordan of living waters,
That was drawn down 4) to the Earth and given
To Adam, the first man.
And a kana ḏ-zidqa and Table will come
To thy house, our father, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam,
Like the Sindiriawis, jordan of living waters
Which overflow 5) and come (hither). (In like manner)
They will come, and a kana ḏ-zidqa will come
And the Table and (all manner of) good things 6)
And will flow abundantly to thy house,
Our father, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing which the three Vines bestowed
Upon the holy Mana, imparting to Him strength and increase.
They said to Him, "Go, appoint vines like thyself
(Vines) which they have blessed (consecrated?) to the Holy Mana".
(And they will come and will bless thee (also), our father! 7))
"With Thy strength, (O) conquering Radiance!
And conquering is the Cloud 8) from which thou didst derive being".

---

1) Should probably be šaliṭun ḏ as translated.
2) Should probably be mqaimanun ḏ-zakwata as translated.
3) The hymn is obscure and translation tentative.
4) Or "flowed", "spread".
5) Both MSS have a miswriting — ṭatin for ṭafin (perhaps for ḏ-atin)
6) I.e. foods for the ritual table.
7) This reads as if in parenthesis.
8) I.e. the "Spouse", i.e. the Mother.

Rejoice, our father rejoice! rejoice in thy škinta!
Rejoice in the Plants, thy sons!
How great is the glory of thy banner!
Thy brightness our father, waxeth and increaseth
Over thy škinta and all the 'uthras!,
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing wherewith was blessed
The Pure Pearl, and she came and dwelt in the generations.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing wherewith were blessed
The Three Wellsprings of Radiance,
Whose light is lent to one another.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing wherewith is blessed
The fair [1]) Radiance, whose like is not found
In the worlds and generations.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing wherewith was blessed
The pure Kimṣa [2]) in which there is no fault
Or falsehood, from which 'uthras had being,
And from which polished mirrors appeared.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father,
With that blessing wherewith
A Mystic Emanation [3]) was blessed,
And the Mystic Emanation blessed the Ether Earth [4])
And established the corporate forms [5]) that dwelt therein.
Then thou shalt be blessed, our father.
With that blessing they bestowed
Upon the Cloud Šarat. And thee (likewise)
Will they come and bless: they will hymn thee and say to thee,
"O Son of Treasuries of Radiance! [6])
O Son of škinata [7]) of the mighty (Life)

---

[1]) The adjective indicates that which commands reverence and admiration, hence "holy", "fair", "valuable" and "important" are legitimate translations. In Mandaic it cannot be translated "heavy" in the literal sense.

[2]) Kimṣa, see p. 119, n. 2.

[3]) See p. 271, n. 2.

[4]) The immaterial world is meant, a counterpart of the earth.

[5]) 'Uṣṭunia.

[6]) Or "thoughts of radiance".

[7]) Here perhaps "indwellings of" etc.

O Son of banners erect (firmly set),
Who goest towards thy Father! Thou art steadfast 1),
Alterest not, nor changest aught
Of that which the Life hath given thee.
Evil (spirits) never held thee back!
Thou dost walk according to the word of the wicked.
Ruha was no enchantress 2) for thee (?)
Nor did she cast thee into her dark cauldrons!"
And Life is victorious over all works

[This prayer, for the blessed "priest's portion" (?) 3) is for a postulant, and the booth 4) (?), Parwanaiia, a book 5) and the Great Baptism. 6)]

379

Health, purity and forgiving of sins be there for me, Adam-Yuhana son of Sam!
Thy propitiatory gift shall provide thy portion.
For each one (for whom) thou didst intercede and help over,
And didst pile up 7) (gifts) here, Manda-ḏ-Hiia will lay up
A thousand thousand (gifts) in the world of light.
Thou wilt have joy of heart, ease of body and fulness of hand!
And thou shalt clothe with garments and cover with coverings 8);
Shalt break bread into fragments and set it in place,
Shalt recite masiqtas, celebrate Oblation and make ṭabuta (ritual meals).

1) This should be šarit, as translated and indicated by the context.

2) La huat lak ruha baznaqita D.C. 53 (437: penult.), D.C. 3 (306 : penult.) baznarita. "Ruha was not to thee an aznaqita". As a second meaning under זנק J. gives "to make a person's mouth water". Here perhaps "to make lovesick", or "desirous". This meaning fits Ruha's character as representing physical desires.

3) Hilita = (a) propitiatory gift, propitiation (b) a gift to the priest. (J. Pi. HLY "to make sweet by a gift", "propitiate"). See p. 113, n. 5.

4) Saka is a word used for the novice's booth. Gifts of money are given to the priests for the novice-priest.

5) A zidqa brika should be celebrated by the copyist on completing a holy book. A sheep is killed for a lofani in which he and those who commissioned the copying share.

6) Three hundred and sixty baptisms, necessary to expiate a serious pollution.

7) Amart (עמר) may have this meaning here as it is with nidgar.

8) I.e. perform the ceremony known as Ahaba ḏ-Mania, a zidqa brika performed for one who dies naked or in lay dress; a proxy wearing the rasta for the deceased.

Then strength, soundness and victory will be thine;
And goodness, beauty, repute, honour,
Glory, aid, speech and hearing; such as that
Which the Life, His Father, gave to Yawar and Tauriel.
And which Yawar and Tauriel bestowed on Hibil-Ziwa;
And Hibil-Ziwa came and blessed three 'uthras
And the three 'uthras blessed Adam and all his descendants.
With that blessing shalt thou be blessed, our father,
Adam-Yuhana son of Sam.
Moreover, we bless thee for 1) the Unique Great Sacred (Being)
Whose name is called "the great Mighty Mana (Mind)".
When He came into being, formed Himself in His own perfection,
Alone, in His škinta, for with Him there was no companion.
Then He, the Great Mighty Intelligence pondered
Within mighty inner Eggs that are hidden
And created Companionship for Himself.
In the beginning, He uttered a first cry 2)
And created four hundred and forty-four thousand 'uthras
And set them upon His right.
With his second Cry 2) he created three hundred and sixty-six-Thousand 3) 'uthras and set them at His left.
And at His third Cry he called into being
Twenty-four thousand 'uthras and set them
Before Himself. And He clothed them in His radiance
And covered them with His light;
And placed upon their heads outflowings 4) of Radiance and light
And created for them wreaths in the likeness of His (own) wreath, the Great Mighty Mana's.
He placed in their hands a staff of living water
And established in their right hand
The holy handclasp of troth 5).
He spoke with his pure mouth
And blessed them with his honest tongue
And with faithful lips of radiance, light and glory.

---

1) Probably originally "The U.G.S.M. blesseth thee" - see p. 306.
2) Qrita = "a calling-forth", "a creation"; "a cry".
3) A gloss in D.C. 53 has "and six".
4) Ṭaufia lit. "overflowings".
5) The act of kušṭa.

He created habitations (škinata) 1) for them
And drew down jordans of living water for them
And said to them, "Ye shall rejoice and be glad
In your škinata 1), like a jordan (river)of living water
Your consort 2) will resemble the Cloud 3) (divine Spouse)
From which ye came into existence,
And your perfume and sweet odour like the fragrance 4) of 'uthras.
And a škinta was created: it was founded, it was, it appeared
Of itself. It was a great Canopy (or pavilion?)
For the Great Unique Holy One,
A canopy of radiance, light and glory
Which was all eyes.
In the (eyes? . . . . 5))
It stretched out before Him, so that
It doth not reveal to them, the 'uthras, His appearance.
Then the Great Mighty Intelligence (Mana) planned and created
Vast and pure worlds of light.
Jordans He deployed, He made škinata 1)
Installed 6) 'uthras and appointed ašgandia 7)
Chief of these (ašgandia) envoys before Him
Was Adakas, "the Great Word" is his name;
For he is a "go-between", taking out 8) praise, Blessing, prayer, heedfulness and enlightenment 9).
And them he giveth and he bestoweth on the jordan
His blessing. So the 'uthras arise, worship his name
And praise his title: they do not oppose his calling (name)
For he, (as) the ašganda (envoy), receiveth the praise of the 'uthras
And conveyeth it into the presence of the Great Mighty Mana
And layeth it up in His treasure-house.
Then those seven-hundred and seventy-eight thousand 'uthras,
Who were created by the Second Cry of the Life, will bless thee.

1) Or "sanctuaries" the word has its customary vagueness!

2) Or "companion"?

3) "Spouse"? See p. 37, n. 4.

4) Rba ḏ-'utria (in both mss.) should surely be riha ḏ-'utria as translated here.

5) D.C. 3 (303:13) bania ptahibḫ, D.C. 53 (441:2) bainia ptahibḫ? Obscure.

6) D.C. 3 uahib 'utria, D.C. 53 uautib 'utria

7) The Akkadian aš-gan-du meaning "Messenger", "ambassador" conveys the meaning of a "go between", "an envoy" and ašganda here is exactly that: "an intermediary", a "go-between".

8) D.C. 3 mafaq.

9) Or, "glory and vigilance".

By Them, and from those 'uthras one 'uthra was singled out,
Younger than his brethren and older than his fathers.
They assigned to him [1] his name, "Mahzian [2]-the-Word,"
That is Yuzaṭaq [3] Manda-ḏ-Hiia is his name —
And he gave them prayer and praise, (so as)
To furnish the 'uthras in the Divine Presence [4]
With praise (befitting) the worship
Of their Father, the Great, Mighty Mana.
And a messenger came to them, an envoy from the Presence
Of their Father, the Great Mighty Mana, (saying)
"The 'uthras' prayer is acceptable [5] in the Presence
Of your Father, and your prayer fitting
In the eyes of [6] the Chief of Envoys,
The Messenger who came to Mahzian-the-Word,
To rectify the rites of 'uthras, (to purge them)
From fault and to put in order the worlds of light".
Then the great Mighty Mana, when summoning Manda-ḏ-Hiia
From His left, seated him on His right,
And pronounced blessing on him and made him —
— The younger brother, more reverend than his parents —
Made him ruler over mighty and celestial worlds of light,
Over jordans and running streams
And over all dwellings, in order to regulate and to station
The 'uthras in their (appointed) places.
And by his brother-'uthras he is called "the Capable".
Manda-ḏ-Hiia called three 'uthras and blessed them.
And he summoned his elder brother Hibil-Ziwa
And clothed him with his radiance
And covered him with his light and shed on him
Some of his glory, and held him (by the hand)
In the presence of the great and mighty Mana,
And said to him "At thy command have I summoned him,
And I wish to send him to the worlds of darkness,
To the powers of Siniawis, the under-world".
The great Mighty Mana blessed Hibil-Ziwa,

[1] Missing in D.C. 3.
[2] Mahzian, a spirit who bestows sight?
[3] Yuzaṭaq = Yuzadaq (Holy-Spirit? Spirit of righteousness?).
[4] Lit. Their Presence, i.e. the Divine Presence.
[5] Lit. "is accepted."
[6] Lit. "in the presence of", "before".

Gave him lofty strength and aid.
And Hibil-Ziwa said "I will come,
And with me will come Habšaba (Sunday)
And Kana-d-Zidqa. With me will come lofty strength
And help: with me will come sixty-six jordans,
And within each jordan nine hundred and ninety-nine
Škinata. And in each škinta
Fifty thousand 'uthras will dwell!"
With that blessing thou art blessed, our father,
Adam-Yuhana son of Sam! Moreover the mystic
Well-ordered and well-ordering Mana will bless thee,
And the hidden (unseen) and watchful 'uthras will bless thee,
For their names abide in the secret and guarded place
The radiance of which burneth and its light
Was set up for all the 'uthras of the Ether-world.
They acknowledge and praise it and the Great Life also
Who is concealed in praise (addressed) to Itself [1]) (?).
Praised be all generations of living beings
Which issue therefrom and exist and praise
That mystic Intelligence, and the Radiance which burneth,
And the Light set up in the great Presence of primal Glory
In the Place where They sit, speak and are obeyed.
(Yea), concerning everything that Ye have planned,
Word came, and was obeyed in each aerial world!
So also shalt thou speak and be heard, our father!
Thou wilt ask, and it will be answered thee
By that mystic and (all-) arranging Intelligence,
For all that He planneth cometh into being.
For He made, and establisheth before Him,
Sixty worlds of light: when He spoke there came into being
The 'uthras of the Ether-world, with their mysteries
And their own speech.
And then the mystic Intelligence, who giveth to every individual
Strength and glory, appointed an 'uthra,
An organizer, a great and lofty teacher of Truth,
A pleasing being, an Enlightener,
And He set him up as chief of all the 'uthras,
And granted him speech and hearing so that

[1]) Or meaning perhaps addressed to the Mana?

He speaketh with him and he heareth Him,
And He gave him dominion, and (granted him)
To speak and be heard, from yonder radiance[1] unto the depths of the earth.
With that blessing thou shalt be blessed, our father
Adam-Yuhana son of Sam.
Moreover, the Tree Ṣṭarwan[2] shall bless thee,
From which proceeded wreaths of radiance,
Light and glory for the Great mighty Mana.
Then that supreme Vine shall bless thee,
That which was revealed from below the First Vine Ruaz[3].
It came to the earth (world) of Tarwan
And Nṣab gave it to Tauriel-'Uthra
Who extended it over the Ether-earth.
And he made gushings forth of water
And made it flow to the world
Of sons of Perfection.
Then the First Life will bless thee,
And the Second Life will bless thee;
Manda-ḏ-Hiia will bless thee
And the pure Yušamin[4] will bless thee.
All the 'uthras of the world of light will bless thee;
Sons of Perfection will bless thee;
Šilmay and Nedbay will bless thee;
Hibil, Šitil and Anuš will bless thee;
Abathur of the Scales will bless thee;
The Place that is all radiance and beams of light
Will bless thee. Those who are covered
With holy and well-kept garments will bless thee.
Radiant beings, lights and beams of light will bless thee,
And 'uthras, škinata and jordans.
Vigilance will bless thee, and the praise-giving
In which all 'uthras shine. Holy, predestinate,
Calm and perfected *mana*s will bless thee,
And the Fellowship which existeth in the škinata will bless thee,

[1] D.C. 3 (308 : 2) mn hibil-ziwa; D.C. 53 (445 : ult) has mn lhil ziwa, the latter being the more probable version.

[2] Or, "the plant 'ṣṭarwan". (Ṣatra, wild thyme?).

[3] Ruaz (He-flourished, sprouted) is mentioned in Prayers 71 (a Vine,) 117 and 196.

[4] Yušamin, see p. 12, n. 4.

That (their?) praise of the great First Life
Will bless thee, Those mystic sproutings (emanations)
Which bloomed at the word of the Great (Life) bless thee.
That pure Vestment will bless thee, and that union
That was knit together and cannot be divided, will bless thee.
That mana 1) of glory which was blessed with a hidden blessing
Will bless thee, for those who sit within it will bless thee.
Yon pure great Vein will bless thee
And the Tongue which hath no ceasing will bless thee.
Those multitudinous ones who sit in pure glory
And converse in speech which is not mortal, will bless thee.
The Enduring Place in which they dwell will bless thee, 2)
The Place whose glory is great will bless thee.
That predestinate, pure Being, whose form sheddeth light
Will bless thee. That mighty (Being) 3) of radiance
Will bless thee, that well-ordered and well-ordering One
Will bless thee. All gentle voices, all bright banners 4)
Will bless thee: those secret prayers will bless thee,
And those columns 5) of white water will bless thee.
And the Vein of pre-existent Ether will bless thee.
Yon pure Sam-Ziwa, whom the First Life created in secret
Will bless thee, and that 'Uṣṭuna 6) (Body) will bless thee
Which dwelleth in the pre-existent Ether
From which all 'uthras of the Ether-world proceeded
And which they worship and praise.
It created Ether, (It) created 'uthras for Itself,
For Itself It created 'uthras,
And dwellings (škinata) and lovely *mana*s
Proceeded from It. It will bless thee,
That sublime Ether, from which there came to life 7)
A living flame. And it is incorporated in all 'uthras
And (in?) all that exists. Its name in secret and its appelation

1) Here mana must have its Semitic (Aramaic) meaning, i.e. "robe", "garment" or "vessel". Play on this word is implied.

2) D.C. 3 (310 : 1 f.) has atra ḏ-nafša ṣautẖ unibirbak hanik rurbia ḏ-ziwa nibirkak hanik sdiria umsadria etc.

3) The plural here indicates the Divine Being.

4) Or "erect banners"?

5) 'uṣṭunia.

6) The 'uṣṭuna more or less personified here, must refer to the cosmic body of Adam Kasia.

7) Or "awoke", "came to consciousness".

Is magnified in (by?) the 'uthras.
And Mara-d-Rabuta (the Lord of Greatness) [1] will bless thee,
He who hath interpreted, declared and professed
In his mind the First (Life).
And yon Ether-Piriawis will bless thee,
The being who bestowed and abideth within yon jordans
And that one (here).
And that Occult Lord of Greatness will bless thee,
Whose form not one of the uthras beholdeth.
And that great Vine which standeth in the presence
Of the Lord of Greatness, will bless thee.
The great body (corporation) of Piriawis will bless thee:
The Treasurer of the world of light will bless thee
And the pure mountain the radiance of which shineth forth
And its light flameth, will bless thee.
All these names will bless thee, our father,
Adam-Yuhana son of Sam!
Moreover, thou wilt be blessed with the blessing
Pronounced in the Jordan and in the land of Hauraran,
The great land of light. And upon thee shall rest
Its glory and joy, that which abideth in the Innermost [2].
On account [3] of its magnificence they rejoice, embrace one another
And take one another's hands in troth [4].
Thy fragrance will be sweet like the scent
Of trees of the world of light. Thy brightness
Will break forth and thy light shine out
In the earthly world like flashings of radiance,
And beams of light, going forth to bring into existence
And illumine a thousand thousand
And eight hundred and eighty-eight thousand myriads
Of mighty and celestial worlds of light.
Thou wilt arise in the name of Life
And wilt walk in the road of the upright.
Mighty ones, sitting in glory, the living,

[1] The prototype of a priest who initiates postulants.

[2] Status constructus of giuta is unexpected, as the sentence ends here. It was probably suggested to the writer by the frequent expression giwat 'qara, especially as 'qara occurs in the following line.

[3] Himat for mn himat.

[4] Freely translated; i.e., perform the kušṭa rite.

Will ask about thee, and living (souls) will discuss thee
With praise of the Mighty Life.
Filled with glory will thy heart be,
And its joy rightly directed.
And thou wilt ask and wilt find
In the presence of the Great Life,
Thou wilt speak and thou wilt be heard
In the name of Yukabar-Kušṭa.
And thy fame will be the fame of the Life
And thy renown will be the renown of Yukabar-Kušṭa.
And thine appearance will be (like unto)
The appearance of mighty 'uthras, sons of light.
Thou wilt be made great with the greatness of Manda-ḏ-Hiia.
On earth thou wilt be as one of the 'uthras,
And on earth thou wilt be named as
One of the men (who were) the first Chosen Elect.
Thou wilt be great and lofty, (they will ascribe to thee?)
Fame and (good) taste, (name thee) head of the age,
And thou wilt be a father of honour, who provideth
His friends and the elect and the distinguished,
With viaticum, (thou wilt be one) who appointeth
'Uthras in their place and helpers of the Chosen
Whose Signs were taken from the jordan.
(Thou wilt be) the support of the discerning
Who discern with their minds;
The helping hand of the perfect
Who, from first to last, establish perfection.
The guide of sons loving the fellowship of Life,
The deliverer of the righteous who are (True) graftings [1]) from the Stem of Life.
Thy perfume, our father, is fragrant; thine appearance
Is effulgent and giveth out light.
Thy presence giveth joy.
Thou makest thy conversation alien to[2]) the worlds (the worldly) (?)
And thine actions we will make wholly fair and bright.
Thy speech will delight and be pleasing
And will resemble (that of) the worlds of life.

[1]) Lit. "who are planted from the stock (or stem) of Life".
[2]) Obscure, translation is approximate.

And thy words be like radiance, light and glory.
Thou wilt seek an earthly dwelling:
Thou wilt ask for and tread out roads to the Place of Light.
Manda-ḏ-Hiia will set up for thee a kana ḏ-zidqa
And a Table in thine own house, our father.
And thy basket, so that it is filled with bread,
And thy cup, so that it is filled with mambuga 1)
And thy Table he will set up.
Thou wilt gather together friends,
Wilt satisfy the hungry and refresh souls.
Then came the glory of Life! It will rest on thee
And the Likeness of the Great (Life) will protect thee
From all that is hateful.
Thy radiance will shine forth with the sun,
Thine effulgence with the moon and thy glittering
With the stars. Thy strength will be like
(The strength of) the waters,
Thy pleasantness like (that of) pure air 2).
And thy glory like fire.
All the planets and the Twelve Gates 3)
That look on thee will bow themselves before thee.
Care will remove itself from thy heart
And sighing from thy thought. Thou wilt have
Joy of heart, wilt speak and be heard,
Wilt ask, and there will be granted thee
The strength of gods, with the command of angels.
Thou wilt seek in the day and find by night.
We will confirm thy speech in thy mouth
And will set up thy throne in majesty.
Thou wilt be the companion of the perfect
And friend of the righteous and believing.
The words of thy mouth will bring thee victory
And thy good fortune will rejoice thee.
Thou wilt act and succeed, wilt be on trial
And be vindicated; wilt strive and wilt attain.
Thy strength will be that of the storm-wind:

2) Ayar is sometimes better rendered by "pure air" than by the word "ether".

3) Other sects and faiths, each under a sign of the Zodiac.

Thy race will multiply (spread) like the waters.
And — however long thine existence in the body —[1]
No illness, sickness, pain, blemish, wound
Or (other) plague of the planets will reach thee
Or get the mastery (over thee), our father.
Great is thy blessing! Nevertheless, I (too) have blessed thee
With a mouth of flesh! Manda-ḏ-Hiia blessed thee
With a pure mouth. I have blessed thee with a tongue of flesh:
Manda-ḏ-Hiia blessed thee with a true tongue of praise.
I have blessed thee with lips of flesh,
But Manda-ḏ-Hiia with faithful[2] lips of radiance,
Light and glory.
When thou bearest him to the earth[3]
And mentionest thy fathers[4] at thy time and moment,
When thy measure (of years) is accomplished,
In a blessed old age when thou hast become
A greybeard full of honours and blessing,
We will bring thee into a state of peace.
One will set forth towards thee to set (thee) free,
Adakas-Mana, thy father[5] And he will take thee
Out (of the body) upon a road in which there is no heat,
Or trembling or quaking. He will pass thee over
The watch-houses of the planets and thy brightness
Will shine out over the purgatories
Until fear cometh upon those purgatory-dwellers
And guilty (souls) and (those) who have pined away (there[6])).
From their purgatories they will plead for thy favour
And will say "How great is the radiance, how mighty the light
Of the elect righteous being who passeth over us!"
And thou wilt free and bear away with thee

And he (Adakas) will protect thee, and thou wilt recognise Abathur.
And Abathur, when he seeth thee, will take thy hand in holy troth,
Will clothe thee in his radiance and cover thee with his light.
And he will set thee in his scales.
Thou wilt be clothed in thy radiant-body
And mighty wrappings [2] of light.
He will set wreaths of victories on thy head;
Thou wilt become akin to 'uthras,
An (inhabitant) of the world of light
And the everlasting abode.
Thou wilt pass on to sons of perfection, who,
One by one, will bring thee his radiance
And will lend thee some of his light.
And thou wilt cross the Waters (of Death) [3]
And Adatan and Yadatan will set out towards thee
And will place upon thee thy living .... [4]
And will raise thee up as member of a company [5] of souls.
They will show thee [6] new and unused chambers [7]:
Thou wilt rise up to the place which is the House of Perfection.
Thou wilt wander freely [8] in the ether;
Wilt behold the sublime Vine of Souls
In which sons of the great Family of Life are represented.
They will send out towards thee
A banner of radiance, light and glory.
And they will take thee down and will immerse thee
In seven jordans, and will hymn thee, saying to thee,
"Thy raiment shineth and thine appearance is honoured.

And all the 'uthras of the world of light will assemble,
Take one another by the hand and will say,
"Up! we will go and see the man who hath freed himself,
And ascended from worlds of darkness, from amongst them
(Who harbour?) evil plots". They will call thee
"Teacher of 'uthras" and will say to thee
"How thy radiance hath increased! How greatly is thy light augmented!
How sublime and tranquil is thine appearance! how fragrant thy perfune!

Of the great (Life?) yonder, which was (led?) from
The pure Tarwan. Thou wilt see the Vine Tauriel
Which stands by the jordan of the pure Tarwan,
Of ether-light. Thou wilt behold the Vine Yusmir,
Which is situate in the jordan of the pure Tarwan.
Thou wilt see the Tree Tatagmur[2], which is situate
In the jordan of the Lord of Greatness.
Thou wilt see the Vine Ruaz, from which Blessing issueth, a blessing goeth out from it;
And all 'uthras delight in its fragrance.
Thou wilt see the Vine Yusmir which is situate
In the land of Sam-Ziwa.
Thou wilt see Šarhabiel who is situate

In the place of the mighty First Life.
Thou wilt see the Vine Pirun which is situate
In the territory of Šarat-uabdat-ukišrat [1].
Thou wilt behold the ether-Vine set up
In the land of the First Life. Thou wilt see
The Vine which is situated in the land of Future Ether.
Thou wilt see the great Vine by the juices [2] of which
The souls of earthly babes are nurtured.
They imbibe and are satisfied by its succulence [3].
Their souls fly about, they fly about, their souls:
In the world of light they are established (brought up?).
Thou shalt behold the great mystic Yura [4]
Whom They planted. Thou wilt see Šilmai and Nidbai
Dwelling in a great cloud of light. In that cloud
They dwell and are put in charge of all jordans.
And thy name will delight and thy fragrance be pleasing to
The great and mighty Mana, and to the great Presence of Glory,
And to the great First Archetype Who is hidden
And quiescent within His mighty inner Eggs,
For He is the Radiance above all radiance,
The Light above all lights.
And he will send thy baptiser (out) before Him:
Adakas-Mana will go forth to meet thee
And will take thee in his right hand, will rise
And will show thee the High King of Light.
Thou wilt see His beams of radiance — they illumine
His right hand. He will grasp thee with His hand,
Will lay his right hand (upon thee?)
And will grasp thine in holy troth [5].
He will clothe thee with His radiance,
Cover thee with His light, bless thee with His blessing
And His glory will rest upon thee.
He will make thee a judge in the ether

In the name of the Life!
I worship, praise and laud that great mystic First Jordan
From which there was praisegiving,
And its brightness inspired the 'uthras.
From it living waters came into being
And its light reinforced all light-beams.
From it resulted the enlightement of the 'uthras:
In it they rejoice, and from it a wellspring of radiance
Came into being. From it, fruits, grapes and trees
Came to life; from it pihta (bread) derived its existence.
And it was broken and given to the One Great First Mana.
And He, the Great First Mana was invigorated thereby [3])
And worlds of light, 'uthras and all škinata
Refresh themselves therewith,
Exist (live) and flourish.
And they worship and give praise.
Glory, serenity [4]) and delight come upon them;
They rejoice, are glad, laugh and make merry,
Exult and disport themselves.
And on thee (too), our great, lofty and respected father,
Glory, bliss, perception and felicity will rest.
Yea, that jordan will bless thee

[1] (TQN II).
[2] See similar couplet in Prayer 255 (lines 22 and 23).
[3] Or, in the language of ritual, "partake thereof".
[4] D.C. 3 (322 : 8) has nihutai ("my serenity" or "my calm") for nihuta.

From which praisegiving originated, and it was great [1].
There will come kana ḏ-zidqa and a Table
And good things (food) will abound and be plentiful
In thy house. Thy strength here on earth will be firm,
And yonder, in the worlds of light like (that of)
The great First Mana.
Thou shalt have speech and hearing;
Thou wilt speak and be heard.
Thou wilt call thy brother-priests here on earth
And they will answer thee. There, thou wilt call on
'Uthras and they will answer thee.
Here on earth thou shalt have assurance
Because two of Kušṭa's witnesses stand in thy presence,
Seeing and noting what thou doest and what thou thinkest
Day after day and hour by hour.
Yonder, thou wilt be accounted as one of the 'uthras.
Life will joy in thee and the 'uthras will hymn thee
And say to thee [2]
"Thou wast from the First Jordan, our father!
From a Stock of great brilliance
Did they call thee forth! Ninṣab clothed thee in vestments of water,
Tunics of righteousness cover thee.
On thy head he set a wreath, a wreath of praise,
For 'uthras and škinata are twined[3] into the leaves of thy wreath."
Moreover the Great Unique Sacred One [4] will bless thee,
Whose throne they set up at the kana ḏ-zidqa.
He measureth [5] the pious offering of each individual
And according to his works, He recompenseth him.
He delighteth in the Chosen Elect and bestoweth raiment of light.
And four Beings, Sons of perfection, bless thee,
They who guard treasures of life and confer
Garments of radiancy on the elect who dwell in the world.

[1] Utnafšat in both texts. Either "was great", "increased", or perhaps "refreshed"?

[2] D.C. 3 [323 : 9 inserts before nimarlak (read nimarulak?)] Probably a miscopying.

[3] A play on words, mitgadlia also means "glorified".

[4] See p. 292. He is identified with the Mana Rba Kabira and with Adakas.

[5] D.C. 53 is defective here: D.C. 3 (323 : antpenult.) has ukaiil zidqa ḏ 'niš 'niš.

It is they who make abundant [1] thine oblation and thy Table
Which is set before thy brother-priests.
All thy brother-priests gather about thee
And open their mouths, all of them, in a loud voice,
With acclamation, prayer and praise, they bless thee,
Hymn thee and say to thee, "All that thou doest will be rightly ordered:
All thy vines [2] will give light,
And in all thy works there will be nought lacking or in fault.
And some of the blessing of the mighty First Life
Will rest upon thee."
And Life is victorious.

Darkness is crushed back into the Dark [3]:
Light is established in its place.
Life hath accepted your prayer
And 'uthras have received your praise,
In the name of Šarhabiel, tẖe First Great Radiance,
To support the Great Mana at His Place;
And to uphold the hands of good people.
There shall be healing (power) of Life
And blessing upon this kana ḏ-zidqa and thy Table,
Our father, Adam-Yuhana, son of Sam!
We establish thy consecration [4] (as ganzibra)
And thy confirmer [5] ratifieth thy consecration
In the world of light. And thy confirmer is sinless,
Thine advent is [6] with sinless ones [7] and thy confirmer sinless.
Come! as (one) fulfilled, deemed worthy, and established
In future honour and ample blessing.

---

[1] Ninifšuia (or, perhaps, "inspire with life thine oblation"?).

[2] By "vines," the ganzibra's pupils, postulants to priesthood or his sons, are meant.

[3] See prayer 103, p. 102, n. 1.

[4] Tarṣa, taraṣa (lit. a "setting-up") is a ceremony of dedication or consecration, e.g. of the cult-hut before a masiqta, of the "crown" when set on the head of a new priest, and of a ganzibra newly appointed to office.

[5] Mqaimana here is the celebrant at the service of consecration of the new ganzibra. He must himself be a ganzibra.

[6] Or "induction", his coming as ganzibra.

[7] Ritually clean priests and head priest.

He will be possessor of fee and alms 1) (flowing like)
The great rill of Water of Life which was drawn down (hither)
And came from its Place. Tauriel-'uthra drew down to earth
(Those waters) which come and come; come and cease not;
They are never cut off, or lacking, or deficient.
(In like manner) this kana ḏ-zidqa and Table
Shall never lack or be wanting in thy house,
Adam-Yuhana son of Sam, our father,
For an age of ages and for ever.
And Life is victorious over all works!

[Then they shall set up the table 2) of Blessed Oblation in (on) the altar-table 3). And when they finish the dedicatory prayer 4) the ganzibra takes the phial of wine 5) and reciteth the hymn "Vines shone in the water", and he poureth 6) (the wine) into the drinking-bowl and giveth it to the baruka 7) and the two witnesses.]

382

In the Name of the Great Life!
Vines shone in the waters:
Mighty ones were confirmed 8)
For perfecting, for clearing the waters,
Establishing Your likeness and giving us light
Let your radiance shine upon us, great 'uthras!
Shine, shine forth, come in mystic transfiguration 9),

---

1) Agra uzidqa, "reward and oblation" i.e. fees received by priests for their services, and offerings in kind and money brought to them by the faithful.

2) As I have seen this rite, I can explain the nature of "table" here. It is the earthen tray, or small earthen altar-table (ṭariana) on which the ritual food is laid out.

3) The larger altar-table (ṭariana) on which the smaller (see n. 2) is placed.

4) Qaiamta.

5) Water in which grapes or raisins have been macerated.

6) (Cf. Hif הירייק).

7) The priest who has recited the foregoing prayers of blessing for a ganzibra.

8) This prayer (given in another form in Studi e Testi 176, p. 64) is hopelessly garbled. D.C. 3 (326 : 7) has (for lka lhil in the latter) lkalḫ (D.C. 53 divides the word on two lines.) My translation in Š. ḏ-Q. was governed by the variations. Hence for mitqaiam which here obviously refers to the elevation of the ganzibra, I had "were established" (here). See also Prayer 177.

9) bhilfa kasia. In the Š. ḏ-Q. I translated "instead of concealing it". I think the translation given above may be the truer, but the whole prayer is obscure.

Let your radiance shine forth and the radiance of the king.
Let your fragrance come and overpower (us with its sweetness)

[This hymn the ganzibra shall pronounce over the wine-bowl, giving it to the baruka (blesser) and to the two witness.]

383

In the name of the Great Life!
On the day that Hibil-Ziwa
Walked with Yawar,
Myrtle with them was plentiful, [1])
Plentiful was the myrtle,
And to Yawar he gave it,
Into his right hand.
And he said to him,
"Take from me fresh myrtle
And pronounce blessing in the škinata
Its blessing pronounce in the škinata.
Then Yawar opened his mouth,
Blessing Hibil-Ziwa, blessing Hibil-Ziwa
And said to him, "Blessed art thou,
Our father, Hibil-Ziwa!
Like the myrtle that is in thy right hand
Thy Root shall flourish
Like the root of fresh myrtle:
And thou shalt have strength and increase
Like the living waters"[2]).

[The "blessers" recite this hymn and give myrtle to the ganzibra].

384

Myrtle, myrtle! The king took it;
The king was surrounded by the perfume of myrtle,
The king was surrounded by myrtle-perfume,
And blessing Hibil-Ziwa,
He said, blessing Hibil-Ziwa,
"Blessed art thou, our father Hibil-Ziwa,
Who hast brought this plant of fresh myrtle
And hast set it up in the dwellings of 'uthras.

---

[1]) There is a characteristic play of words on the two meanings of SGA.

[2]) There are variants of the myrtle-hymns: I translated some in Studi e Testi, 176, p. 65.

The dwellings shine in its brightness
And delight in its fragrance for ever [1].

[The ganzibra recites this hymn and taketh the myrtle from the "blessers".]

385

In the name of the Great Life!
All who inhale thy perfume and are crowned [2] by thee
Sixty heinous sins will fall away from him.
And all pure spouses will be made perfect, [3]
Delivered from evil actions.
(Those) who twine the wreaths and set them on our heads [4]
Will arise without spot and behold the Place of Light.

(The ganzibra reciteth this prayer over the myrtle, [5] inhaleth its fragrance and giveth it to the šganda (acolyte) to smell, and to the "blessers" and all persons present; then he throweth the myrtle into the jordan and (folds and) putteth away the banner. And (then) they "honour their crowns.") [6]

Note. — Here D. C. 3 p. 328 has a colophon which begins: —

These are the prayers for the pihtania (breads) and all the blessings of the Blessed Oblation which I copied for my brothers and parents so that there may be support and a guardian for us on earth and forgiving of sins before the Life, my Parents, in the worlds of light, so that they may be instructed therein. I am poor, lowly... etc.

(Note. — Before No. 386 D.C. 3 inserts "In the name of the Great Life! On the day that Radiance appeared" etc. Prayer No. 414, p. 316).

[1] See the variation, op. cit. p. 66.

[2] D.C. 3 (327 : ult.) ubgauak mitkarak; D.C. 53 (468 : 1) ubgauak mitkarkia. For the rendering "crowned" (certainly applicable here) see p. 230, n. 4.

[3] D.C. 3 (328 : 2) mištalmibak; D.C. 53 (468 : 2) mištalman, (fem).

[4] D.C. 3 (328 : 4) ubrišaian; D.C. 53 (468 : 3) brišaiia.

[5] These myrtle prayers and the ritual inhalation recall the Persian barsom rite. Its perfume was apparently inhaled ritually and was also a symbol of kingliness as appears in the Shahnameh (Shāhnāmeh, ed. Sa'id Nafīsī, Teherān, 1914, vol. 9, p. 2995, 1.496 ff.). In this passage the king asks for barsom when food is offered: "food should be taken (only) when barsom is there". His request for barsom reveals that he is the king and results in his death.

[6] I.e., take off their "crowns" and kiss them, see p. 28, n. 3.

386

See Prayer No. 329.

(The rubric differs slightly, so I give it)

[This is a hymn for consecration of crowns on the Sunday when the ganzibra wishes to consecrate the cotton crowns for the priests. Wearing his vestments, with the (novice's) vestments and the crowns in his right hand and his staff in his left, he goes to the bank of the jordan, grasping the crowns which he wishes to consecrate together with his own in his right hand. Then, after performing ritual ablution in the jordan, he approaches the cult-hut and examines each (item) of the vestments, and recites the 'Salutation' at the Door of Mercies (i.e. facing North), to (as many) kings as he is able. After that he shall recite this hymn once over each crown. And Life is victorious!][1])

In the Name of the Great Life!

Health, victory and forgiving of sins be there for me, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš, who have prayed this prayer and (these) Devotions. Forgiving of sins be there for a man whose eyes wait upon his Father and whose thought is directed to the Life and whose mind doth not stray from Knowledge-of-Life.

Poor am I who make this petition: a lowly man who hath kept aloof from the Seven. And I say "O Lord of the lofty firmament, (O) Being who accepteth request, receive my prayer and my praise here; guide it with Thy directing (power), grant me a place in Thy Place, give me a dwelling in Thy world. Do not question me about my sins and the burden which hath weighed down my soul in this world. Behold me, who have sought purification before Thee! Look on me, who have borne persecution for Thy name! End for me acts of violence, for I am Thy servant and Thy child. Now I humble myself and my children to Thy name, for I have been true to Thy name, and speak (it) in my heart and talk (of it) in my mind. And I subdue my form and my loins, (O) .... [1]) superior to all glories, before the pure Light which is above all lights.

And I say, "O Lord of gleaming banners, Lord of mystic books, Lord of "Letters-of-Truth" [2]). Lord of prayer and praise, He who uplifteth the prayer of 'uthras and sponsors the praisegiving of kings, Support of prayerful thoughts! Let there be strength and constancy for all lovers of Thy name! Look upon me with Your eyes and pity me in Your heart! Support me with Your strength, clothe me with Your glory, cover me with Your light. Cut me me not off from Yourself! And put far from me fear, dread and terror of the seven stars and the twelve constellations: deliver me from the hands of the wicked, and loosen my feet from the bonds of death. Cut me not off from Your presence. Arm me against all that is evil: be for me a bulwark against rebels and a Hand of Truth against the destructive powers of this world. Turn away, repulse from me insecurity[1] (?), poverty, ill-luck, lack of sleep and hours of agitation, an evil day and blows (onslaughts) which occur all the time. Be to me Life in life; give me to drink of freshly-flowing Water of Life. Set up for me a kana ḏ-zidqa, a Table and good fortune so that they are fully supplied[2] by Naṣirutha. And my brethren will be with me and will provide (me with) a peaceful transplanting[3]: my wife, my plants (children), and my priests shall accomplish it.

[1]) Šihrialia šilia? Šihrialia = "rulers", "governors", as plural might be read as "(Divine) Ruler". Šilia might be the plural of šilta = "need", "want", "desire". Obscure.

[2]) A reference to the rite for the dying. Preceded by a form of immersion (the "proven Sign") the ceremony of "The Letter" or the Letter of Kušṭa is performed, during which a phial of oil is placed in the pocket of the ritual dress, and a ritual handclasp (kušṭa) is given to the dying or his proxy.

I shall depart and come towards You after a (ritually) perfect departure (death), with pure oil[4], and with the proven Sign; in ripeness of years[5], without feebleness[6], in a blessed old age, in my own home[7].

Look on the plants, marvel at the šualania (those entering the priesthood under tuition); then let there be with You a forgiver of sins for me, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš who have prayed this prayer and these "Devotions". Forgiveness of sins be there for me, for my father and mother, for my teacher, for my wife, for my offspring, for my priests and for all souls who arose at the name of Life and verified the sign of Manda-ḏ-Hiia with pious and believing heart.

Yea, Life, verily Life, life with the victorious there shall be for those love Their name! They will not sever the holy union knit between living ones, with those who know the Life and believe in the Life, and with those who teach us the faith. And Life abideth in Its Dwellings and Life is victorious over all works!

And now (I ask) of Life, Your compassion, Your forgiveness, Your reconciliation[8] and Your compassion, Yours, Great First Life! Pity, forgive, awake and have compassion upon this my soul, mine, Adam-Yuhana son of Mahnuš who have prayed this prayer and these "Devotions". Let there be forgiveness of sins for me! (thrice); for me and for my father, my mother, my teacher, my wife and my wife and my plants (children) and my priests who have placed bread and (ritual) food [1] (here), (and) you, my fathers, my teachers, my instructors and those who taught me the faith, when ye supported me from the Left to the Right. Forgiveness of sins be there for you!

[2] This is the great Commemoration prayer known as the "Our forefathers". It is usually preceded by the Ṭab ṭaba lṭabia prayer as in prayer 170. It is recited at every rite for the departed.

[3] Nöldeke suggested "End" for kimṣa (root KMṢ), noting that 'k' and 'q' are often interchangeable. Lidzbarski doubted this interpretation (see J.B. p. 192, n. 1) and in his note to Prayer 126 (M.L. p. 192, n. 1) suggested an "Ort im Jenseits". In Prayer 126 I translated the word "a formation", "taking shape" etc. The word is of a very nebulous meaning. See p. 119, n. 2.

In mirrors a counterpart of the jordan was formed.
And water was produced in the Ether.
The jordan emerged in its glory
And the water was intermingled with the Ether,
Intermingled was Water with Ether.
And the strength of Light increased greatly,
Was increased and established.

Naṣirutha spoke therein to kings (priests)
And their purities were intertwined.

(The bridegroom shall recite this prayer when entering his house before he "taketh kušṭa with his wife". Then he shall "honour" his crown[3]). Beware of performing a marriage or (entering into) a partnership when the moon is in Cancer, Capricornus, Sagittarius or Scorpio: they are evil days for a wedding.)

[1]) See 175. Prayer 412 varies slightly from it, and the explanation is missing from the former.

[2]) The union of wreath and crown is symbolical of marriage.

[3]) The hymn is for the marriage of a priest.

INDEX

Note. On Names

In Mandaean literature spirits, angels, demons, and persons are given names denoting abstract qualities, activities, virtues, vices and so on. The abstract nature of the divine First Cause is divested further of any tinge of anthropomorphism by use of a plural form: It is named Hiia, from the verbal root HIA "to exist"; hence it means "existence", "life". To this appellation are attached such adjectives as "First", "Second", "Third", "mighty", "majestic" and "multiform".

Abstract qualities of varied shades of related meaning are covered by the name Kušṭa, a personification of "truth", "pact", "sincerity", "good faith"; whilst category or species is personified in such names as Adam—"man", "mankind" and Anuš "humanity" "human being".

It is not always possible to discover the original meaning of a name. Most, indeed all of them, derive from a verbal root, or from a substantive. The suffix 'il or 'iil (corresponding to the "iel" of angel-names in English) is often attached to such names, for instance, RHM Rham'il "to love"; Tauri'il (ṭaura, a bull); Nuri'il (nura, fire); Gadfi'il (gadṭa, wing) and Gabri'iil (gabra, male, man). In magical texts angel and devil-names are legion. In the Canonical Prayers they are comparatively few.

Although Mandaeans neglected to document their history and have lost much of their oral traditions, they were quite eager to keep their religious heritage by copying their manuscripts. They therefore adopted strict regulations for copying their sacred manuscripts, to maintain and preserve them from one generation to the next.

The Ginza Rabba, or “Great Treasure”, is Mandaeans’ largest collection of religious principles and instructions. According to their beliefs, the Ginza was the first revelation of God to Adam and thus considered as their holy book. Among Mandaeans, the book is also known as Sidra Rabba, the great codex or Sidra ’d Adam, the codex of Adam.

As unique as these people are, their holy book is specially arranged: it consists of two volumes, the yamina or “right” and smala or “left” Ginza. The “right” volume is larger and contains 18 chapters divided into individual tractates, whereas the “left” volume includes 3 main chapters containing many hymns. The way of binding both volumes together is very particular and used by the Mandaeans only for this book. Both parts have to be bundled together in one tome; the “left” part is placed upside-down to the “right” part, so that both parts can be read from right-to-left according to the Mandaic alphabet.

The Ginza Rabba varies in its contents and deals with spiritual, even metaphysical aspects. It also deals with the mortal life of human beings and describes ancient visions concerning life after death. In particular, the “right” volume depicts the Mandaean theology, cosmogony and anthropogeny, i.e. the Mandaeans' dogma of monotheism and the creation story of the cosmos and mankind; in this part, Mandaean ethics are outlined by a detailed account of moral duties. On the other hand, the "left" volume is concerned entirely with the return of the soul to its origin in the world of light; it is about the ascent of the soul after death and the idea of eternal life.

Generally, the Ginza Rabba represents consecutively the principles of the Mandaean doctrine: the belief of the only one great God, Hayyi Rabbi, to whom all absolute properties belong; he created all the worlds, formed the soul through his power, and placed it by means of angels into the human body. So he created Adam and Hawa/Eve, the first man and woman. Since the soul was brought down to the material world, it has to stay for a defined period of time in the human body and is obliged to suffer its worldly fate; however, the soul as a part of the divine creation should encourage human beings to do good deeds and to confront evil with God's help. God therefore sent the saviour to protect the soul, along with messengers to guide the people to a pious life according to His will. When the soul completes its predestined lifespan, the saviour will come to accompany it back from the body to its origins, whereupon it has to pass through several stations of purification.

In more recent times, Mandaeans have been facing serious difficulties in reading and understanding the Ginza Rabba, and explaining its contents to their children and neighbors because of its original Mandaic language.

In the past, there were several serious attempts to translate the Ginza Rabba into foreign languages by scholars as part of their studies of Mandaean religion. This began with the attempt of the Swedish Orientalist Mathias Norberg to translate it into Latin in 1815/1816. The first printed version of the Ginza Rabba was copied by the German Orientalist Heinrich Julius Petermann in 1867. Then the German scholar Wilhelm Brandt attempted to translate the whole book into German, but only published some portions in 1839. His colleague Mark Lidzbarski produced the first translation of the whole book into German in 1925. Other scholars included in their publications some passages translated into English, usually relying upon the German version.

Despite these considerable efforts, Mandaeans were unable to use these editions in Iraq and Iran due to the unfamiliarity of German and Latin there. As the result of an increasing need to have a comprehensible Ginza in Iraq, the headship of the Mandaeans decided to translate the Ginza Rabba into Arabic.

Since the last quarter of the twentieth century, the Mandaeans have been forced to leave their homelands. They have escaped to many countries, so that three-quarters of them are now living in the Diaspora.

Due to their emigration to foreign countries, the new generation of Mandaeans is becoming fully integrated into their new societies. They are deeply influenced by the cultures and the languages of these new "homelands". However, they have to sustain their identity by means of understanding their own religion and presenting their faith to other interested people.

As a result of this, it became necessary to translate the Ginza Rabba into English, so that coming generations will maintain their religious education in a language which is of common use.

Even though this edition represents a translation of the meaning, reflecting the intentions behind the original text rather than a literal translation, we were quite careful and attentive towards conveying the spiritually worded text from its Mandaic origins to an understandable language. The Ginza Rabba should be easily read and understood by everyone; our aim is to make its ancient heritage coherent with modern usage, so that readers are not confused.

This project was according to the permission and supervision of Rishema Sattar Jabbar Hillo the head of the Mandaeans in the world and Rishema Salah Jabbar Tawos the head of the Mandaeans in Australia. I would like to thank them for involving me in this important project.

Isidore of Seville and his Reception in the Early Middle Ages

Late Antique and Early Medieval Iberia

Scholarship on the Iberian Peninsula in late antiquity and the early Middle Ages is burgeoning across a variety of disciplines and time periods, yet the publication profile of the field remains disjointed. 'Late Antique and Early Medieval Iberia' (LAEMI) provides a publication hub for high-quality research on Iberian Studies from the fields of history, archaeology, theology and religious studies, numismatics, palaeography, music, and cognate disciplines.
Another key aim of the series is to break down barriers between the excellent scholarship that takes place in Iberia and Latin America and the Anglophone worlds.

Preface

Paul Fouracre, University of Manchester

‘God’s anger was shown so clearly that a star appeared in the heavens – the star astrologers call a comet: when it rises, they say, the earth is convulsed with hunger, with the swift succession of kings, with the movement of peoples, and the clashing of swords threatens it’. These are the words of a Frankish hagiographer writing probably in the early 680s. He (we can be almost certain that it was a ‘he’) was describing the interregnum of 675/6 which led to the death of his hero, Leudegar, bishop of Autun. The passage just quoted came from Isidore’s Etymologies (3.71.16). For an author who rarely moves beyond the scriptural in his borrowings, it is remarkable to see him turning to Isidore in this way. The borrowing is testimony both to the rapid dissemination of Isidore’s works across Western Europe and to their importance as tools for explaining human vicissitudes in a turbulent world.

Several of the chapters in this volume derive from a day workshop that was held at the Instituto Cervantes in Manchester in April 2013. The aim in putting together the volume was to combine these pieces with some specially-commissioned studies in order to create the first English-language collected volume on Isidore. Drawing on the strong scholarly tradition in the study of Isidore in France and Spain, as well as the increasing number of new editions of key Isidorian texts, the volume incorporates original contributions from established and early career scholars that provide a chronologically and geographically coherent overview of Isidore’s impact across Western Europe in the early medieval period, from Spain, Ireland, England, Italy and Francia.

The debt Western European learning of the Early Middle Ages owed to Isidore as a transmitter and translator of the classical tradition is more or less a given in narratives of intellectual history. A collection of essays that clarifies, highlights nuances and further explains his contribution is therefore most welcome. It is particularly useful to juxtapose the Iberian context of Isidore’s work with its reception in other cultures: the collection demonstrates, as the editors put it, ‘that there was not one Isidorian legacy but many’. And as Christopher Heath’s chapter suggests, we can identify that legacy in works which do not actually quote him. Heath’s thinking was in fact prompted by a question at a seminar in London where he presented a structural analysis of the works of Paul the Deacon. There, a distinguished classicist asked, ‘Where is Isidore in all this?’ Well, in linguistic terms, strictly nowhere, but was it conceivable that Paul, writing in the later eighth century, was influenced by Isidore? Careful research reveals that indeed he was: Paul's praise of Italy turns out to owe a great deal to Isidore's Laus Spaniae. One reason for thinking that Paul must have been familiar with Isidore's work is that he was a fixture of the Carolingian cultural project into which Paul was himself co-opted. Laura Carlson explains how the Carolingian intelligentsia were reliant on Isidore to formulate their views on spirituality, especially in relation to image and language. Interestingly it was another Spaniard, Theodulf of Orléans, who led the thinking here, and Theodulf was very proud of his Iberian heritage. Melissa Markauskas further shows how Carolingians reached for their Isidore to help them navigate Patristic material. In short, for the Carolingians Isidore was also the 'go to' for political ideas, for explanations of natural phenomena, for the definitions of orthodoxy and heresy, and for the conception of Iberia itself. It is surely no coincidence that when the Carolingians tried to put that religious definition into practice by presenting themselves as the standard bearers of orthodoxy, they turned their fire upon Adoptionism, a peculiarly Spanish (and frankly rather obscure) heresy. More surprising at first sight is to find the influence of Isidore's Synonyma upon Felix's Life of Guthlac, for this is set in the early eighth century in the badlands around Crowland, still today a remote spot in the Lincolnshire fens. But as Claudia di Siacca makes clear, it is not that surprising given the fact that Isidore was, in the words of our editors, 'a staple figure of early Anglo-Saxon libraries'.

Isidore's influence spread like the Atlantic tide, up from Spain, round the British Isles and down into Francia, as well as by land across into Francia from the south. The two pulses met in Alcuin and Theodulf, the Northumbrian and the Spaniard, two bitter rivals at Charlemagne's court. Despite their differences (porridge versus spicy sausage, according to Theodulf), they shared political ideas about how society could be 'corrected' and how it should be ruled that were ultimately derived from Isidore. The historical importance of this political/cultural narrative demands that we get it right. When, exactly, did Isidore's works reach Ireland, Marina Smyth asks. How did Isidore make use of Pliny? Critically, answers Mary Beagon. Did Isidore really wish to preserve a separate sphere of secular learning? Definitely not, argues Andrew Fear. These are questions and answers that bring us closer to understanding the Isidorian phenomenon. As important is understanding the context in which Isidore wrote, and how the whole project evolved. Jamie Wood is enlightening on Isidore's family and the importance of Leander's encounter with Pope Gregory I. Finally, Michael J. Kelly unsettles us with the suggestion that there was actually a Spanish 'school' in opposition to Isidore's legacy. What, one wonders, would the early medieval intellectual world have been like if they had succeeded in crushing it?

This last question points to an elephant in the room: evaluation. Was Isidore's legacy massive because his works were brilliant? Was his elision of secular and Christian scholarship so successful that it set a template that could not be improved upon? Did the legacy actually prevent alternatives being developed? Or might it have been the case that there was simply no effective competition because no one else had such a command of ancient learning? This would certainly seem to be true for the Etymologies – hence our Frankish hagiographer turning to them for the meaning of comets. It does look, too, as if Isidore's political ideas were about all that were available to early medieval thinkers, from pseudo-Cyprian to Hincmar, from late seventh-century Ireland to late ninth-century Francia (hence Alcuin and Theodulf agreeing on rule and justice and very little else). Jacques Fontaine hinted that it was the poverty of the barbarian intellect that threw Isidore into such sharp relief and made his works so desirable to distant peoples. But if it were Isidore who set the terms for relating knowledge to God, showed the relationship between the natural and the divine orders, and the way for rulers to obey a divine mandate, then should we also hold him responsible for the unremitting masculinity of discourse in all of these areas? His conception of Christian order was, after all, predicated on the subordination of women. Starting from a counterfactual basis, these may be unfair questions, and certainly a collection of essays around the theme of Transmitting and Transforming Knowledge: Isidore of Seville and his Reception in the Early Middle Ages has no brief to pose or answer them. But it is testimony to the clarity with which these essays bring out the importance of Isidore's transmission and Christianisation of knowledge that such questions creep into the readers' minds. In other words, Isidore is good to think with, and always fascinating to read about, as will become very clear in what follows.

1 Introduction[1]

Andrew Fear and Jamie Wood

> 'The Great Doctor of our times, the newest ornament of the Catholic Church, last in time but by no means least in the field of doctrine [...] the most learned man in these latter times, he whom one should name with reverence, Isidore [...]'[2]

Such was the judgement on Isidore of Seville of the bishops who had gathered for the eighth Council of Toledo in 653, some 18 years after his death. Later ages have agreed – Dante placed the ardente spiro of Isidore alongside Solomon and Boethius in Paradise;[3] in the eighteenth century Isidore was elevated to the status of Doctor of the church by the intellectually minded Pope Innocent XIII; and in the late twentieth century he was to become unofficially the patron saint of computer programmers and of the Internet.

Long the subject of detailed analysis in Spanish and French scholarship[4], the past decade has witnessed a flowering of interest in Isidore in the Anglophone world.[5] As well as playing an important role in the ecclesiastical and royal politics of the first third of the seventh century, as the accolades above demonstrate, Isidore had a considerable impact in the seventh century and throughout the medieval period, especially in the Latin world. Sources written and influenced by Isidore are fundamental to our understanding of the seventh century in Spain and it could be argued that his influence on the written record for the period lends him a higher historical significance even than the Visigothic kings who were his contemporaries. Yet Isidore did not work alone and we might do better imagining him as the best remembered of a coterie of prolific Spanish bishops in the late sixth and seventh centuries. As some of the studies in this volume demonstrate, his legacy was by no means uncontested: the later reception and transmission of his works was both extensive and highly variable in both form and content. The chapters in this volume explore the relationship between the historical situation in which Isidore worked and his posthumous legacy; it is through putting these contexts in dialogue with one another that we can better understand both early seventh century Spain and the remouldings of Isidore's works and image later in the Middle Ages.

Isidore was probably born in the city where he would later become bishop in around AD 601. Very little is known of his family who were of Hispano-Roman, not Gothic, origin. Severian, his father, said in some later accounts to have been a high-ranking official, was a native of the province of Carthaginiensis in the south-east, but was forced to flee as a consequence of either the Byzantine invasion of the Peninsula in AD 552 or of finding himself on the wrong side of the civil war that was raging between King Agila and his rival Athanagild at that same time.[6] Isidore is often said to have been born in the 560s/570s, but the sole foundation for this is an assumption that he became a bishop as soon as his age allowed. This is itself a problematic point, though we know that the two councils of the Trinitarian Church, those of Agde (506) and Arles (524), decreed that 30 was the youngest age for a man to be made a bishop or indeed a cleric of any kind and that this was confirmed by canons 19 and 20 of the fourth Council of Toledo in 633, which was presided over by Isidore. Nevertheless it is dangerous to assume that Isidore's elder brother, Leander, whom he immediately succeeded as Bishop of Seville, died precisely at the time when [6] The most important biographical writings are collected in Martín, Scripta de vita Isidori episcopi Hispalensis. his younger sibling could take his place, so it may well be that Isidore's birth should be pushed back in time.

In his youth Isidore lived with his brother and, as Leander was a monk, he may also have taken up the monastic life, although this is not clear.[7] The elder brother was well educated and seems to have taken personal care of Isidore's education. The prose style of Leander's surviving works is decidedly Ciceronian and this has led Fontaine to insist that Severian had given a good classical education to his son.[8] Isidore in his brief biography of his brother describes him as 'eloquent in speech, most outstanding in ability.'[9] Sadly most of Leander's work has been lost; all that remains are a rule for nuns and a homily delivered on the conversion of the kingdom to Trinitarianism (the De Triumpho Ecclesiæ ob Conversionem Gothorum). From Isidore we learn that Leander also wrote 'two books against heretical dogmas (no doubt Arianism) full of learning from the scriptures'.[10]

Leander sought, it seems, to cultivate a culture of learning within the Church in Spain in order to better serve the pastoral and spiritual needs of the population. Isidore succeeded his brother as bishop of Seville in 601 and remained in office until his death on 4th April 636, producing a large number of writings across a range of genres during his long episcopacy. We have two lists of Isidore's works. One was compiled by Ildefonsus of Toledo in his De viris illustribus at some point between 659 and 667, the other by Braulio of Saragossa not long after Isidore's death, in what is now known as the Renotatio librorum domini Isidori (praenotatio is also found).[11] Braulio intended this document to be a supplement to Isidore's own De viris illustribus and his list is by far the more complete of the two.[12] Besides 'many other minor writings' that he does not name,[13] Braulio lists the following seventeen major works, perhaps in the order of their composition:[14]

[14] This has been the assumption of most scholars and was the basis for de Aldama's chronology of Isidore's writings: 'Indicaciones sobre la cronología'. For doubts see Elfassi in Chiesa and Castaldi, p. 202.

The Differentiae (two books): a work which deals with the difference and correct usage of apparent synonyms and homophones. Its second book also deals with the differences between different categories of beings.[15]

The Prooemia: a summary of the contents of each of the books of the Bible.[16]

De ortu et obitu Patrum: a series of short biographies of key Biblical figures.[17]

De ecclesiasticis officiis (two books): dedicated to his brother Fulgentius, the bishop of Écija. The first of the two books gives a history of the Catholic liturgy, while the second describes the duties of ecclesiastic officials.[18]

The Synonyma (two books): sometimes known as the Liber lamentationum, this is in fact a religious work set as a dialogue between Man and Reason. Man laments his fallen state, while Reason consoles him by showing how he might still be saved. The work takes its name from the 'synonymous style' of arguing, where the points made are repeated via the use of synonyms. The popularity of this technique gave rise to the so-called stylus Isidorianus in the Middle Ages.[19]

De natura rerum: dedicated to the Gothic King Sisebut, this is an exposition of the natural world and phenomena of nature. After the Etymologies, it was perhaps the most widely read of Isidore's works.[20]

De numeris: an examination of the mystical significance of the numbers found in the Bible.[21]

De nominibus legis et evangelorum [often referred to as the Allegoriae]: a discussion of the allegorical meaning of Biblical names.[22]

De haeresibus [now lost]: this work is likely to have dealt with Arianism, but also the Acephalites whom Braulio tells us Isidore expressly opposed.[23]

Sententiae (three books): a systematic treatise on church doctrine and the Christian life. One important source for the work is the Moralia of Gregory the Great.[24]

Chronicon: Isidore's Chronicle draws heavily of that of Eusebius as translated by Jerome.[25]

De fide Catholica contra Judaeos (two books): allegedly written at the request of Isidore's sister, the abbess Florentina. This treatise is ostensibly a polemic aimed at persuading Jews to convert to Christianity, but in fact is a theological work which has a Christian audience as its target.[26]

De viris illustribus: a series of brief biographies of Church Fathers and essentially a continuation of St Jerome's work of the same name.[27]

Monastica regula: a discussion in praise of monastic life with practical advice on its practice.[28]

De origine Gothorum et regno Suevorum et etiam Wandalorum: a history of the Gothic people with (in the second redaction alone) shorter sections on the Sueves and Vandals down to Isidore's own day.[29]

> Quaestiones (two books): an examination of various Biblical cruces derived mainly from earlier Church Fathers.[30]
> Etymologiae or Origines: Isidore's last, and major, work, which was posthumously divided by Braulio into 20 books.[31] It was a compendium of classical and Christian knowledge arranged according to the etymologies of words and became a standard point of reference in the Middle Ages.[32]

Apart from these works, a small collection of thirteen of Isidore's letters has also survived.[33] Not on Braulio's list is the De ordine creaturarum, a further treatment of the natural world which also incorporates the supernatural heavens. This has often been accepted as Isidore's work, but may well have been composed by an Irish monk of the seventh century.[34] The plethora of other writings attributed to him are later, false accreditations, though are a testament of his intellectual standing over the centuries.

For Braulio, through Isidore God had allowed Visigothic Spain 'to mirror the learning of antiquity', as the bishop had brought back to light the works of 'the ancients', thus stopping his own generation growing old through its boorishness.[35] As well as contemporary and earlier Christian authors, Isidore makes many direct references to pagan authors as diverse as Aesop, Apuleius, Aristotle, Caesar, Cicero, Lucretius, Ovid, Plato, the Elder Pliny, Quintilian, Sallust, Solinus, Suetonius (in particular his lost encyclopaedia, the Prata), Varro, and Virgil. Other classical authors, such as Verrius Flaccus, who wrote his On the Meaning of Words in the Augustan period, and the late fourth century grammarian Servius, also influenced Isidore's work. It is difficult, of course, to know with how many of these authors Isidore was directly acquainted; he would probably have known the majority only at second hand via quotations in such authors as Augustine and Cassiodorus.[36] It does seem likely however that Isidore had first-hand access to Cicero, Quintilian, Virgil, Lucretius, and Martial. He may also have possessed some of the works of Ovid and Sallust. The so-called Versus in bibliotheca, a series of couplets modelled on Martial which were intended to be placed under the busts surmounting the book cases in the cathedral library in Visigothic Seville, mention the Greek Christian authors Origen and John Chrysostom. Isidore devotes one chapter of his De viris illustribus to the latter, but it is more likely that he knew John and Origen's works in translation rather than the original.[37]

Braulio asserted that Isidore's learning was holistic – he had given an account of all branches of knowledge. The Renotatio ended with a eulogy of the bishop that was self-consciously adapted from Cicero's praise of the polymath of his own age, Varro.[38] The breadth of his work and the sources he drew on have sometimes led to him being described as the last scholar of the ancient world.[39] Nothing could be further from the truth. For Isidore the road to hell was indeed paved with ignorance: 'ignorance is the mother of all error and the nurse of vice... the uneducated man is easily deceived, the fool swiftly falls into sin'.[40] Nevertheless, he was also hostile towards secular learning merely for its own sake; pagan poetry in particular was something he detested.[41] For the bishop the world was a mirror of heaven and knowledge of it was but a protreptic to draw the mind away from mundane matters towards first the moral truth that they encapsulated, and finally the theological truth which in turn lay behind the moral truth.[42] If there was a choice to be made, knowledge of the divine was to be put before that of the world:

Although it is sometimes asserted that Isidore knew Greek and Hebrew, as he is described in the late twelfth century *Vita S. For an overview of this problem, see Domínguez de Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina, pp. 27-30. There is an edition of the Versus by Martín. [40] Synonima 2.65, ignorantia mater errorum est, ignorantia vitiorum nutrix ... indoctus enim facile decipitur. Stultus in vitia cito dilabitur.

[41] One of Isidore's concerns was that it was the pagan poets who had first distorted the meaning of words in order to fit the metrical schemes of their poetry (Differentiae 1, praef.), but his main animus was that such poetry was founded in pagan religion and thus: Ideo prohibetur christianus figmenta legere poetarum quia per oblectamenta inanium fabularum mentem excitant ad incentiua libidinum. Non enim solum tura offerendo daemonibus immolatur, sed etiam eorum

> 'It will be of no harm to anyone, provided that he speaks truly of God, that through his simplicity he has insufficient knowledge of the elements. For though someone may be unable to discuss the natures of the incorporeal and corporeal, a good life lived with faith will make him blessed.'[43]

Far from being part of the rearguard of the classical world, Isidore was at the forefront of a new Christian order. But this new order by no means despised learning. Ideally the good man would be an educated man: 'All wisdom comes from knowledge and conjecture,' Isidore believes, 'but an opinion derived from knowledge is better than one derived from conjecture as the former is true, whereas the latter is open to doubt.'[44] It is perhaps unsurprising therefore that the fourth Council of Toledo over which Isidore presided in AD 633, insisted that there should be an educated secular clergy and made provision for cathedral schools to be set up in every diocesis.[45]

While Isidore's prose style may not be as 'classical' as Leander's, Henderson has shown that he was not insensitive to careful prose composition.[46] According to Braulio, he could adopt his style to his audience and was outstandingly eloquent when the occasion demanded. The practical nature of the prose in his works shows that he wished them to be of real use, not showcases for his rhetorical ability. His greatest wish was to spread knowledge and thus his faith. In the short term he laid the foundations for the so-called 'Isidorian renaissance' of Visigothic Spain, of which his friend and posthumous editor of the Etymologies, Braulio of Saragossa, was a key part. In the long term the influence of his work in both its geographical and temporal extent show the degree to which that wish was fulfilled.

The aim of this volume is not, however, to offer a 'maximalist' interpretation of Isidore's impact.[47] Isidore exercised agency in writing his works and intervening in the world around him, yet so too did those who worked with him, notably Braulio, in the early seventh century, as well as those who interacted with and sought to mould his legacy in the decades and centuries that followed. As Michael J. Kelly's chapter demonstrates, Seville was not the only intellectual centre in the Spain of Isidore's day. Other cities strove to establish – and in the case of Toledo succeeded – their ecclesiastical and literary dominance within Spain.

Recent studies have begun to reconceptualise the ways in which knowledge was preserved and transmitted in the Roman and post-Roman worlds.[48] Scholars have explored how information moved between different contexts, in the process charting the varying ways in which cultural objects were transmitted, translated and transformed. Such work has demonstrated how the people of the medieval world – writers, copyists, translators, teachers, students, and other audiences – engaged actively with the cultural legacy of the ancient classical and Christian past. They did not simply pass on the knowledge and traditions that they had inherited from earlier civilisations, even those from which they claimed ancestry and legitimacy, but developed what they had received in many new ways that were designed to respond to contemporary needs.[49]

It is within this context of creative and contextually-grounded engagement with the cultural world of Graeco-Roman and Patristic antiquity that this volume seeks to understand Isidore. Work over the past half-century has demonstrated that the construction of Isidore's main works was determined, above all, by the context in which he was operating and his desire to influence the society for which he saw the Hispano-Visigothic church as responsible. Political, religious and social considerations influenced Isidore's writings, but studies have revealed that those writings were intended, in turn, to influence the contexts from which they emerged.[50] As has already been noted, Isidore was not writing in a vacuum and his works represented part of a thorough programme of spiritual education that was intended to have a positive impact on the training of the clergy of Visigothic Spain and, through them, the population as a whole.

The first three chapters in this volume examine some of the innovative ways in which Isidore was influenced by, and made use of the works of, earlier classical and Christian writers. Jamie Wood's 'A Family Affair: Leander, Isidore and the Legacy of Gregory the Great in Spain' examines the rapid and wide-ranging influence of Pope Gregory I (d. 604) in seventh-century Spain. Gregory's works were cited extensively in Spain within a few years of his death and he found eager biographers among the episcopate there. The chapter argues that the cultivation of Gregory's memory aligned well with the efforts of Leander and Isidore to promote an image of their family as a coherent and powerful unit of exceptional Christian leaders. Gregory's meeting with Leander in Constantinople in the early 580s opened up a channel of communication between Rome and Spain that resulted in the early dissemination of Gregory's works there and provided Isidore with the opportunity and the ammunition to build up Gregory's image in Spain. Two imperatives underpinned Isidore's positive portrayal of Gregory and attempt to harness his legacy. First, his writings, especially the Moralia in Job, provided vital resources for Isidore's efforts to promote the education of the clergy and, through them, the evangelisation of the population. Second, the association with Leander enabled Isidore to bolster the status of members of his own family, especially Leander, as foundational figures in the history of the Spanish Nicene church.

From Isidore's engagement with the Patristic canon, the next two chapters move on to his use and refutation of classical interpretations of the natural world. In 'Variations on a Theme: Isidore and Pliny on Human and Human-Instigated Anomaly', Mary Beagon examines the use Isidore made of Pliny's Natural History, written in the late first century AD, when discussing human and animal anomalies in the Etymologies. The chapter demonstrates that Isidore's engagement with Pliny's work was by no means uncritical. Rather than simply copying Pliny's work, Isidore adapted his source so that it accorded with his own ideas about a divine plan that had no room for natural creativity which, if admitted, would undermine the entire Isidorian project of rational categorisation. Isidore's theory of etymology also required the imposition of a sort of natural order on the text that mitigated any possibility of deviation from the divine plan.

Andrew Fear's 'Putting the pieces back together: Isidore and De natura rerum' examines Isidore's De natura rerum (DNR), arguing that the work was written to respond to a specific problem – the appearance of a number of disconcerting natural 'omens' at the beginning of King Sisebut's reign in the early 610s. Isidore used this context to develop a Christianised vision of the natural world in order to reject excessive 'superstition' at the same time as firmly integrating the natural world into a Christian framework. Rather than, as scholars such as Fontaine have suggested, wishing to preserve a separate sphere of secular learning, Isidore actually wished to elide secular and Christian scholarship. The very title De natura rerum presents a challenge to Lucretius's didactic poem the De rerum natura written in the first century BC. Lucretius's work became a classic in the ancient world and was still read in Visigothic Spain. In it, Lucretius, as a follower of the Greek philosopher Epicurus, presents an entirely atheistic picture of the world whose phenomena carry no meaning beyond themselves. Isidore, deliberately using a title which closely parallels the previous work, mounts a determined refutation of Lucretius, using his themes to argue for a "natural theology" and that in fact only a belief in God can elucidate the natural world.

Isidore thus played the role of a kind of filtering agent, receiving, transforming and reconfiguring existing learning in order to make it useful for the Christian present in seventh century Spain. Alongside work that has explored how Isidore reacted to previous authorities, classical/pagan and Christian, perhaps the strongest trend in recent Isidorian scholarship is to examine the later reception and transmission of his memory and his works across the Latin West.[51] Much of this work has stressed the variability and creativity of the ways in which later writers made use of Isidore's works. The chapters in the second half of this volume underline the fact that Isidorian legacy was by no means monolithic and was at times contested, even within Spain.

Isidore's legacy was by no means unproblematic for the bishops of seventh century Spain, especially those of Toledo who were striving to establish their city as the ecclesiastical centre of the kingdom. The Isidorian legacy and the lustre that it lent to Seville were highly problematic in this regard.[52] Michael J. Kelly's chapter, 'The Politics of History-Writing: Problematizing the Historiographical Origins of Isidore of Seville in Early Medieval Hispania' argues that conflict over Isidore's memory began almost immediately upon his death in 636. Kelly posits the existence of two 'schools' within seventh-century Iberia – that of Isidore/Seville and that of Agali/Toledo – and suggests that competition between the two was manifested, above all and amongst a range of different media, by the production of historical texts that constructed very specific memories of past events and people. Above all, it was in historiographical texts produced by and about Isidore that this conflict played out in the later seventh century and beyond.

[51] For a survey of the transmission of Isidore's works see: Codoñer, Martín & Andrés Sanz, 'Isidorus Hispalensis ep.' and Reydellet, 'La diffusion' for the Etymologies. More recent focused studies include: Di Sciacca, Finding the Right Words; Hussey, 'Transmarinis litteris'; Warntjes, The Munich Computus.

Marina Smyth's 'The Reception of Isidore's Writings in Early Medieval Ireland' opens a series of chapters that explore concrete instances of the reception and reuse of Isidore's works outside Spain in the seventh, eighth, and ninth centuries. Some of the earliest traces of Isidore's works outside Spain can be found in manuscripts of Irish provenance and it has long been assumed that Irish monks played a key role in the preservation and transmission of the Isidorian legacy.[53] Smyth explores the longstanding assumption that, due to trading contacts between Spain and Ireland, the complete works of Isidore found their way to Ireland very soon after his death in 636.[54] This assumption has been rendered increasingly untenable by recent studies of the early manuscript transmission of Isidore's works.[55] The chapter pays particular attention to the De Natura Rerum and the various books of the Etymologiae in order to generate a more nuanced profile for the transmission of Isidore's works in Ireland.

'Isidore of Seville in Anglo-Saxon England: The Synonyma as a Source of Felix's Vita S. Guthlaci', by Claudia Di Sciacca, focuses on Anglo-Saxon England. Scholars have long debated the extent to which Bede was influenced by Isidore (both positively and negatively), but more recent works have begun to examine the transmission and impact of Isidore's works on other early Anglo-Saxon writers.[56] Isidore is now recognised as one of the staple figures of Anglo-Saxon libraries. Di Sciacca investigates the Synonyma as a source for one of the founding and most popular texts of Anglo-Saxon hagiography, the Latin life of the hermit-saint Guthlac, a highly literary work authored by the learned monk Felix, an elusive figure of whom nothing is known except that he dedicated his Vita S. Guthlaci to Ælfwald, king of the East Angles (c. 713-749). The setting of Guthlac's life itself is Crowland, a demon-infested islet in the fenland between Mercia and East Anglia, and the Mercian-East Anglian associations of the saint and his uita seem to offer precious evidence as to the circulation of the Synonyma in an age and area of Anglo-Saxon England where knowledge of this Isidorian text is otherwise hardly documented. Moreover, an appreciation of the Synonyma within the milieu that produced the Vita S. Guthlaci, a locale which seems to have nurtured an interest in eremitic values and a detailed knowledge of some of the key hagiographies concerning the founders of Eastern monasticism, namely the Vita S. Antonii and Vita S. Pauli eremitae, offers new and tantalising insights into the literary corpus with which the Isidorian text was probably associated. Such an appreciation can therefore help to further sketch out the Anglo-Saxon library to which the Synonyma belonged.

Christopher Heath's 'Hispania et Italia: Paul the Deacon, Isidore and the Lombards' fills a surprising gap in scholarship on early medieval historiography by exploring Isidore's influence on the works of Paul the Deacon in the eighth century. Heath demonstrates that despite the somewhat peripheral role that Spain and the Visigoths played in the Historia Langobardorum, there are indications that Isidore had a significant influence on specific sections of the work, such as the ethnographic and historical-geographical materials. Moreover, there are indications that certain key parts of Paul's work were crafted with an eye to the Laus Spaniae of Isidore. Just as Isidore used previous historians creatively in order to present his Visigoths as a legitimate people in political and religious terms, so Paul the Deacon made selective use of Isidore in order to demonstrate that the Lombards were a gens with a long and illustrious history.[57]

Melissa Markauskas's 'Rylands MS Latin 12: A Carolingian example of Isidore's reception into the Patristic Canon?' demonstrates the selective use that later copyists made of Isidore's writings. The chapter examines Rylands MS Latin 12 as a specific and concrete example of unacknowledged copying of Isidorian material in the Carolingian period. Markauskas demonstrates that Isidore's De ortu et obitu Patrum was frequently used as a source for the homiliary, but was clearly marked as a secondary authority through the collection's organisation and visual presentation of Patristic material. Rylands MS Latin 12 thus provides an interesting instance of Isidore's reception in a Carolingian liturgical context, where daily Patristic readings expounding the gospels were valued alongside supplementary biographical material concerning the saint for that day. In this context, it was Isidore's 'data' rather than his 'authority' that was desired. He emerges as a second-level authority who was important, but not so illustrious as to merit explicit citation like the Fathers of the Church.

In the final chapter, 'Adoption, Adaptation, & Authority: The Use of Isidore in the Opus Caroli', Laura Carlson delves into the broader influence of Isidore on the Carolingian intelligentsia, a massive topic in need of further study.[58] The chapter discusses the prevalence of Isidore in the eighth-century Opus Caroli regis contra Synodum, the largest extant work on Carolingian spirituality and a text which serves as a signpost to not only his rapid rise to the status of almost Patristic authority, but also his contribution to the development of a Carolingian linguistic philosophy. Isidore's growing status and accessibility within the eighth-century Carolingian intellectual landscape is easily confirmed by both the extant number of his works, not to mention the frequency with which Carolingian writers cite him. The chapter demonstrates that the exposition on the relationship between images and language in the Opus Caroli derived from Isidore's linguistic philosophy, developed in his Etymologiae, which advocated the widespread applicability of classical linguistic disciplines, such as grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic within the context of Christian spirituality.

Alongside other chapters in the second half of this volume, the exploration of Carolingian-era uses of Isidore by Heath, Markauskas, and Carlson provide further evidence for the flexibility with which Isidore's legacy was treated from 636 onwards. Just as the chapters by Beagon, Fear, and Wood demonstrate that Isidore himself interacted with his sources freely and was not constrained by any particular need to remain 'faithful' to the writings of his predecessors, the chapters on the western European transmission of Isidore's work demonstrate that there was not one Isidorian legacy, but many.[59] Furthermore, these legacies were by no means fixed – they were made and remade in response to specific historically-grounded agendas. It is beyond the scope of this volume to examine the continued transmission and transformation of Isidore's works and his image in post-Carolingian Europe (and beyond). It is enough to note that creative adaptation continued to typify the ways in which Isidore was used by later writers and to hope that future publications will explore what is, given the central role of 'Isidorian' methods for organising and transmitting knowledge, a fundamental element of the medieval thought-world.[60]

The interplays between text and context examined in the various studies in this volume demonstrate the need to understand the varied and creative ways by which Isidore's works, wholly and in part, were transmitted and transformed over time. In summary, it is necessary to comprehend the origins and early receptions of Isidorian texts if one is to unpick their later transformations. The chapters in the first half of the volume thus establish the context from which to understand those in the second half, which provide an overview of the different ways in which Isidore's works were received across early medieval Western Europe. Both sections create the necessary context from which to develop a fuller understanding of later receptions of Isidore's work in the post-Carolingian era.

Introduction

There is no doubt that Pope Gregory I (r. 590-605) had a deep and lasting impact on the religious life of early medieval Spain.[2] It would be easy, with the benefit of hindsight, to look back from Gregory's status as one of the fathers of the Latin Church and see this as an inevitable outcome of his exemplary life and work in organising the papacy and sending missions to the Anglo-Saxons. Yet, his memory was by no means uncontested in Rome in the decades after his death and no hagiography was authored there until the ninth century. A famous Life of Gregory was written at Whitby in northern England around the year 700 which drew on interest in his cult in later seventh century England, Ireland and Gaul, as well as Rome.[3] This chapter will demonstrate that beginning in the first decade of the seventh century, Gregory's status as a Father of the Church was actually established more quickly and maintained more solidly in Spain than elsewhere in Latin Europe.

The verse above, by Isidore of Seville (d. 636), is thus the first bloom of the Gregorian legacy in seventh century Spain. The extremely positive view of Gregory was not solely the result of his position as bishop of Rome, however. Relations between the papacy and the bishops and kings of seventh century Spain were infrequent and often fractious, so the memory of Gregory cannot be attributed solely to royal or papal initiative.[4] Although there had been ecclesiastical contacts between Rome and Spain throughout late antiquity, such interactions had never been intense, at least insofar as they can be pieced together from the surviving evidence.[5] This chapter will argue that Gregory's popularity in the early seventh century was due to his connection to Leander of Seville and thus to his brother Isidore of Seville. It was not derived from respect for the papacy as an institution, nor did it result from the active cultivation of Gregory's memory in Spain by later popes or their agents. Rather, it was the family connection to Isidore and Isidore's intense engagement with some of Gregory's key works that conditioned the interest of bishops and even a Visigothic king later in the seventh century.

A number of Gregory's hagiographical, exegetical and pastoral writings were transmitted to Spain during his lifetime and almost immediately used as sources and taken up as models by Spanish writers such as Isidore of Seville, Taio of Zaragoza and the author of the collective hagiography known as the Lives of Fathers of Mérida.[6] Figures from Isidore to Eugenius of Toledo engaged with, and sometimes sought to replicate, Gregory's self-presentation as monk, reluctant leader, theologian, and even hypochondriac.[7] Historical as well as literary circumstances contributed to the rapid spread of Gregory's popularity within Spain. He wrote letters to Spanish laymen and churchmen, including several to Leander of Seville, Isidore's brother, and received a letter from King Reccared I (r. 586-601) announcing the conversion to the Visigoths from Arian to Nicene Christianity.[8]

It was Isidore of Seville, however, who made the earliest and most extensive use of Gregory's writings. The rapid adoption of Gregory's works was aided by the fact that his legacy was so flexible: his focus on the pastoral role of leaders could be applied to thinking about monastic, episcopal and even royal authority.[9] Other works by Gregory, such as the Moralia in Job, could have served as educational texts in an additional sense by providing learners with models for conducting exegesis, for example.[10] Although the theological and pastoral weight of Gregory's surviving writings cannot be ignored and they certainly contributed to the depth and longevity of his impact in Spain, this chapter argues that the key to his influence lies in the connection to Leander of Seville and, through Leander, to Isidore. A meeting with Leander in Constantinople in the mid-580s opened up opportunities for the exchange of texts and letters and, more importantly, created a close association that Isidore was able to exploit as part of his efforts to boost the status of the Spanish Church and his own family. Importantly too, via Leander, Isidore had easy access to a number of Gregory's writings, which proved extremely useful in his efforts to create compendia of Christian knowledge for use by Spanish ecclesiastics.

Gregory's Contacts with Hispania

The relative number of Gregory's letters to Spain is low, at least in comparison with the volume of letters to other western provinces, especially Italy. However, as has already been noted, such communication took place at significant moments such as the conversion, was conducted with important figures such as Reccared I and Leander of Seville, and was accompanied by the exchange of gifts and texts.[11] It may also be significant that letters were exchanged with a geographically disparate area, encompassing a large part of what would later become Visigothic Hispania: from the Byzantine-controlled territory in the southwest, to the capital at Toledo, and the small province in Gaul, Narbonnensis.[12] Gregory also intervened directly to try to uphold religious discipline and resolve ecclesiastical disputes within Spain, to encourage Nicene orthodoxy, and to act as a diplomatic intermediary between the Visigothic kings and the Byzantine government.[13]

---

[9] The influence of Gregory's Regula Pastoralis on Spain is brought out by Fernández Alonso, La cura pastoral, pp. 125-129; Wood, The Politics of Identity, p. 143: as part of this process the king's role became increasingly analogous to that of the episcopate; Martin, La géographie du pouvoir, p. 348: on the role of the king as a pastor to his people. Cf. Gregory's thought on the key role of episcopal ministry within church and society, Markus, Gregory the Great, pp. 17-33.

[10] Gregory's works, alongside those of Jerome, provided Isidore with useful aids for the study of scripture, primarily for use by those who had to expound the scriptures in public or for monks, Collins, Early Medieval Spain, p. 63.

[11] For an overview of Gregory's contacts with and writings about Spain see: Thompson, The Goths in Spain, pp. 41, 66, 73, 76-77, 90, 94, 109-112.

[12] Orlandis, 'Gregorio Magno'.

There were a number of different means by which communication was established with Spain. Diplomacy was perhaps the most important of these and although such interactions were reciprocal in nature, with Spaniards requesting advice, information and intervention, responding to Gregory's messages and sending gifts to him, the sources suggest that Gregory was the more active 'partner' in this exchange. This can be seen most clearly in the exchange of gifts. The relatively few letters that survive record the dispatch of relics to Reccared, a pallium for Leander and copies of Gregory's Regula Pastoralis and Moralia in Job.[14] It is important to note that this was not a one-way exchange and that gifts were sent to Gregory from Spain, but the overall pattern was for materials and texts to be sent out from Rome to Spain.

In terms of diplomatic exchanges, it was while Gregory was acting as papal apocrisarius (envoy) in Constantinople in the first half of the 580s that he first came into contact with Leander, who was conducting an embassy with the emperor on behalf of Hermenegild, a Visigothic prince who had rebelled against his father, King Leovigild (r. 568-586). There were later exchanges of letters and gifts with Reccared, Leovigild's successor, about the conversion of the Visigoths to Nicene Christianity. The king also requested that Gregory obtain a copy of an old treaty that had been made between the Visigoths and the Byzantines, and Gregory sent messages to Duke Claudius, the governor of Narbonnensis, in Visigothic-controlled southern Gaul.[15] As well as direct contact with Spain, there is evidence that Gregory obtained information from intermediaries. He sent legal advisors to the Byzantine-controlled province in south-eastern Spain to assist bishops who had been deposed, supposedly illegally, and also used clergy to act as intermediaries with the Visigothic kings.[16] Information also seems to have been gathered from people who had travelled there, perhaps for trading purposes, because in the Dialogues Gregory says that he heard about the death of Hermenegild from 'many who come from Spain'.[17] Of course, our record of Gregory's involvement in Spain is highly dependent on the vagaries of the surviving documentation, which is the result of the choices made by those who compiled the Register of Gregory's letters.[18] Nevertheless, in comparison with earlier, and certainly with later, bishops of Rome, Gregory seems to have communicated actively with Spain.

Early Citations of Gregory in Spain

A significant factor in the early and rapid rise in Gregory's popularity in Spain must have been the fact that his writings circulated there at an early date. Gregory sent preliminary versions of some of what were to become his most influential works to Leander, for example. Other sources suggest that Gregory's writings were desired by discerning bishops in Spain as early as the 590s. We have already observed that Leander received early versions of the Moralia in Job and the Regula Pastoralis and Licinianus of Cartagena, a bishop in Byzantine-controlled Spain, sent a letter to Gregory about the Regula Pastoralis and asked for a copy of some of Gregory's homilies on the book of Job. Apparently, he found out about Gregory's work on Job when Leander was travelling through Cartagena, presumably during his return from Constantinople.[19]

Definite citations of Gregory's works in Spain can be traced to the first decade of the seventh century. Isidore's use of Gregory will be explored in more detail later in this chapter, but he was making use of the Moralia in Job in some of his earliest works and mentioned both it and the Regula Pastoralis in the biography of Gregory that he incorporated into the De viris illustribus (written sometime between 604 and 608).[20] The level of engagement with Gregory's writings, especially the Moralia, increased substantially during the subsequent two decades. As was indicated by the quotation with which this chapter began, Isidore's admiration for Gregory was made even more explicit in various biographical and encomiastic accounts of his life and achievements. Engagement with the Gregorian legacy extended beyond Isidore, however. We have evidence that Gregory's Dialogues were circulating elsewhere in southern Spain by the 630s because the Vita Sanctorum

Patrum Emeritensium, a text that was redacted in two stages in 633 or shortly thereafter and then sometime between 666 and 681, refers to the text as a model for its collection of hagiographies.[21] Collins has commented that despite the fact that the Vita Sanctorum Patrum Emeritensium makes only minimal direct use of its model, it 'would be fair enough to say that the spirit of Gregory informs the work as a whole, even if in a rather primitive way'.[22] All of this suggests that Gregory's name had become by the 630s a 'tag' that added value to a text, whether or not his work was used as a specific source of information.

Family Values: Leander, Isidore and Family

Despite the quite low number of communications with Spain during Gregory's papacy, such contacts do represent an increase on previous bishops of Rome and those exchanges that did happen took place at a high level and occurred at important historical moments, for the Spanish Church at least. Gregory's works were transmitted to Spain, alluded to and cited very rapidly. The earliest peak in Gregory's popularity occurred in Spain in the early and mid-seventh century and can be largely attributed to the influence of Isidore and his followers. The connection to Leander was important here because it put Gregory's works in the hands of Isidore, an unofficial literary executor who wielded considerable influence and who had an interest in promoting his own family.

Scholars have long debated the origins of the family of Leander and Isidore. The short biography of Leander in Isidore's De viris illustribus, written at some point between 604 and 608, is the best evidence, but its account is opaque at best. The De viris illustribus lists thirty-three famous Christians, mainly Spaniards, who lived in the fifth, sixth and seventh centuries. The text fits within the context of an emerging interest in biographical and hagiographical writing in Visigothic Spain in the early-seventh-century.[23] Leander refers in passing to his homeland in his De institutione virginum but does not provide any specific details. It is difficult even to ascertain the geographical origins of the family. Isidore's De viris illustribus states that their father, Severianus, lived in the province of Carthaginiensis and that the family was later forcibly moved to Baetica, although no clear indication is given of who was responsible for this move.[24] Roger Collins has suggested, based on onomastic evidence, that the family had African roots, although this must remain conjectural in the absence of confirmation from other sources.[25] It is clear that the family were influential because of the decision, either by the Visigothic kings or the Byzantine government, to move them away from the frontier province of Carthaginiensis. It is striking too that all three brothers became bishops, both mother and daughter took up the monastic life, and we know that both Leander and Isidore lived as monks before taking up episcopal office. Leander seems to have occupied himself primarily with administration, although at least two of his works have survived, and Isidore's literary output is nothing sort of monumental. The family thus seems to have been of considerable status, was able to establish its power base in the province of Baetica in southern Spain after being moved there sometime in the mid-sixth-century, perhaps investing heavily in ecclesiastical institutions and offices in order to hedge their bets against a changeable political climate.

More is known about the interactions between Leander, Isidore and their parents and siblings than about their family background. This is because both Leander and Isidore make both specific and passing references to members of their family in their writings. Most notable is Isidore's biography of Leander in the De viris illustribus. Isidore's De viris illustribus was largely designed to establish the status of Leander as a worthy historical figurehead for the Spanish Church to stand alongside figures such as Gregory and Augustine, a point underlined by the quotation from the Versus with which this chapter began. There are references to Leander's maltreatment by the Arian kings of the Visigoths, his role in the fight against heresy and the conversion of King Reccared to Nicene Christianity, and his work in organising the Church. For Isidore, therefore, Leander represented the ideal Spanish bishop, a bishop, furthermore, whose profile resembled very much his own.[26]

The De viris illustribus also presents Leander – and, as author of the text, Isidore – as protecting and promoting their family. Letters were exchanged between family members, they dedicated texts to one another, and there were cases where they looked after one another (or at least presented themselves as doing so). We shall see in what follows that this family did not just 'stick together'. The textual productions of Isidore and Leander strained to demonstrate this coherence rhetorically. In addition to referring briefly to their father, in the De viris illustribus Isidore states that Leander wrote letters to his brother, Fulgentius, and his sister, Florentina.[27] Although it is often described as a monastic rule for nuns, one of Leander's few surviving works, De institutione virginum, actually took the form of a letter to Florentina. In the text Leander makes reference to his brothers, to their mother and to his homeland in an effort to persuade Florentina, a virgin who had dedicated her life to God, to adopt the monastic life in the manner that he prescribed.

Isidore also dedicated texts to his siblings. The prefatory letters to De fide Catholica contra Iudaeos, written in 614/5, are to his sister Florentina and that of the De ecclesiasticis officiis, written sometime between 598 and 615, to his brother Fulgentius, Bishop of Écija.[28] In dedicating these works to his brother and sister respectively, Isidore modelled himself on Leander, demonstrated his commitment to his family and drew them into his own efforts to provide useful educational resources for Spanish churchmen. The De fide Catholica contra Iudaeos was intended for Florentina's edification and Drews has argued that Isidore's overall aim was to make her a co-heir in his programme of educating the clergy about the errors of Judaism.[29] It is interesting to note that the later end of the range of possible dates for the De ecclesiasticis officiis, a text that provides an overview of the various offices of the contemporary Church and which was in all probability used by the clergy of the Visigothic kingdom to ensure the pastoral care of the population, corresponds to the date of the De fide Catholica contra Iudaeos.[30] Just as he depicted Leander as a protector and organiser of the Catholic Church in Spain, Isidore seems to have deliberately associated Florentina and Fulgentius with his own efforts to train the clergy there.

Leander and Isidore derived considerable rhetorical capital from emphasising the connectedness of their family network. For example, in comparison to earlier texts in the De viris illustribus tradition Isidore laid particular stress on the writing of texts on virginity by famous men.[31] Of the five men Isidore outlined as having written on virginity, he stated that four of them dedicated the texts to their sister, compared to none of the illustrious men mentioned by Jerome or Gennadius, whose works he was continuing. This seems to have been part of a deliberate attempt to centre the De viris illustribus on Leander as the archetypal Spanish bishop.[32] Textual connectivity between brother and sister enabled Isidore to better pattern the text and the model of illustriousness that it was generating on Leander.

In focussing a key element of the De viris illustribus on his siblings, Isidore followed a path that had already been trodden by Leander who, in attempting to persuade Florentina to adopt a monastic lifestyle, had emphasised the cohesiveness of the family unit. In the De institutione virginum Leander stresses the dislocation of his mother (and himself) from their homeland in a passage redolent of Augustine's account of his mother's travails in Italy in the Confessions.[33] Connections to various fourth century ascetic writings have also been suggested, including those by Jerome and Basil the Great.[34] Whatever literary predecessors Leander referred to, the religious life of reading, study and prayer that he outlined for Florentina and her companions, was modelled on the Virgin Mary and their mother. According to Leander, travel was out of the question because Florentina was, like their mother, who had been forced to leave her home city, 'a sojourner' and should remain so for the rest of her life.[35] Metaphors of refuge and exile are used to describe the life that Florentina has embarked on. Their mother's physical exile thereby becomes a model for the spiritual exile of the daughter.[36] Leander depicted his mother in this way both to persuade Florentina, and presumably her fellow nuns, to adopt a life of withdrawal from the world and to provide them with a model for how to think about and cope with their separation. Family thus served a persuasive and an educative function.

In De institutione virginum Leander also notes that he is fearful for the well-being of Fulgentius, who he had sent homewards on some unspecified business, and also stresses the importance of caring for Isidore, the youngest member of the family.[37] In the De viris illustribus Isidore records that among Leander's letters was one to Fulgentius on the fear of death.[38] This letter does not survive and therefore we cannot be sure if it was consolatory and hence evidence of Leander taking direct responsibility for the psychological well-being of his brother. Leander may also have been providing his brother with resources for use in preaching and pastoral activities with his congregation, further confirmation that Isidore saw some value in emphasising the epistolary interconnections between Leander and the rest of his family. The records of the second and third councils of Seville, held in 619 and 624 and presided over by Isidore, both contain references to disputes that involved or originated in Écija, Fulgentius' bishopric.[39] Fulgentius attended the second council and, although the acts of the third council are not extant in their entirety, reference to a dispute in the bishopric demonstrates that he must have passed away by the time it was held. Family interest in the city perhaps resulted in it receiving significant attention from Isidore, the leading ecclesiastic in the province of Baetica, and his fellow bishops. For Leander and Isidore, therefore, there was considerable rhetorical value to be derived from presenting their family as a cohesive unit, the members of which stuck together.

Gregory and Leander

Another way for Isidore to bolster the status of his family, and of Leander in particular, was to emphasise their connections to other illustrious ecclesiastics. In the De viris illustribus Leander is said to have written numerous letters to his fellow bishops and the importance of the dedication of the De institutione virginum to Florentina in terms of the overall literary profile of the illustri has just been examined. Yet the association with Gregory was perhaps the most important strand of Isidore's efforts to focus the De viris illustribus on Leander. He stresses their direct contacts through the exchange of letters and also patterns the entries on Gregory and Leander on one another: they engage in similar kinds of activity such as authoring theological treatises, fighting heresy and organising the Church through letter writing.[40] As we saw at the start of this chapter, Isidore associates Leander and Gregory with one another by collocation in the Versus, a poem by Isidore that outlines the contents of the library in Seville, in which the verse on Leander is immediately after the one on Gregory.[41] Given these associations, it is hardly surprising that Fontaine has suggested Gregory and Leander were 'inseparable' in Isidore's imagination.[42]

All of this is not to deny that Leander and Gregory were connected in life as well as in Isidore's posthumous promotional activities and their relationship has been the subject of a recent monograph by Martyn.[43] It is well-known that Gregory and Leander met in Constantinople at some point between 579 and 582/5.[44] Gregory's Dialogues attribute the conversion of the Visigothic prince Hermenegild from Arianism to Catholicism to the efforts of Leander, stating that he heard about these events from travellers from Spain.[45] In one of Gregory's letters to Reccared, the king who converted the Visigoths to Catholicism later in the 580s, he granted a pallium, a sign that its holder possessed one of the principal seats of Christianity, to Leander. This was in recognition of Leander's role in the conversion of Reccared and was no doubt at least partially influenced by their friendship.[46] Gregory dedicated the Moralia in Job to Leander, and signals the influence of the Spanish bishop on the inception of the work in the letter to Leander which prefaced the book.[47]

A number of letters from Gregory to Leander have survived, although none of the replies remain, while Isidore's biography of Leander in the De viris illustribus suggests that their correspondence after meeting in Constantinople may have been even more extensive.[48] According to Collins, this important and ongoing 'channel of communication [...] meant that most of Gregory's works very quickly became available in the Visigothic kingdom and they came to exercise, with the sole exception of [...] Augustine, the greatest single influence upon the learning of the Spanish Church in the seventh century.'[49] It is to this influence that we now turn, beginning by examining the use Isidore made of Gregory.

Gregory and Isidore

In addition to his efforts to associate Leander with Gregory, Isidore made extensive use of Gregory's writings as a source. These included explicit references to Gregory's writings, what we might nowadays describe as unreferenced citations, and the biography in the De viris illustribus.[50] Indeed, the De viris illustribus may have been designed to celebrate the lives of Leander and Gregory together, both of whom had died shortly before the text was written.[51]

Gregory's illustriousness is signalled even by the seemingly insignificant conventions used to establish his dates: he took office under the Emperor Maurice (r. 582-602) and died in the reign of Phocas (r. 602-610). Only one other bishop, John of Constantinople, with whom Isidore may also have been striving to associate Gregory and Leander, receives this level of chronological detail.[52] Isidore heaps plentiful praise on Gregory:

> With the pricking [of conscience] of the full fear of God and with the highest humility, so endowed with wisdom through the grace of the Holy Spirit, that not only in the present is there no doctor equal to him but there never has been at any time. [...] It is said nevertheless that this same highly distinguished man [...]. Happy and rather too happy, he who through all his study is able to understand [Gregory's] words.

> praesentium temporum quisquam doctorum, sed nec in praeteritis quidem par fuerit unquam. [...] Fertur tamen idem excellentissimus uir [...]. Felix tamen et nimium felix, qui omnium studiorum eius potuit cognoscere dicta.

According to Isidore the key reason for Gregory's excellence was the quality of his writings, especially those to Leander. In the edition, only eight lines are devoted to writings not directed to Leander. This includes the Pastoral Rule, which was written at the start of the episcopate to Bishop John of Constantinople, the third member of the international episcopal triumvirate that Isidore centred on Leander:

> In which he teaches what sort of person comes to the duty of office, indeed how he should come to live, or [how] he should desire to teach his subjects [...] And he has written other moral books, and he has expounded through public sermons the whole text of the four gospels, a work unparalleled to us.

At fifteen lines, Gregory's writings to Leander thus take up almost twice as much space in the edition as those to other recipients. Isidore lists two letters to Leander, one of which was the preface to the Moralia in Job. The other warned against the practice of triple immersion at baptism, presumably the reply to the letter on baptism that Isidore mentions Leander sent to Gregory. Amongst other points, the letter stated:

> He said that it can be by no means blame-worthy to submerge infants in baptism, whether once or thrice, when through three immersions it can denote the persons of the Trinity, and through one the unity of the Divinity.
> Reprehensibile, inquit, esse nullatenus potest infantem in baptismate mergere, uel semel uel ter, quando in tribus mersionibus personarum Trinitatis, et in una potest Diuinitatis singularitas designari.[54]

[54] Isidore, De viris illustribus 27, Codoñer Merino, ed., El "De viris illustribus", p. 149.

Disputes over baptism were a common feature of theological controversy in late sixth century Spain, between Nicene bishops and between Nicene and Arian authorities. The emphasis on baptismal practices and the use of Trinitarian formulae in the De viris illustribus is hardly surprising given the pivotal role that Leander played in the conversion of the Visigoths from Arianism to Catholicism in the late 580s.[55]

Most importantly, the Moralia in Job was apparently written at the request of Leander and underlined Gregory's skills as an exegete:

> And the same man also, at the request of bishop Leander, interpreted the book of holy Job according to its mystic and moral meanings, and explained with a fount of bountiful eloquence the full history of its prophet in thirty-five volumes. Through these, how great the mysteries of the sacraments were indeed uncovered, and how great the moral precepts are for promoting love of eternal life or how great the decoration of words makes this clear, no one has the wisdom to explain, even if all his skill were to be turned solely to that of speech.
> Idem etiam, efflagitante Leandro episcopo, librum beati Iob mystico ac morali sensu disseruit, totamque eius prophetiae historiam in triginta quinque uoluminibus largo eloquentiae fonte explicuit. In quibus quidem quanta mysteria sacramentorum aperiantur, quantaque sint in amorem uitae aeternae morum praecepta uel quanta clareant ornamenta verborum, nemo sapiens explicare ualebit, etiam si omnes artus eius uertantur in linguam.

Again, Isidore emphasised two aspects of the work: first, that it was written at the request of Leander; second, its technical (i.e. exegetical), moral and literary excellence. As we shall see in the sections that follow, this was more than a lot of rhetorical hot air. Isidore and his fellow bishops made extensive and creative use of the Moralia in the following decades. Alongside works such as Augustine's City of God and Isidore's Etymologies and Sententiae, it quickly became one of the key resources for the churchmen of seventh-century Visigothic Spain.

Isidore's Use of Gregory

Isidore's highly positive appraisal of Gregory is reflected in the extensive use he made of Gregory in virtually every one of his writings.[56] Gregory is not always Isidore's main source, but he is usually prominent, from the Etymologies[57], a compendium of late antique scholarship and Isidore's magnum opus, via exegetical[58] and grammatical writings, to the De ecclesiasticis officiis, a guidebook to the various offices of the Church.[59] The most extensive borrowings took place from the Moralia in Job, a clear reflection of Isidore's highly positive opinion of the work. The Isidorian text with the highest level of reliance on Gregory was the Sententiae, three books of spiritual instruction probably written in 614/5.[60] Isidore's earliest biographer, Braulio of Zaragoza, picked up on the reliance of the work on Gregory's Moralia shortly after Isidore's death, he published: 'three books of Sentences, adorned with choice selections from the books of Pope Gregory's Morals' (Sententiarum libros tres, quos floribus ex libris papae Gregorii Moralibus decorauit).[61]

One of the main intellectual trends within Visigothic Spain was the compilation and summarising of the writings of Church Fathers such as Augustine and Gregory. Recent work has demonstrated the creative uses Isidore made of his sources. He is no longer seen as an unreflective 'cut-and-paster' who sought to 'save' the knowledge of the ancient world and make it useful for the medieval period. Isidore and other writers from seventh century Spain formed anthologies that synthesised the work of earlier Christian (and often non-Christian) writers. Their purpose was not solely to preserve received Christian knowledge, but to facilitate better understanding among the ecclesiastical elites and, through them, the general public.[62] Texts such as the Sententiae adapted carefully-selected parts of the writings of earlier authors to generate original works that met contemporary pastoral objectives.

See Fontaine, La culture classique for specific details of borrowings; Barney et al, Etymologies, p. 15: books 6 to 8 of the Etymologies constitute the ecclesiastical and theological part of the work for which the primary sources are Augustine and Jerome, who are used extensively, as well as Gregory the Great, Lactantius' Divine Institutions and Tertullian.

[58] Díaz, 'Visigothic Political Institutions', p. 342 suggested that Isidore's views on unction may have been influenced by Gregory. Ullman, The Carolingian Renaissance, pp. 74, 76, however, considers that Isidore would have had no knowledge of the Pope's point of view, and that when he wrote, unction did not exist as a practice.

[61] Braulio, Renotatio librorum Isidori, 10, Martín, ed., Scripta de vita Isidori Hispalensis episcopi, p. 202.

Isidore did not simply use Gregory's Moralia in Job, his main source when writing the Sententiae, as a mine of quotations, but carefilly selected material in order to mould one of the monuments of late antique exegesis to new purposes. The key problem confronting Isidore was not lack of material, but what to do with the vast amount of material, Gregorian and other, that he had at his disposal. The list of definite and possible uses of Gregory's works in the Sententiae runs to four and a half pages in the index fontium of the modern edition, with the Moralia in Job accounting for three and a half of those pages.[63]

Given what is known about Isidore's working methods, and the wealth of sources at his disposal, it was inevitable that a reference work such as the Sententiae would engage in a process of selection, editing and augmentation. His construction of the Sententiae aligns well with practices that have been observed in other Isidorian writings. In many instances he shortened sources by excerpting and summarising them.[64] This might have been at least partly due to the fact that he possessed incomplete versions of the source works or because he was reliant on collections of excerpts.[65] Isidore was interested in communicating as effectively as possible with his audience and, in his mind, the best way of doing this was to write with brevity rather than in an overly rhetorical style. Although the admonition to write simply and with clarity, even when producing quite complex works, was commonplace by the time of Isidore, I have argued elsewhere that Isidore deliberately wrote works that were characterised by their brevity in order to improve the readability, communicative potential and ultimately the didactic power of his work.[66] Sometimes these works were indeed quite brief but, on other occasions the claim to brevity meant that Isidore was dealing in a relatively concise way with long sources rather than that his works were objectively 'brief' themselves. So, although the Sententiae is actually quite a long work, in comparison to the wealth of Patristic and other sources on which it draws, it is characterised by brevity and hence, to Isidore's mind at least, clarity. Isidore also tended to reduce or remove Gregory's digressions in order to turn the interpretations in a more acceptable direction, for example, in his efforts to combat what he saw as eastern heresies.[67]

Despite the extensive use that Isidore made of Gregory's works in the Sententiae, there are no explicit references to Gregory by name in the text. This is in line with Isidore's citation practices in relation to Augustine, who is not mentioned by name either, despite the frequent use made of his works. Even biblical authors are only mentioned by name infrequently, usually when Isidore makes a direct citation.

[64] Numerous examples throughout the text; on this Isidorian practice generally see: Mullins, The Spiritual Life.

Isidore sometimes rearranged material taken from the Moralia in other ways, adding information taken from elsewhere in the text, condensing and merging two chapters into one, splitting apart chapters that had been together previously.[68] Another practice was to collate Gregory's words with those of other, usually Patristic, authors.[69] Augustine was the main choice here, although on occasion the Moralia was spliced with other works by Gregory, such as the Regula Pastoralis.[70]

All of this is not to deny the extent of Isidore's own contribution, which was significant and went beyond editing his sources, processes which are indicative of his deep engagement with the source texts. On the most basic level, and still pointing towards his compilatory attitude, there are multiple examples of intertexts between the Sententiae and other Isidorian writings. Sometimes earlier writings by Isidore, such as the Differentiae, served as sources for the Sententiae, while on other occasions material from the Sententiae could be found in later works, such as the Etymologiae.[71] Finally, as was noted above, in other places Isidore introduced his own reflections, often at the close of the chapter, in order to alter the meaning or emphasis of the Gregorian source.[72] This brief overview of the use Isidore made of Gregory's works, primarily the Moralia in Job in the Sententiae, has demonstrated Isidore's role as an active and thoughtful editor of his source.

[69] E.g. Isidore, Sententiae 1.8 (De mundo), Cazier, ed., Isidorus Hispalensis Sententiae, pp. 21-25 is composed primarily from a range of Augustine's works (Confessiones, De Civitate Dei, De Genesi ad litteram l. xii and De Genesi contra Manichaeos), but includes extracts from the book 6 of the Moralia at the beginning and near the end.

[70] E.g. Isidore, Sententiae 3.34 (De indignis prapositis), Cazier, ed., Isidorus Hispalensis Sententiae, pp. 273-5 is composed of a combination of extracts taken from books 7, 24, 25 and 32 of the Moralia in Job and the Regula Pastoralis 1.1.

His aim was to compose a new text that was useful for his audience in the present. This inevitably involved addressing specific points which had not necessarily been of concern or interest to Gregory and turning the contents of his predecessor's work in new directions.[73]

Another reason for Isidore's intense engagement with Gregory's works is that their approaches to scriptural reading and exegesis were similar in intention and in practice. In the preface to the Moralia in Job, written in the form of a letter to Leander, Gregory explained that it was the job of those who had a higher level of training and skill in scriptural interpretation to provide access to the secrets of the Bible to those who were less educated.[74] In the De institutione virginum Leander suggests that the untrained avoid reading biblical books such as the Song of Songs.[75] Leander's advice that certain scriptural passages should be interpreted spiritually rather than historically was not intended to limit access to scripture, but rather to ensure that knowledge was channelled through appropriate intermediaries or was opened up after appropriate training had taken place. Isidore's ideas about the practice, purpose and pedagogy of reading drew extensively on Gregory and others and in later centuries their works were excerpted and spliced together by later commentators such as Smaragdus of St Mihiel.[76] The views of Gregory, Leander and Isidore were therefore highly congruent with one another on the purpose of scriptural exegesis.

After Isidore: Visions of Gregory the Great in Seventh-Century Spain

Isidore's highly positive appraisal of Gregory was shared by his successors as leaders of the Spanish Church. The depth of this continuing engagement with the Gregorian legacy is demonstrated by further positive judgements on his status, by attempts to procure additional copies of his writings, and by ongoing and active engagement with his work. Braulio of Zaragoza (d. 650), Eugenius II of Toledo (d. 657), Ildefonsus of Toledo (d. 667), Julian of Toledo (d. 690) and Valerius of El Bierzo (d. c. 695), all made extensive use of

Gregory in their writings on a range of topics. As with Isidore, scholars have identified processes of attributed and unattributed citation, epitomisation and adaptation across a swathe of writings.[77]

The most striking case of engagement with Gregory after Isidore is that of Taio of Zaragoza (d. post-656) who, before he became bishop, journeyed to Rome in the early 640s, possibly on the instruction of King Chindaswinth, to find, copy and bring back works by Gregory which were not at that time available in Spain.[78] It is difficult to identify with any precision the specific works that Taio brought back from Rome, although it seems certain that he extended what was available in Spanish libraries.[79] The output of all this work, in addition to the copies of Gregory's writings that Taio brought back from Rome, was a text which later came to be known as the Sententiarum Libri V, a series of extracts abridged from different parts of Gregory's corpus and combined with other writers such as Augustine.[80] Taio describes, in a letter to Bishop Quiricius of Barcelona, how he spent his nights working on the project while Zaragoza was besieged by the usurper Froia in 653-4.[81] Although the work has been described as 'poorly organized'[82], such value-judgements are increasingly being overturned in favour of interpretations which see successors of Isidore such as Taio as excerpting and compiling Gregory's works in a systematic fashion for highly practical purposes.[83]

Sometimes Gregory's works were copied almost verbatim, but even copying and pasting can, in some cases, be highly creative exercises, especially when done with specific aims in mind.[84] A letter from Braulio of Zaragoza to Taio in 649/50 reveals that the aim of Taio's visit to Rome was to obtain copies of the 'books of the holy Pope Gregory' (codices sancti pape Gregorii) which had not previously existed in Spain.[85] Barlow suggested that Taio was trying to locate copies of Gregory's later works because, as we have already seen, some of them were circulating in Spain even before the end of the sixth century.[86] Braulio's letter, in which he requests a copy of the books of Gregory and promises to return them whenever Taio asks, reveals that there was a demand for such works among the Visigothic ecclesiastical elite. Braulio quoted directly from the beginning of Gregory's Moralia at the start of the letter, suggesting that the text was well-known enough to function as a common reference point for two educated churchmen.[87] Braulio noted that Taio, and presumably other members of his circle, studied the writings of the Church Fathers to such an extent that their words (eloquia) remained 'nested in your heart' (in pectore tuo [...] nidauerint).[88] Taio engaged with the memory of Gregory and journeyed to Rome for practical purposes: to make available edificatory works for his fellow bishops and to enable them to use the insights from Gregory's writings to instruct others.

At about the same time as Taio travelled to Rome and then worked up his summary of Gregory's writings, there was an increase in interest in Gregory in the city of Toledo, the centre of Visigothic royal government and in the process of establishing itself as the ecclesiastical head of the kingdom. In the second canon of the eighth council of Toledo in 653 Gregory was honoured as follows:

> And also holy Pope Gregory, to be honoured for both his books and his merits, and also due to his merit to be preferred in ethical matters to almost anyone else, explains thus in his books on moral matters [in his Moralia] [...]

> Beatus etiam papa Gregorius et libris et meritis honorandus, atque in ethicis adsertionibus pene cunctis merito praeferendus, sic in libris infert moralibus [...]

The same canon also honoured Isidore as:

> The distinguished doctor of our century, the newest ornament of the Catholic church, though the last when compared with the previous in terms of time, but not least in terms of doctrine, and furthermore, the most learned in the end times, and to be named with reverence, Isidore, in the second book of his Sententiae relates to the same purpose: [...]
> Nostri quoque seculi doctor egregius, ecclesiae catholicae novissimum decus, praecedentibus aetate prostremus, doctrinae conparatione non infimus, et quod maius est in seculorum fine doctissimus, atque cum reverentia nominandus Ysidorus in libro Sententiarum secundo haec pro tali narrat negotio [...].[89]

This is followed by a quotation from the Sententiae and one claiming to be from Isidore's Synonyma. It is also possible that the description of Isidore as doctor egregius may be a deliberate lexical pun on (or at least a reference back to) Gregory/ Gregorius. Earlier in the second canon of the eighth council of Toledo, direct quotations were taken from and references had been made to Ambrose and Augustine, before the sections on Gregory and Isidore. All of this suggests that by the mid-seventh century, deliberate efforts were being made to associate Isidore with earlier Latin Church Fathers. Isidore was being positioned as the father of the Spanish Church, and the association with Gregory played a pivotal role in generating a direct line of descent from Ambrose and Augustine.

A few years later Ildefonsus of Toledo (659-667) extended Isidore's De viris illustribus. In the process he wrote a new biography of Gregory, adding the Dialogues, Commentary on the Song of Songs and the 22 Homilies in Ezechiel to the list of writings.[90] Martin has argued that, in contrast to Isidore's largely intellectual biographical catalogue, Ildefonsus was inspired by Gregory's Dialogues to stress the miracles that had been performed by his illustrious men.[91] It may also be the case that Ildefonsus's extension of Isidore's biography of Gregory was part of a broader effort by the bishops of Toledo to demonstrate the excellence of their bishopric in opposition to Seville and other powerful ecclesiastical centres in Spain, as Michael J. Kelly explores later in this volume.[92] On this reading, control over the dissemination of Gregory's writings and the definition of his memory was one way to demonstrate Toledan superiority within Spain.

Gregory's works thus had an impact on the pastoral aims of the bishops of the Visigothic kingdom and on how the basic tenets of Christianity might best be communicated to the clergy and, through them, the people.[93] This began during Gregory's lifetime as Spanish bishops responded to texts and letters that Gregory had sent there advising them on how to care for those in their charge. Licinianus of Cartagena, for example, wrote to Gregory in the 590s to say that if he obeyed Gregory's advice in the Regula Pastoralis to refrain from ordaining the ignorant, then he would not be able to ordain anyone at all in his area.[94] Although they form a relatively small proportion of the contents of Visigothic-era homiliaries from Spain, Gregory's sermons were also used by the preachers of the period, further demonstrating his direct influence on the pastoral efforts of the bishops and clergy there.[95]

Conclusion

This chapter has explored the reception of the writings of Gregory I in Spain during the Visigothic period, especially in the writings of Isidore of Seville in the early seventh century. Isidore received the works of Gregory so enthusiastically because of the very close association between Gregory and Leander, Isidore's brother. Contemporary sources suggest that Leander and Isidore were particularly interested in emphasising the status of the members of their family, the coherence of the family unit and in particular its role in the development of the Church in Spain during the late sixth and early seventh centuries. The connection to Gregory, Bishop of Rome at the time of the conversion of the Visigoths from Arianism to Catholicism and a correspondent of Leander, was cultivated in order to bolster the historical status of Leander and because his writings had proved practically useful in Isidore's campaign to educate the clergy of the Visigothic kingdom. Due to the close association with Leander, the early circulation of his writings in Spain, and their usefulness to Isidore, Gregory virtually became a member of the family of Leander-Isidore.

The Isidorian stamp of approval was particularly important for the posthumous reputation of Gregory in Spain. Gregory and his writings retained their prestige in Spain after the fall of the Visigothic kingdom in the early eighth century. Works such as the Moralia were copied and circulated in the centuries that followed[96] and by the mid-eighth century the story of Taio's journey to Rome had taken on a distinctly legendary tone.[97] In later centuries, however, Gregory's works became popular not only because they were useful in the present and because of the association with Leander (and Isidore), but also because they created a connection to the Catholic-Visigothic past. Not only was Gregory the pope at the time of the conversion of the Visigoths to Catholicism, a conjunction that probably seemed more significant with hindsight than it did at the time, but he wrote a biography of the Visigothic prince Hermenegild which became highly popular in late medieval and early modern Spain.[98] Gregory presented Hermenegild as a martyr rather than the traitor of the accounts of John of Biclarum and Isidore and it was this version that served as a model of Catholic leadership for the Hapsburg monarchs.[99] Gregory's writings, bolstered by their close association with Leander and Isidore, the fathers of the Spanish Church, thus retained their utility for the educated elite of early modern Spain as they had for the ecclesiastical elite of the early medieval period.

Isidore and Pliny on Human and Human-Instigated Anomaly

Mary Beagon

It is impossible to say for certain whether Isidore actually read Pliny's Natural History at first hand. As anyone who has ever considered the question of Isidore's (or indeed Pliny's) sources knows only too well, it can be almost impossible to tell what the authors of encyclopaedic and compilatory works such as the Natural History or the Etymologies, reliant as they were on multiple secondary sources, used directly and which at one or more removes. Material deriving ultimately from Pliny permeates the entire Etymologies; whether it was sourced at first hand or derived from an intermediary is impossible to say for certain.[1] All we can be sure of is a pervasive Plinian flavour or echo to much of Isidore's material. Threads of thought, recognizable from a reading of Pliny, recur in the books of the Etymologies. This chapter will examine one such thread, human anomaly. The aim is not primarily to locate inspiration from Pliny in Isidore but to consider how each treated an idea of central importance to their respective worldviews.

The animal kingdom for Pliny occupies five out of 37 books of his Historia Naturalis (HN), while for Isidore two of the twenty books of the Etymologies (Etym.) cover similar ground. In both writers, the human animal has a special relationship with the creative divinity, in Pliny's case Stoic nature and in Isidore's the Christian creator God. For Pliny, indeed, the rest of creation is geared for the most part towards man's needs (HN 7.3). For Isidore, who implicitly recalls the Stoic pantheistic view of nature at the beginning of Etym. 11,[2] the human body uniquely is raised upright for contemplation of the Creator (11.1.5); another classical topos, specifically referenced in this case to lines quoted from the beginning of Ovid's Metamorphoses (Met. 1.84); while his mind (mens), the superior part of the soul (11.1.11), is the cause of his being said to be the image of God (imago dei).

[1] Oroz Reta, 'Présence de Pline', pp. 295-306 notes numerous echoes, in *Etym.*16's treatment of mineralogy, of the actual wording deployed by Pliny in his treatment of the same topic in HN 36-7. This certainly suggests Isidore had access to works containing excerpts from the HN, if not to the work itself.

[2] 'Hanc (i.e. naturam) quidam Deum esse dixerunt, a quo omnia creata sunt et existunt': 'Some people say that this (i.e. nature) is God, by whom all things are created and exist'. Trans. Barney et al., Etymologies, p. 231. (This translation of the Etymologies is used throughout this paper. Pliny HN 7 translations are from my own 2005 translation and commentary. Other translations are my own except where otherwise indicated). Later he acknowledges this more explicitly as a

For the Christian writer, then, the human animal is of dual aspect: a body formed from the soil but raised upright from the soil to face upward, and a soul.[3] Isidore then proceeds to categorize the constituent parts of this double nature: nearly three quarters of book 11 is devoted to an etymological creation-by-verbal-dissection of a generic imago hominis. In his study of the Etymologies, John Henderson contrasted Isidore's man, 'one and alone' to the 'rhetoric of plenitude' which overflows in book 12 with its emphasis on the numbers, variety and diversity of the rest of the animal kingdom.[4] The effect is perhaps exaggerated by Isidore's cramming the whole of the rest of the animal kingdom into one book, whereas Pliny uses four, rather longer, ones to complete his survey. The fact remains, however, that Isidore's catalogue of parts (11.1-2) produces a single, photofit, image. Pliny, to be sure, gives a generic treatment of human physiology in relation to that of animals in the later sections of HN 10 and 11, following in the tradition of the Aristotelian comparative biology of On the Parts of Animals and On the Generation of Animals. However, his dedicated treatment of humanity in HN 7 is a riot of diversity, variation and exception. Sometimes characterised as a book of records, the average or mean is not what HN 7 is about. Discussions of human lifespan, reproduction, stature and death are predominantly discussions of the exceptional rather than the norm.

Deviant Nature? Variety and Monstrosity

If we look at the treatment of the human face by each author, it is true that Isidore mentions its function in distinguishing each individual human (*Etym.*11.1.35), but only after noting its generic function in characterizing the human animal as human. Pliny, however, revels in the innumerable possibilities which nature, more skilled than any human artifex, can produce from just a handful of generic physical features (HN 7.7).

view held by some pagans: 'unde et ipsi gentiles Deum modo naturam, modo Deum appellant': 'Even the Pagans address God sometimes as Nature, sometimes as God' (Etym. 11.3.1. Trans. Barney et al., Etymologies, p. 243).

[3] 'Duplex est autem homo: interior et exterior. Interior homo anima et exterior corpus' (11.1.6).

[4] Henderson, Medieval World of Isidore, p. 149.

Should we read any significance into this difference of emphasis, other than the fact that naming of generic parts is intrinsic to Isidore's project, just as emphasizing the infinite varietas of nature is intrinsic to Pliny's? At this point, we should consider the last quarter of Etym. 11, where Isidore, in a sense paradoxically, attempts to define and categorize beings which defy categorization according to the orderly arrangement of parts as previously defined. For Isidore, the impression is that these 'portents' are a source of anxiety: at first sight, they appear to be contra naturam. Indeed, he quotes Varro's definition of such beings as 'seeming to have been born contrary to nature', but he explains that in fact they are part of the divine plan, inscrutable as that may be to mere humans; they are not contrary to nature, only contrary to what is known nature. His explanation is heavily dependent, indeed almost word for word, on Augustine ('portentum ergo fit non contra naturam, sed contra quam est nota natura', Civ. Dei 21.8). His particular categorization carefully distinguishes the seriously anomalous portenta, ostenta, prodigia, which are divine indicators and die soon after birth, from the less serious variations, for example, people with extra digits who are portentosa or portent-like, but within the parameters of the acceptably natural.

As far as these individual anomalies are concerned, Pliny is not interested in deconstructing and de-mythifying them. There is some categorization in their general arrangement; for example, we have multiple births, hermaphrodites and sex-changers (HN 7.33-6), but application of the term prodigium and its associates is neither frequent nor of any particular significance. In this, Pliny's attitude is very different to that of Isidore or Augustine. Indeed, his comment that hermaphrodites were once regarded as portents but now as pets (deliciae, HN 7.33) may indicate underlying changes in social attitudes in the first century AD, when negative religious interpretations of physical anomaly are in decline, at any rate among the trend-setting wealthy of Rome;[5] though there was no simple temporal or social shift either now or many centuries later and attitudes even in the early modern era remained complex.[6]

After dealing with individual monstrosities, however, Isidore continues to a more difficult and controversial set of anomalies: the reputed existence of entire monstrous races of peoples[7] for which the locus classicus is of course Pliny HN 7.9-32, but which, for Isidore, could equally well have come via an intermediary; and once again Augustine's exhaustive examination in Civ. Dei, this time 16.8, is an obvious one. Augustine had adopted Pliny's general stance on such oddities: 'The observer who cannot see the whole (of God's plan) is offended by what seems to be the deformity of a part' (Civ. Dei 16.8).[8] We may compare this with Pliny HN 7.6: 'Indeed the power and might of nature lacks credibility at every point unless we comprehend her as a whole rather than piecemeal'.[9]

[6] Park and Daston, 'Unnatural Conceptions', pp. 20-54.

Pliny's brisk survey of these monstrous races combined enthusiasm with a certain detachment betrayed by his use of third person authority (a feature of wonder literature)[10] and indirect speech. No one had after all actually seen any of these people: if they did exist they added to the cheerful exuberance of the nature deity, created as 'playthings (ludibria) for herself and wonders for us' (HN 7.32). If they did not exist, his overall depiction of varietas naturae was not seriously dented. For the Christian writer, however, the possible existence of such anomalies may have posed theological problems. Hence, I think, it is not sufficient to interpret Isidore's similar use of third person authority and indirect speech merely as a sign of scepticism; it seems also to betray a feeling of anxiety. Were such beings human, and therefore part of the divine salvation plan? This anxiety is clearly enunciated in Augustine: the individual anomalies, undeniably born to human parents in our society, are not a problem; they are clearly descendants of Adam. So, too, therefore, are the monstrous races, provided that their categorization as human is correct (Civ. Dei 16.8). We should of course remind ourselves at this point that it is soul not body which makes man imago dei, according to Isidore (Etym. 11.1.11). But identifying what is ensouled without a recognizable set of physical features as described in the earlier part of Etym. 11 is the crux. Such races are so very different that deception is a danger, as Augustine recognizes: 'If we did not know that monkeys, long-tailed apes and chimpanzees are not men but animals, those natural historians who plume themselves on their collection of curiosities might pass them off on us as races of men, and get away with such nonsense' (Civ. Dei 16.8).[11]

[7] A third group, of one-off mythical monsters (Etym. 11.3.28-39), is dismissed from consideration as being symbolic representations of the truths at the heart of old stories, e.g. harlots who lured people to destitution or 'shipwreck' become the Sirens (12.3.30).

Let us return to Isidore's definition of the human facies. As we saw, he mentions its function as a repository for the uniqueness of each individual but without embroidering on this in the manner of the Plinian celebration of varietas. However, he also describes it as the part of the body which above all reflects the characteristic form of a human being ('Facies dicta ab effigie. Ibi est enim tota figura hominis (et uniuscuiusque persona) cognita' (Etym. 11.1.33-4). It is therefore perhaps significant that, while by no means all the monstrous races' deformities are primarily facial, many are and he specifically mentions the stories of 'the monstrous faces of the nations in the far east' (Etym. 11.3.18: 'In ultimo autem orientis monstruosae gentium facies scribuntur'). More generally, the human head is the body's primary organ, where all senses and nerves originate, the source of all activity: to the extent that it 'plays the role of the soul, so to speak': 'animae ... quodammodo personam gerit' (11.3.25-6). For this primary indicator of soul to be seriously malformed, even missing as in the case of those such as the Blemmyae, with mouth and eyes in their chest (11.3.17) is clearly problematic for the correct categorization of the human. Another case in point is that of the dog-heads or Cynokephali. These, however, give themselves away as being non-human in Isidore's categorization by their barking (Etym. 11.3.15).[12] They cannot talk and words, according to Isidore's definition, are signs of the mental processes by which people show their thoughts to one another in speaking (Etym. 1. 9.1). Therefore they cannot possess human mind and mind, as we saw, is the most elevated aspect of the human soul and links man to God. The problematic nature of this religious conundrum is reflected in Augustine's extremely tentative conclusion to his discussion: 'I must therefore finish the discussion of this question with my tentative and cautious answer. The accounts of some of these races may be completely worthless; but if such peoples exist, then either they are not human; or, if human, they are descended from Adam.' (Civ. Dei 16.8).[13]

For the complex tradition of thought instigated by the 'taxonomic ambiguity' of the Cynokephali, see Romm, The Edges of the Earth, p. 79; Beagon, Pliny on the Human Animal, pp. 152-154. For the importance of speech as a marker of humanity, see Friedman, Monstrous Races, p. 29, who points to four other monstrous races who, implicitly or explicitly, lack speech. However, of these, only one, the Trogodytae, makes non-human sounds, rather than being unable to make any kind of noise due to their facial configurations. The source for the squeaking of the Trogodytae is Herodotus 4.153, rather than Pliny, who mentions them but without comment on their non-human speech (HN 5.44-5; 7.23: see Beagon, Pliny on the Human Animal, p. 154). This may explain why they are not mentioned by Augustine or Isidore.

Theological difficulties may have been enhanced by some of the contexts in which monsters had appeared in earlier pagan accounts. Strange-looking creatures had been central to some classical creation theories, such as those of Empedocles and Lucretius, which avoided purposive design. Their hallmark was randomness. Empedocles' scheme had included the random production of body parts, which then joined, equally randomly, to produce creatures, some viable but many, like his man-faced oxen,[14] not. Lucretius deliberately set out to avoid the idea of a teleological creator God. Random combinations of atoms in the earth produced a variety of creatures, only some of which were viable and found compatible breeding partners to produce a species. Even these, however, were subject to early extinction by the law of survival of the fittest (Lucr. RN 5.837-854).[15] A possible link with non-purposive creativity might, then, have further lessened Isidore's enthusiasm for the idea of monstrous races.[16] The distancing techniques used by many classical authors take on new significance in his catalogue. On the other hand, such theories tended to emphasize the non-viability of oddities and thence the unlikelihood of races of such creatures being perpetuated. It was, on the contrary, Pliny's teleological Stoic Natura which had enshrined them in an enduring tradition. We shall return to this later.

Deviant Minds? Maternal Impressions

Our second example of human variation relies in a sense on human rather than divine creativity. Both Pliny and Isidore discuss a belief with a very long history; the ability of visual and mental stimuli experienced by the mother to modify the physical appearance of her unborn offspring.[17] The basic idea can be found as early as Empedocles, whom Aetius (5.12.2 = Dox. Graec. p. 423) cites to explain why some children do not resemble their fathers: ‘Empedocles says that foetuses are shaped by what the woman visualized around the time of conception. For often women have fallen in love with statues and paintings and have produced offspring which resemble them’.[18] Many writers from Dionysius of Halicarnassus (De Imit. 6.1) to Augustine (Contra Iulian. 5.14.51) repeat the story of the ugly king who fathered handsome children by making his wife look at beautiful statues during intercourse. Medical acceptance is seen in similar references in Galen (14.253-4 Kűhn), Soranus (Gyn. 1.39) and later medical authorities. A rationale might be found in Aristotelian physiology, according to which the female genetic material is essentially passive and impressionable. In the cases described above, the normal process by which the active male principle dominates and imprints its form on female matter is hijacked by an outside force such as the sight of a beautiful statue.[19]

Maire, 'L'imprégnation par la regard', pp. 279-94 places the idea in the context of ancient philosophical and medical theories of vision.

Pliny’s version in HN 7.52 introduces an element almost unique in the ancient testimony in allowing the father, as well as the mother, to be susceptible to such outside influences, effectively doubling the potential for variations and divergences from the expected patterns of heredity to emerge in the newborn infant.[20]

> Resemblances offer considerable food for thought. They are believed to be influenced by many chance occurrences, including sight, hearing, memory and images absorbed at the very moment of conception. Even a chance thought which briefly crosses the mind of one or other parent may form or confuse the resemblance. This is the reason why there are more variations within the human race than there are among all the other animals. The swiftness of men’s thoughts, his mental agility and the versatility of his intelligence produce a wide variety of features; whereas the minds of the other animals are sluggish and exhibit a uniformity in keeping with their particular species.

Cogitatio etiam utriuslibet animum subito transvolans effingere similitudinem aut miscere existimatur, ideoque plures in homine quam in ceteris omnibus animalibus differentiae quoniam velocitas cogitationum animique celeritas et ingeni varietas multiformes notas inprimunt, cum ceteris animantibus immobiles sint animi et similes omnibus singulisque in suo cuique genere.*[21]

The key to superior variety is superior brain power. The quality of mens or ratio, deliberative thinking, was uniquely human in Pliny's view, not only in moral terms, as in the Stoic equation of moral excellence, virtus, with ratio, but also in terms of pure intelligence or brain power: note the emphasis on 'swiftness [...], agility [...] versatility' and compare what he has to say of Caesar's 'innate mental agility, with the penetrating speed and rapidity of fire' (7.91: 'proprium vigorem celeritatemque quodam igne volucrem'). This mental superiority was the key to man's pre-eminence in the world of nature.[22] It offered a link with the macrocosmic ratio of nature herself, and by maximizing his potential for versatility and variety not just in creative but even as here in procreative activities, allowed him to mirror in microcosmic form the varietas of nature, the artifex of creation. The only other source to suggest that the thoughts of both mother and father are involved is the pseudo-Aristotelian Problemata (10.10) where, too, a contrast is made with the other animals who for the most part focus on the act itself. Here, however, the Plinian emphasis on the gulf in mental processes between man and animal which causes it is absent.

Pliny, then, celebrates man's super-charged brain power and the wondrous effects it can have, even on the (self) creation of man himself. But if the animals are too dull to produce mental fantasies of such strength that they affect their unborn young, some sources do credit them with reaction to direct visual stimuli: Oppian describes how horse-breeders parade finely adorned stallions before their brood mares and pigeon-fanciers hang purple-dyed cloths near the female birds (Cyn. 1.328-48). It is animal-breeding which is the cue for Isidore's discussion in book 12, the section of the Etymologies devoted to animals. The main source is Christian rather than classical: Jerome's commentary on the story in Genesis of Jacob's ploy to breed variegated sheep and the tone, unlike Pliny's, is largely negative

(Quaest. Heb. Ad Gen. 30.32-3). However, the fact that his focus is on animals is not in itself a contradiction of Pliny's emphasis on the phenomenon as pertaining largely to the superior human mind. Not only are the sheep's reactions purely sensory but they are in any case 'set up' by the superior ingenuity of the human breeder. This is already clear in the Oppian passage, where the cleverness of the horse and dove breeders is stressed in tones of admiration rather than condemnation: 'O what a heart, what a mind have mortal men! They do what they like' (Cyn. 1. 330-1).[23] Isidore's main source, Jerome, had stressed the natural cunning of Jacob: 'So Jacob devised a new artifice and fought against the nature of the black and white flock with an artfulness produced by nature herself'.[24] The tone is ambiguous: Jacob's wits may be a product of nature, but they are being deployed in the undermining of a natural process: 'contra naturam [...] pecoris [...] pugnavit'. The attitude is reminiscent of Pliny's condemnation of ambitious and arrogant modifications of nature, a misuse of humanity's superior ratio, a topic to which we shall return shortly. Isidore lays an even more negative emphasis on the unnaturalness of the ploy, which is introduced with comments on a more straightforward breeding trick: crossing species to produce hybrids, in this case mules. Ana, Esau's great-grandson, was said to have done this contra naturam (Etym. 12.1.57). 'Indeed', Isidore continues, 'human intervention has forced animals of different species to breed with one another and has thus developed another type of animal by means of an unnatural combination. Thus too Jacob obtained similarities of colours contrary to nature, for his sheep conceived offspring similar to the image of the ram mounting them from above that they saw as a reflexion in the water'.[25] He doesn't actually give the explanation of what Jacob had done to alter the reflexions, but clearly intends to apply the same elements of 'human intervention', coercion and unnaturalness, to Jacob's breeding system.[26]

For Isidore, to act contra naturam is to contravene the natural order as laid down in the divine plan of creation: a presumptuous and sinful challenge from the human mind to the superior mind of God. It is interesting that no such disapproval of hybridization appears in Pliny's Natural History since he can be as condemnatory of human challenges to nature as his Christian counterpart. The key is motivation and purpose: Pliny's reservations about human modifications to nature centre on moral considerations of arrogance, greed and decadent living.[27] Thus the only exception to his positive attitude towards hybridization is in his discussion of trees in HN 12.11-12 where he criticizes the breeding of a type of plane-tree which doesn't shed its leaves in winter and the practice of creating dwarf varieties for fancy hedging. In both cases, the criticism derives from the fact that both types are purely decorative and serve no useful purpose: a plane tree's natural function, he says, is to give shade in summer but to allow light through in winter. In contrast, there is much on grafting and hybridization of fruit, which is regarded as a useful practice, giving nature a legitimate helping hand in the pursuit of salus humana. Similarly, the hybridization of domesticated animals, such as mules, is described enthusiastically in HN 8.171-5, and the high quality of Spanish donkeys for mule-breeding is praised (HN 8.170). Interestingly, Isidore makes no reference to Spanish horse and mule breeding, though it is possible that the detailed catalogue of horse types and colours (Etym. 12.1.41-56) reflects this local interest. Jerome, indeed, says that the Spaniards practise Jacob's trick on their horses.[28] This sentence immediately follows one that Isidore quotes verbatim and which we will discuss shortly.

[26] He goes on to mention the examples of mares and doves, though here the doves are beguiled by pictures of handsome doves, cf. Corp. Hipp. Gr. 2.11.7.2-8: horses can be shown paintings like the doves here, as well as actual stallions.

Finally, it should be noted that Pliny does not mention any instances of maternal impressions in animals, even when devised by humans. Presumably these might detract, however slightly, from the emphasis he wishes to place on the supremacy of the human mind. Isidore, on the other hand, uses the practice to criticize human presumptuousness even where the outcome is useful, rather than the destructive luxuries to which Pliny confines his moral reservations on human ingenuity.

So much for the first half of Isidore's passage on maternal impressions. In Etym. 12.1.60, he turns to humans and thence to the rationale behind the phenomenon:

> Whence also people advise pregnant women not to gaze at repulsive animal faces, such as cynocephali[29] or apes, lest they should bear offspring resembling what they have seen. A noticeable variation on the theme as seen so far is the idea that impressions can affect the woman even after the act of conception. Striking too is the idea that the sight of a creature of another species might affect the foetus, though this was a possibility mooted already in Soranus, who warns against viewing monkeys during conception (Gyn. 1.39). Michael Reeve, in his ground-breaking article on the history of this idea, speculated that both notions, which were to have such a pronounced effect on the development of the tradition in later centuries, may owe their dissemination largely to the popularity of Isidore.[31] However, the idea that a woman may be affected during pregnancy is not in fact completely new: it is already there in Oppian, who says that the Spartans show their wives images of handsome young men 'when their bellies are swelling' (ὅτε γαστέρα κυμαίνουσι, Cyn. 1.359). The implications of this, slightly later, section of Oppian's discussion seems to have escaped the notice of commentators. It is also there to an extent in a bizarre passage in Augustine's City of God (Civ.Dei 18.5), in which he suggests that demons display to the cow pregnant with the next Apis a phantom bull which only she can see, thus ensuring that the calf will be a lookalike of its predecessor. Note too the implication in Aristotle that the woman's mind should be kept as undisturbed as possible since children are affected by the mother before birth as plants are by the earth (Pol. 1335b).

Isidore's explanation, however, focuses on the mechanics of impressions at the time of conception, taking as its lead a comment he has lifted word for word from Jerome on Jacob's sheep: 'The nature of females is such that, whatever sort of thing they look at or imagine in the extreme heat of pleasure while they are conceiving, is the sort of progeny they will have'.[32] The manuscripts bar one all follow this with: 'etenim animal in usu Venerio formas extrinsecus intus transmittit, eorumque satiata typis rapit species eorum in propriam qualitatem' ('Thus in the act of procreation, the animal transmits external forms to the interior and since she is filled with the images of those things, she combines their appearance with her own particular quality').[33] We should understand here animal in the sense of living creature, whether human or otherwise. André, however, in his 1986 edition of book 12,[34] chose the reading anima, attested in just one manuscript, but bringing the explanation much closer in wording to other, more precise, descriptions of the process. He justified his choice by reference to Pliny's use of animum in 'cogitatio etiam utriuslibet animum subito transvolans effingere similitudinem aut miscere existimatur' ('Even a chance thought which briefly crosses the mind of one or other parent may form or confuse the resemblance', HN 7.52). Augustine Contra Iulianum 5.14.51 (PL 44, 812) is, however, even closer, using the exact term anima and applying it to animals not just of the human variety: 'nam colores virgarum quas variavit Iacob, afficiendo transierunt in animas pecorum matrum atque inde rursus eadem affectione transeundo apparuerunt in corporibus filiorum'. ('The various colours of Jacob's rods affected the breeding ewes and passed to their souls; then, passing from the souls of the ewes by the same kind of influence, these colours appeared in the bodies of their lambs'). Isidore, as befitted a categorizer of words, recognised a nuanced difference between animus and anima. Although they can both essentially signify 'soul', anima is indicative of vita, life, while animus is indicative of consilium, deliberation (Etym. 11.1,11), and he goes on to associate the latter with mens, mind: mens 'knows', sciat, while animus 'wills' velit. Anima can be the generic word for soul, but more specifically it refers to the basic life force, as can be seen in his categorization of different aspects in Etym. 11.1.13: when it enlivens (vivivicat) the body, soul is anima, when it wills (vult), it is animus, when it knows (scit), it is mens, when it recollects (recolit), it is memoria, when it judges correctly (rectum iudicat), it is ratio, when it breathes (spirat), it is spiritus, when it senses (aliquid sentit), it is sensus. Animus, together with mens, memoria and ratio belongs to the more sophisticated activities which tended to be associated with man. Aristotle describes the increase in sophistication of the soul the higher up the biological ladder a living thing is. Animals have not merely the nutritive soul of plants but also sensation ranging from just touch in the lower orders to the five senses higher up. This 'sensate' soul can exercise imagination and desire (de An. 3.10-12; EN 1.1102b 13) and manifest them in courage, timidity, etc.; but only humans have nous = mind and reasoning ability.[35] Thus, both animus and anima are more appropriate readings in the Isidore passage than animal, since all our other Latin texts have one or the other.[36] Animus is, however, restricted to Pliny: it is particularly suited to his context, which focuses purely on mental images and in humans only, rather than on the perception of visual material; whereas anima, as well as being closer to animal for a possible textual slip, suits Isidore's more general reference to primarily sensual impressions and a female sex which embraces all animals, not just humans.

[29] Here Isidore, like Pliny in HN 8.216 cf. 7.31 and Solinus 2.58 p. 143 Münzer, evidently refers to the baboon, to which the term cynokephalus was also applied.

Unlike Pliny, but like all the other sources except the Aristotelian Problems, Isidore keeps to the idea of female-only impressionability. Here again, his word derivations underscore his interpretation of 'feminarum […] naturam'. Mulier comes from mollities, softness (Etym. 11.2.18), while one derivation of femina is from the Greek for fiery force, because the female desires more vehemently, 'for females are said to be more libidinous than males' (Etym. 11.2.24)[37] and the heat of their desire – 'in extremo voluptatis aestu' – is emphasized in the sentence Isidore takes from Jerome.[38] Jerome in turn had made play of the double desire of the flock who, after the heat of the day, were eager to drink as well as to copulate ('[…] so that out of two-fold desire, while they were eagerly drinking and being mounted by the male animals […]' etc.).[39] They were thus ready to absorb both the male seed and the cunningly variegated reflexion in the water. The admixture of the heat which prompts thirst for water and thirst for sex is found in Pliny, who comments that the great number of hybrid creatures spontaneously produced in Africa is due to the crowding together of the different species in the heat of the day at the scarce watering-places (HN 8.42). This, incidentally, takes us back to Isidore's starting place: hybrid animals bred contra naturam by man. It is surely significant that he does not acknowledge in the sections of Etym. 12 devoted to wild animals the existence of 'natural' wild hybrids such as these; those listed in Etym. 12.1.60 are all domesticated animals artificially bred; the emphasis is on hybrids as essentially perversions devised by humanity rather than a natural variation ordained by the Creator.[40]

Conclusion

On the topic of human anomaly, we have seen that Isidore in the Etymologies reprises two ideas given a particularly memorable treatment in Pliny's HN over 500 years earlier. On the types of human monstrosities and maternal (or, of course, in his case, parental) impressions, Pliny emphasizes the potential for variety in the human form, since the former exemplifies the inexhaustible variety of natura creatrix and the latter illustrates how the rational creativity of nature is mirrored microcosmically in her highest creation, man. Humanity is enjoined to attempt to see the apparent oddities as part of overall naturae vis et maiestas (HN 7.7). It is a power that is exuberant to the point of capriciousness: the monstrous races are playthings for her, wonders for us: ludibria sibi, nobis miracula (HN 7.32). When he describes the potential for variation wrought directly by impressions processed by the human mind at conception, Pliny underlines the link between human and divine ratio by stressing the role of the mind's imagery, rather than visual stimuli and doubles the potential for variation by stressing the paternal as well as the maternal involvement, specifically ruling out the capacity for this sort of mental creativity on the part of other animals. Here, too, there is a feeling of uncontrolled creativity, of the irresponsible capriciousness of random thoughts which 'briefly cross the mind' (animo subito transvolans, HN 7.52).

[40] This is not to say that Isidore necessarily believes that nature cannot produce hybrids spontaneously. Another, stranger, form of inter-species mutation is attributed to her at the end of book 12, where the spontaneous generation of one life-form from the dead remains of another is mentioned; a staple of biological theory which was not seriously challenged until the seventeenth century (Harris, Things Come to Life: especially pp. 14-17). The mythical/folk tales of metamorphosis which begin the paragraph are reported at one remove in typically paradoxographical terms: 'they write', 'they assert with historical confirmation(!)', 'they claim'. However, the transformation of the appearance of criminals into wild beasts, assisted by charms and poisons, is recounted without such literary intermediaries and returns us to the theme of devious/deviant human activity. That (self) corruption of the soul can trigger change in the body is not out of line with the belief in the transmission of changes from mind to body through maternal impressions and, more specifically, with the engineering of the latter by a superior mind deploying tricks of nature.

For Isidore in contrast, uncontrolled inventiveness and inexplicable or unnatural forms not only raise difficult questions about the divine purpose and the relationship between the creator God and ingenious humanity; they also disrupt the order which lies at the heart of his project and undermine his rationale of categorization. The individual human monstrosities, though explained in a similar way as part of an overall divine plan whose entirety is beyond the comprehension of men, are brought under some sort of control in the Etymologiae by marshalling them in accordance with meaning, extremity and types of deformity. As for the monstrous races mentioned earlier, it was noted that their lack of a head, the prime physical indicator of the possession of a soul, raised questions as to their correct categorization as humans. As humans, they do not make sense. Would even God have gone that far?

Deviations caused by the human mind are viewed with considerable distrust. Pre-birth impressions are limited to women and females generally, and are a sign of weakness – the ease with which their minds and bodies can be overpowered – rather than an indication of an intellect whose power rivals the creative deity's. In the case of animals, indeed, the intellect of man is involved, but the tone is critical: his cunning is directed towards unnatural ends, the creation of species not ordained by God. As for Isidore's deity, He may be inscrutable in his creation of monstrosities, but the undisciplined, wild frivolity suggested by Pliny's natura happily creating ludibria for herself seems far removed from the Christian's ultimately rather serious divine plan.

This leads to a second, more specific, point about Isidore's overall project: for etymology to work, it requires a basis of rationality from which to derive a word's meaning.[41]

> However, not all words were established by the ancients from nature; some were established by whim, just as we sometimes give names to our slaves and possessions according to what tickles our fancy. Hence it is the case that etymologies are not to be found for all words, because some things received names not according to their innate qualities, but by the caprice of human will.

[41] On Isidore's recognition of the limits of etymology as a methodology to promote understanding, see Merrills, Isidore's Etymologies, p. 311.

> Non autem omnia nomina a veteribus secundum naturam inposita sunt, sed quaedam et secundum placitum, sicut et nos servis et possessionibus interdum secundum quod placet nostre voluntati nomina damus. Hinc est quod omnium nominum etymologiae non reperiuntur, quia quaedam non secundum qualitatem, qua genita sunt, sed iuxta arbitrium humanae voluntatis vocabula acceperunt.[42]

According to Isidore, then, words which derive not from nature but from human whim cannot have etymologies. In addition, Adam 'conferred names on all the animals, assigning a name to each one from its visible conformation according to the position in nature that it holds' (12.1.1).[43] Humanity may make the words, but God made the creatures. It is certainly not for man to manipulate those natural conformations.[44] A deus ludens is not an impossibility: the Christian creator in a sense sets the rules, and is the ultimate arbiter of the 'natural', as Isidore himself says even more clearly in Etym. 11.3.1: 'the nature of everything is the will of the Creator'.[45] However, it would make the task of revealing an overall logic in the world's verbal manifestation much more difficult. Caprice, either of man or God, would seem to lie outside the concept of the Etymologies. Sporting with nature undermines the natural order of etymology itself.

4 Putting the Pieces Back Together

Isidore and De Natura Rerum

Andrew Fear

The enormous achievement and success of Isidore of Seville's Etymologies has tended to eclipse the other works of this prolific author. Arguably the most significant of these is his earlier and much smaller De Natura Rerum (DNR) which comprises 48 short chapters, occupying a mere 55 columns in the Patrologia Latina.[1]

The DNR is often known as the Liber Rotarum because of the six circular diagrams with which it is illustrated. These are likely to be Isidore's own as the text makes reference to figurae or diagrams at the points where they occur. Isidore can therefore be credited with popularising, if not devising, this standard mnemonic device of the Middle Ages which reached its apogee in the works of his fellow Spaniard Ramon Llull.[2] Four of the diagrams contain an illustration of a human bust in the centre, a fact of some significance, and a further diagram (that illustrating chapter 11) contains the even more significant motto Homo Mundus Annus. The final chapter of the De Natura Rerum, dealing with the parts of the world appears, like chapter 14 of book 13 of the Etymologies, to have been illustrated with a T-O map, again popularising this way of envisaging the world which was to remain dominant in the medieval imagination. The best-known example in Britain is the mappa mundi found in Hereford cathedral.[3]

Though slight, the DNR became a standard point of reference and copies of the work spread across all of Western Europe and had a powerful influence on later writers, setting a template for discussion in this field. Bede's homonymous De Natura Rerum owes much to Isidore's DNR, as do books 9-11 of Hrabanus Maurus's encyclopaedia De Universo.[4] The work itself is composed in four sections. It begins with seven chapters of hemerology, the science of the measurement of time, a topic which remained a particular concern of Isidore's throughout his life: the subject is also discussed at length in the Etymologies. These chapters deal mainly with definitions of certain lengths of time, beginning with the day (on the grounds that this is what makes creation and its order visible) and in particular the question of when it begins.[5] Surprisingly Isidore is not dogmatic about this question – he lists a variety of different starting points, but gives no firm conclusion as to which is preferable. However, from the diagram accompanying the discussion, it appears that his own preference was for the 'Egyptian' system of calculating the day from dusk to dusk. After dealing with the day, Isidore goes on to the definitions of ever-longer periods of time ending with the year. Hemerology is followed by twenty chapters of astronomy, which in turn give way to nine chapters on meteorology.[6] These deal with phenomena such as thunder, lightning, and rain, followed in their turn by a section on miscellaneous natural phenomena such as the flooding of the Nile and the eruptions of Mount Etna. The work was then probably brought to a close with a concluding chapter which deals with the divisions of the world.[7]

Some of the DNR's legacy in retrospect cannot be evaluated positively. The T-O map found at its end, implying, as it does, that the earth was flat, left a mixed blessing.[8] Moreover, the notion of a flat earth runs throughout the work. Chapter 10 deals with the 'five circles', quinque circuli, of the Earth. At this point Isidore is giving a version of the zonal theory derived from Hyginus's De Astronomica.[9] Hyginus's *zone*s were so named as they girdled a spherical earth. However, in his explanation of Hyginus's ideas, Isidore has applied the theory of *zone*s to an underlying conception of a flat earth which the sun passes on one side. This perversely means that the Arctic and Antarctic zones are placed adjacent to one another as they have both to be located on the side of the earth opposite to that passed by the sun. While educated society in the early medieval world believed that the earth was a sphere – this, for example, was the view of Bede – the popularity of the DNR may well have led to a continuing and widespread 'semi-educated' view that the world was flat. This notion may have been equally perpetuated by Isidore's sarcastic rejection of the antipodes found in the Etymologies.[10]

---

[5] The latter has implications for the monastic day and the time of creation. See for example the conclusions of Archbishop Ussher in 1658: 'In the beginning God created Heaven and Earth, Gen. 1, v. 1. Which beginning of time, according to our Chronologie, fell upon the entrance of the night preceding the twenty third day of Octob[er] in the year of the Julian [Period] 710. The year before Christ 4004. The Julian Period 710.'

[7] Fontaine argues that this chapter only appeared with the second recension of the work, but see the discussion by McCready, 'Isidore, the Antipodeans, and the Shape of the Earth', esp. n.35.

[8] See Brehaut, An Encyclopedist of the Dark Age, pp.49-50, Destombes, 'Newton's Commentary on the Emerald Tablet of Hermes Trismegistus' and McCready, 'Isidore, the Antipodeans, and the Shape of the Earth'. For a contrary viewpoint see Stevens, 'The Figure of the Earth'.

[9] Hyginus, De Astronomica 1.6.

The DNR was therefore a great success, to the benefit or detriment of mankind, but what prompted Isidore to write the work in the first place? The piece is often referred to as a 'text-book';[11] however, though Isidore was greatly concerned with improving education – the Etymologies, for example, has often been seen precisely as a handbook for educating the contemporary priesthood – there is no reason to believe that this was his intention when writing the DNR. The work may well have taken on this role in later years given its concise nature and its heavy use by the Church Fathers, but nothing in it makes any reference to education being the initial motive for its composition.

Rather, according to its preface, the work was a direct product of a royal command, having been commissioned by the Visigothic king, Sisebut (612-620). Caution needs to be exercised before accepting such a claim, as it could simply be an attempt by the bishop to increase his readership and add lustre to the work. However, here there do seem to be grounds to accept that the king did indeed ask Isidore to write such a work. Isidore's letters to his colleague Braulio of Saragossa, where he implies that he is a confidant of the king[12], provide some tenuous support, but Sisebut's own poem on solar and lunar eclipses, dedicated to Isidore and thanking him for composing the DNR, seems conclusive.[13]

When addressing Sisebut in the preface to the DNR, Isidore says that although his king already rejoices in intelligence, eloquence, and is an able writer in a variety of genres (as well as poetry, Sisebut wrote hagiography[14]), he has nevertheless commissioned the DNR because he wished to have further knowledge: knowledge without which 'that famous wise king' could never have said,

[13] For an edition of this poem see Fontaine, Isidore de Séville: Traité de la Nature, pp. 328-35. The king's dedication to Isidore can be found in lines 166-169.

[14] 17-21: 'ipse enim mihi dedit horum quae sunt scientiam veram ut sciam dispositionem orbis terrarum et virtutes elementorum, initium et consummationem et medietatem temporum et meditationem omnium morum mutationes et divisiones temporum, anni cursus et stellarum dispositiones, naturas animalium et iras bestiarum vim ventorum et cogitationes hominum differentias arborum et virtutes radicum, et quaecumque sunt absconsa et inprovisa didici omnium enim artifex docuit me sapienta'. The king was the author of the short Vita et Passio S. Desiderii = PL 80 377-384.

> 'For he hath given me certain knowledge of the things that are, namely, to know how the world was made, and the operation of the elements. The beginning, ending, and midst of the times: the alterations of the turning of the sun, and the change of seasons. The circuits of years, and the positions of stars'.

The wise king here is Solomon, and Isidore's quotation is drawn from the Wisdom of Solomon. Solomon was certainly held up as a model ruler in the early medieval period and we could therefore see DNR as part of a propaganda campaign by the king to be acknowledged as the new Solomon, and hence the ideal ruler, of Spain.

However, it is not without significance that Isidore's quotation from the Wisdom is carefully edited. In full the passage in Wisdom goes on to speak of:

> The natures of living creatures and the furies of wild beasts: the violence of winds, and the reasonings of men: the diversities of plants and the virtues of roots, and all such things as are either secret or manifest.[15]

None of this latter wisdom features in the DNR. Isidore's selective quotation is obviously to his advantage as it connects his work more firmly with Solomon, but it also casts some light on the circumstances of the DNR's genesis. Isidore, and perhaps his monarch, seem more concerned about the propagation of some sorts of knowledge than others. At the time of writing there appears to have been a recrudescence in the peninsula of heresy centred on astronomical phenomena. Braulio, when writing to Fructuosus of Braga in AD 651, speaks about the dangers of Priscillianism as if it was a living threat to the church.[16] Priscillian, an extreme ascetic, who enjoyed the dubious distinction of being the first Christian to be executed by an Orthodox Christian emperor, was, and remains, a controversial figure, but astrology, rightly or wrongly, featured strongly in the reasons for his execution.[17] Whether Priscillian's cult had survived some two hundred and fifty years is certainly open to doubt, but it is plausible that 'Priscillianism' was used as a portmanteau term for astronomical/astrological-based heresies and that Braulio's concerns were genuine.[18] Sisebut was a deeply pious ruler and the existence, or indeed the growth, of heresy in his realm is likely to have been a cause for personal concern as well as a potential political threat to his rule.[19]

[17] Priscillian was executed in AD 385 by the usurper Magnus Maximus. His guilt remains doubtful and various respectable ascetics, most notably Martin of Tours, urged Magnus to acquit him. For modern studies see Chadwick, Priscillian of Avila and Cabrera, Estudios sobre el Priscilianismo en la Galicia Antigua.

The probable date of the poem suggests that there may well have been another, much more pressing, set of reasons for the king to commission the DNR. Its composition is best dated to the very beginning of Sisebut's reign. This can be seen from the fact that the king's own poem on eclipses, written to thank Isidore for the DNR, refers to his campaigns in the north of the peninsula against the Basques and Cantabrians.[20] The Chronicle of the Pseudo-Fredegar places these campaigns before those Sisebut waged against the Byzantines.[21] As these date to AD 615-616, the DNR must predate Sisebut's northern actions and the first year of Sisebut's reign, AD 612, seems not unreasonable for the composition of the DNR.

This had been a time of alarming phenomena in Spain. In AD 611 there had been two total eclipses of moon visible in the peninsula which would have turned the moon red, and on 2nd August in the same year a total eclipse of the sun occurred. This was visible in the peninsula and its line of totality may have fallen just to the north of Visigothic capital Toledo.[22] The obvious response to such matters at the time would have been to turn to the Bible for solace. What Sisebut's subjects would have found there, however, is likely to have given cold comfort to them or to their king. According to chapter six of Revelation such eclipses presaged the beginning of the end of the world:

> And I beheld when he had opened the sixth seal, and, lo, there was a great earthquake; and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood.[23]

However, recent calculations by NASA suggest that the line of totality in fact lay in the Algarve rather than central Spain.

These signs lead to the collapse of all earthly kingdoms with their rulers fleeing in terror:

> And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every free man, hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains; And said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb: For the great day of His wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand?

Obviously, Sisebut had a strong personal interest in ensuring that his subjects did not see this passage as applying to the present, and in Isidore, who was extremely hostile to millenarian speculation, he found the ideal scholar to write a work ensuring that such pernicious notions did not spread.[24]

Isidore's strategy to deal with these problems was to take a rationalising approach to remove any aura of mystery from the heavens or phenomena such as earthquakes or eclipses. The title of his work and its opening statement that his king wished to know about 'nature' and its 'causes' are themselves an act of persuasive definition, insisting that what is to be described forms part of the normal order of things, natura, and is not a set of supernatural signs or warnings from God. We are told firmly that the workings of nature can be perfectly well explained by 'sober, sensible teachings' and have nothing to do with 'superstitious knowledge'.[25] This is a perfectly orthodox approach. Augustine taught that both Scripture and science were of equal authority, and must always be interpreted so that they are in agreement. Because of that, the Bible had to be interpreted consistently with the natural world.[26] Isidore effectively is presenting the opposite side of the same argument – the natural world must be regarded as in accord with the Bible. In his Etymologies we see him taking the same attitude when dealing with human prodigies, another phenomenon that caused much alarm in antiquity. There he notes that while pagans call such things 'contrary to nature', this cannot be the case as they must be part of [24] Isidore's hostility to millenarian speculation can be seen at the end of the small chronicle that he inserts into the Etymologies. According to this his contemporaries were in the sixth age of man whose duration was known to God alone, 'Residuum sextae aetatis tempus Deo soli est cognitum'. Etym. 5.39.42. For a discussion of millenarianism, see Landes, 'Lest the Millennium be fulfilled'.

God's creation and hence part of the divine plan. As such, prodigies are not contrary to nature, but only contrary to nature as it is known to man.[27]

In taking this approach towards his brief, Isidore was adapting to his own very different ends the technique that the pagan poet Lucretius had used for the same purpose some seven centuries before. Lucretius was well-known in Isidore's day. Sisebut's poem on eclipses makes heavy use of his De Rerum Natura and Isidore too discusses at length, and with some sympathy, the theory of atomism in his Etymologies.[28] As the title of his work, De Natura Rerum, shows, Isidore was a conscious imitator of Lucretius whose work was entitled De Rerum Natura. The title of the DNR is most unlikely to have been a post eventum creation as it is found in the renotatio Isidori, a list of Isidore's works compiled by his near contemporary Braulio of Saragossa. At first sight, Lucretius seems an ideal ally for Isidore. He too had wished to dispel the belief that various natural phenomena were divinely inspired through applying rationality to the natural world.[29] He was also, as were Isidore and the Visigothic Church, deeply opposed to attempts to consult the supernatural through systems of divination. This was an enduring problem for the Church as can be seen by the fierce condemnation of the practice at the 4th Council of Toledo held under Isidore's supervision at the end of AD 633.[30]

Fontaine portrays Isidore in the DNR as drawing on Lucretius and other pagan sources, along with the Church Fathers, most notably Ambrose's work on the creation, the Hexameron, to produce a synthesis of pagan and Christian learning to make his case:

Canon 29.

> ‘Le merite de Isidore est d’avoir voulu égalment utiliser ces auteurs chrétiens et ces sources antiques.’
> It is to Isidore’s credit that he wished to use Christian authors and ancient sources.

He goes on to argue that the work has another important intellectual aspect – the conscious separation of secular and theological learning:

> ‘Isidore est soucieux de laisser à l’ordre rationnel et à l’ordre mystique leurs domains respectifs.’
> Isidore is concerned to leave the rational order and the spiritual order in their respective domains.

But, on reflection, it is difficult to maintain either of these positions. As we shall see, Isidore does not give equal weight to his Christian and secular sources nor can he be viewed as an early champion of granting secular learning its own domain, still less as seeing it as an equal partner to religious speculation. In fact the reverse is the case. While it is noticeable that Isidore’s magnum opus, the Etymologies, begins not with divine learning, as was common with medieval encyclopaedists, but a description of the fields of secular learning, it is also the case that he sees this learning as useful only if it is applied to religious endeavours. In the Etymologies the canonical seven subjects of classical education are portrayed as those which free the mind from worldly care and lead it to higher things.[31] In another work, the Sententiae, Isidore, who had made a deep personal intellectual investment in the study of grammar and closely related subjects, strikingly compares grammarians to heretics. We are told that grammar is only better than heresy on the grounds that while the latter is always fatal, grammar can lead to salvation, if its teachings are refocused on better, i.e. religious, themes.[32] The bishop’s attitude to the study of the natural world was identical. Ignorance for Isidore is the mother of all evil.[33] In the natural sciences it could easily lead to precisely the sorts of superstitious beliefs he detested. But while knowledge of the natural world would dispel such superstitions, if it was not correctly appreciated, like grammar, it could damn the soul in different, but equally deadly, ways. Lucretius was especially dangerous in this respect as his false views were presented in the seductive medium of poetry.[34]

Isidore's quarrel with Lucretius was one of ideology. The Roman poet had been an avowed Epicurean and Epicurus is praised throughout his poem. At times Epicureanism had been quarried with profit by early Christian authors: its ridicule of pagan religion was welcome, as was its insistence that this world will pass away.[35] Jerome praises Epicurus's advice to remain celibate and his championing of a simple diet.[36] Nevertheless these Christian uses of Epicureanism were merely opportunistic: beneath them lay a sustained hostility towards the philosopher and his devotees as, undeserved though it was, Epicurus had long had an unenviable reputation in antiquity for promoting debauchery and atheism.[37] According to Augustine, carnal pleasure, corporis voluptas, was the Epicureans' highest good,[38] and Epicurus is also attacked as a champion of sensual excess by other influential late antique authors such as Martianus Capella[39] and Boethius.[40] The charge of atheism served to blacken Epicureanism's reputation still further. While in fact Epicureans like Lucretius were deists rather than atheists, this was of little help.[41] No Christian could accept the contention that God did not create the world, had no care for what happened in it, or that the world contained no message for mankind.[42] Still less would the Epicurean notion that there was no afterlife have been acceptable – Isidore does not think it even worthy of refutation. While Lucretius is keen to remove the fears of hell by demonstrating that death brings a final end, for the early Church Fathers the hope of reaching heaven and the fear of descending to hell were an important part of the Christian message.[43] Finally, it is inconceivable that Lucretius's anthropology as expounded in book five of the De Rerum Natura arguing that religion has evolved as a product of ignorance about natural events could have been smiled upon by Isidore.[44] Given these problems, we can see that any alliance between the church and philosopher was merely one of convenience as their core beliefs are quite antithetical to one another. St Ambrose, a favourite author of Isidore, was happy to term his ecclesiastical opponents 'Epicureans',[45] and Isidore himself attacks Epicurus in the Etymologies as a lover of vanitas not sapientia and as asserting that pleasures of the flesh are the greatest good. The bishop notes with satisfaction that because of this 'even [pagan] philosophers have named him "the pig".'[46]

[34] Isidore had a strong dislike of pagan poets: 'Superficially the disquisitions of the gentiles glisten with the eloquence of their words, but within they are devoid of the wisdom of virtue, whereas superficially sacred eloquia seems inept in the way they are composed, within they gleam with the wisdom of the mysteries. It was for this reason, the Apostle said: "This treasure we possess in vessels of clay."' *Gentilium dicta exterius verborum eloquentia nitent, interius vacua virtutis sapientia manent; eloquia autem sacra exterius incompta verbis apparent, intrinsecus autem mysteriorum sapientia fulgent. Above all for Lucretius nature is an entirely discrete field of study. The world needs no explanation other than itself: it was not created for a purpose nor does it serve a purpose. It is ignorance of these facts and the consequent rise of religion which has led to human misery, while the realisation of this truth leads to human happiness. Lucretius's work begins with a paean of praise to Epicurus for revealing this and thus crushing religion under foot.[47] Book six of the De Rerum Natura from which the bulk of the topics in the DNR is drawn begins with another similar encomium of Epicurus.[48] These are the conclusions from the study of nature which Isidore is anxious that his readers should avoid. For him it would be pointless to avoid the scylla of superstition merely to fall into the charybdis of atheism.

[42] Lucretius takes the classical line that there can be no creation ex nihilo: 'nil igitur fieri de nilo posse fatendumst' It must be admitted that nothing can come into being from nothing – DRN 1.205. See also DRN 5.187-194. Isidore would have been equally enraged by the preceding passage which argues that the world was not made for the benefit of mankind, in clear contradiction to Genesis. The Christian position that the world was indeed created ex nihilo by God is found in Ambrose's Hexameron (1.16; 4.31), a work on which Isidore draws heavily in the DNR and is stated by Augustine, Confessions 11.5.7. The insistence on this doctrine is found as early as Irenaeus, AH 3.10.3.

[43] See Augustine, *Ep.*104.3. In contrast Lucretius, De Rerum Natura 3.1023, declares hell exists only in the mind of fools. The anonymous seventh century Spanish author of the Lives of the Meridan Fathers (ch. 9) takes care to inform his readers that the deceased Arian king Leovigild is now 'subjected to peterpetual torments and eternally enslaved in the depths of hell, rightly bound down there to burn forever amidst the ever-seething waves of pitch'.

[45] Ambrose, *Ep.*63. Ambrose wanted to influence the election of the bishop of Vercellae. The supporters of an alternative candidate, Sarmatio and Barbatian, are characterised as 'Epicureans – not a school of philosophers, as they themselves say, but of unlearned men who preach pleasure, persuade to luxury, esteem chastity to be of no use'.

[46] Isidore's discussion of Epicureanism is found at Etym. 8.6.15-16.

As Lucretius was well known in Visigothic Spain,[49] Isidore chose to confront the dangers he posed head on. By its title his book throws down a challenge to the Roman author. The De Natura Rerum is intended to replace its rival, the De Rerum Natura. To do this Isidore focuses not on Lucretius's methodology, which he found acceptable, but rather its conclusions.[50] For Isidore, Lucretius is right that a wrong-headed view of natural phenomena causes misery, but conceding this does not equally grant that a secular approach is the correct solution to interpreting nature. In contrast to Lucretius, Isidore was convinced that the natural sciences could not be divorced from an understanding of the divine, indeed he held that this could only be done through an act of deliberate perversity. Isidore's world is a source of natural theology which allows the faithful believer to discern and confirm all around him God's purpose and will. Therefore Lucretius had missed the main point as to why man should contemplate nature and had probably done so wilfully. In his later Sententiae, Isidore, speaking of the matters found in the DNR, complains bitterly: 'The philosophers of this world speak a lot about the measurement of time, the course of the stars, and the movement of the elements. But they only have this information from God. Flying conceitedly like birds, they describe the air; plunging themselves into the depths like fish, the sea, and walking like herds, the land, but verily they have been unwilling to learn about their creator with all their mind.'[51] He continues: 'The Way is Christ. Whoever does not walk in it, will by no means come to God. So the philosophers of this world, indeed recognise God, but, because the humility of Christ does not find favour with them, they cross into where there is no way and do not walk in the Way. And so as they melted away, they twisted the glory of the Lord into lies, and, abandoning the righteousness of the Way, have fallen into the morass of error.'[52] In his introduction to the DNR Isidore speaks of the need to use sober doctrina, or learning, to interpret the natural world, but also of the 'true knowledge', scientia vera, which was given to Solomon to understand these things. It can be seen that for Isidore this true knowledge was a contemplation of the natural world through the mediation of the scriptures and faith. Contra Fontaine, Isidore does not reserve a place apart for secular learning, but rather wishes to remove the possibility of such a space. For him the natural scientist is on but the first rung of the ladder of understanding and it is a perilous one, as partial apprehension of the truth could easily blind the unwary to true knowledge. The De Natura Rerum attempts therefore both to reject the wilder and, worryingly, politically destabilising claims which some would read into natural phenomena, but also to re-Christianise natural science in order to turn society away from what Isidore saw as the equally wrong-headed secular approach to nature found in Lucretius.

[51] Multum mundi philosophi praedicantur in dimensione temporum, cursuque siderum, ac discussione elementorum; et tamen hoc non nisi a Deo habuerunt. Volando enim superbe, ut

Part of this process of reclaiming nature for Christ is carried out by the choice of authorities cited in the DNR. Lucretius, despite inspiring the title of the work, is firmly relegated to a minor position in it and although other pagan authors, both of prose and poetry, are cited by Isidore, they are rarely the primary witnesses he chooses to produce for his readers. This is a deliberate ploy by the bishop. According to Howard Jones, 'Isidore is a compiler, and Epicurus [in fact Lucretius] is just one line of ancient thinkers whose opinion on various topics is to be recorded in order to render the account as complete as possible'.[53] But it is naive to see Isidore as a simple collector of opinions and assert as does Jones that there is no sustained engagement with Epicurean arguments in the DNR. Far from being the casual act of a compiler, Isidore's relegation of Lucretius in his text is a conscious part of his strategy of re-Christianisation. He centres the bulk of his arguments around quotations from the Church Fathers, especially

St. Ambrose's Hexameron, upon which he leans heavily, and passages from the Old Testament. His intention is to assure his readers that Christian learning is more than sufficient to explain the natural world. This message is re-enforced by his use of quotations from pagan authors. These are predominantly used in a supporting rôle to buttress the material he has drawn from the Church Fathers. This is not co-incidence or caprice. Isidore wishes to show that while pagan authors may be of some use, their blindness to the truth precludes them being major sources for understanding the world and that, so far from having a distinct set of insights about the world, the pagan past merely foreshadowed imperfectly the message of the Christian revelation which brought complete understanding in its wake. As for all men of his time, antiquity carried weight for Isidore, but true gravitas was to be found among the Christian, not pagan, classics. In the preface to the DNR Isidore makes this approach clear: 'We have made a concise record of all these matters according to what was written by men of old, and especially according to what has been written in the works of Catholic authors'.[54]

A good example of Isidore's technique can be seen in chapter 13 of the DNR, which deals with the seven planets. His discussion starts with a reference to Ambrose's hexameron, which in turn is a quotation from 'David', i.e. the Psalms (here Psalm 148): 'Praise him heavens of the heavens'. Isidore then goes on to say that 'pagan philosophers' have introduced the notion of seven heavens. Herein, he argues, lies their mistake, as in 'the books of the church', ecclesiastici libri, we are told about 'the heavens of heaven' and also that St Paul was taken up to the third heaven, but it is folly, and, perhaps, dangerous – Isidore speaks of temeritas, rashness – to speculate further on the matter.[55] A similar approach is taken to the question as to whether stars have souls. Isidore again starts with patristic writing and the Bible.[56] A pagan source, Virgil, is then used to back up the conclusion that this question will only be resolved on the Day of Judgement. Lucretius in the DRN categorically denies the possibility of the stars being animate. Isidore's careful use of Virgil aims to show his readers that Lucretius was out of step with learned opinion even in his own times.

Although the above examples show that Isidore was willing to use uncertainty as a weapon to undermine the statements of pagan authors, he also attempts to create authority through certainty. Here the late antique convention of brevitas comes to his aid.[57] Isidore describes the DNR as a short record, a brevis tabula, and concision is an important virtue for him, but he is also able to use this notion to give the DNR an air of authority. Often Lucretius is open-ended in his explanations of natural phenomena: he gives, for example, several alternative accounts of the flooding of the Nile.[58] Isidore, on the other hand, tends to give one, definitive explanation. In the case of the Nile unfortunately he incorrectly settles on the Etesian winds as the cause of the river's flooding. This creation of certainty perhaps led to the DNR becoming a basic textbook, but that was not the reason for the change of approach. This was to allow Isidore once more to make a point about the unreliability of pagan philosophy's ability to explain the world. Pagan doubt is replaced by Christian certainty. This seems all the more the case when we ask why the flooding of the Nile or the eruptions on Etna are found in the DNR's miscellany at all. It could be argued that Lucretius had created, or was already following, a canonical list of wonders and that it was therefore inevitable that Isidore would engage with these. If that was the case, we can see how Isidore turned the list to his advantage. Isidore, however, does not deal with all the material found in Lucretius. There is no mention, for example, of the 'Avernian places' on which Lucretius spends so much time in the De Rerum Natura. We are left with a selection of Lucretian material and once again this selection is deliberate, not capricious. After all, Isidore could easily have replaced the flooding of the Nile, which would have been of no immediate interest to his readership, with more local phenomena, such as the tidal range in the Straits of Gibraltar, which provoked considerable interest in antiquity.[59] Isidore throws down a deliberate challenge to Lucretius and shows him wanting. This is equally true of the DNR's account of Mount Etna which, despite Isidore's protests of brevity, provides more information about the physical reasons for volcanic eruptions than is found in Lucretius's account.[60]

Isidore therefore takes great care both to invoke Lucretius and to marginalise him depending on the context. The main difference, however, between the two authors is not in the number or depth of the explanations of natural phenomena they give, but rather in the style of explanation presented.

Lucretius, following Epicurus, wished to show that nature was all that exists, and that the supernatural was not merely an otiose, but an actively pernicious delusion brought on by muddled thinking. For Isidore the reverse is the case. Far from proving that there is no supernatural world, nature allows us a glimpse into that world. Where Isidore feels that a naturalistic explanation of phenomena will avert the problems of superstition associated with them, this is what the DNR gives. More often however the DNR allegorises its subjects and makes a firm link between the natural and supernatural. This approach is in sharp contrast to that later found in the Etymologies, which shows no interest in allegorising its subject matter. But this reveals a difference of purpose, not a change of intellectual approach. In the Etymologies the words discussed are themselves allegories as their roots reveal their true meaning.[61]

We can also see Isidore's keen interest in allegorical exegesis from his other works. His Allegoriae quaedam Sacrae Scripturae is an extended exposition of allegories which he believes to be present in the Old Testament, while the Liber Numerorum qui in Sanctis Scripturis occurrunt deals with the hidden significance of numbers occurring in the Bible. The DNR is another instance of this interest. Through allegory our world and the true heavenly world can be linked together and seen to be one whole. The DNR reverses the message of the De Rerum Natura: Nature does not disprove, but proves the existence of a world beyond it. It is partially explicable in its own terms, but also yields a higher interpretation and it is this allegorical explanation which is of greater value to the believer – something to which the pagan philosophers' pride has blinded them. This contrast is explicitly pointed out in chapter 20 of the DNR which deals with solar eclipses. After giving a naturalistic explanation of the eclipse, Isidore continues: 'This is what the physicists and the worldly-wise say. But our teachers say that mystically the mystery of this eclipse finds its completion in Christ', and continues to give an exposition of the Passion.[62] In chapter 15 of the DNR after a naturalistic description of the sun, we are told: 'This pertains to its form, but according to a spiritual understanding (spiritualis intelligencia) the sun is Christ, for as the sun gives light and blazes forth and fosters the healthy at times of shade, but enflames those with fever with an inferno of redoubled heat, so Christ illuminates the believers in the faith with his living spirit, but roasts those who deny him in the heat of eternal fire'.[63] Similarly in chapter 18, which deals with the moon, Isidore comments: 'This same Moon can be seen to symbolise the Church because just as she takes her light from the sun, so the Church takes hers from Christ. And just as the moon waxes and wanes so the Church has her low and high points'.[64] By an extension of the same allegory, lunar eclipses, which turn the moon red, symbolise the persecutions of the church.[65] The persecutions of the Church are understood to be symbolised by the eclipse of the Moon.

[61] Etym. 1.29.

[62] Hoc physici et sapientes mundi dicunt. Caeterum doctores nostri mystice hujus eclipsis mysterium in Christo dixerunt esse completum…

Such interpretations are the doctrina sana and sapientia vera referred to in the preface of the DNR. However Isidore's world is not simply a theatre of divine intentions – for as well as displaying how the cosmos has been ordered by God, it also, being a model of man writ large, reveals how man too is a product of intelligent design. In chapter 9 of the DNR Isidore notes that the world 'mundus' signifies everything in heaven and earth, but that 'in a mystic sense' mundus signifies man, as he is composed of the four elements that compose the world. The world is the κόσμος (cosmos), man the μικρόκοσμος (microcosm). Isidore uses Greek script at this point and then immediately glosses the latter phrase 'that is he is called the smaller world'.[66]

Isidore therefore aligns himself with a Christianised version of the Hermetic tradition which held that the earth was an accurate mirror of the celestial world: 'as above, so below'. He appears to have been the first western scholar specifically to have used this Greek terminology. According to this interpretation of the world, Nature not only provides the proof that all the world is an interconnected part of God's design, but it also shows that man is the key link between heaven and earth: the culmination of creation. It is to emphasise this centrality of man to creation that the middle of four of the circular diagrams found in the manuscripts of the DNR contain a man's bust at their centre and that a fifth, which shows the interconnection of the four elements, the four seasons and the four 'humours' of man, bears the hermetic motto drawn from Ambrose's Hexameron – Mundus, Annus, Homo – the world, the year, man.[67]

[65] Figuraliter autem per lunae defectum Ecclesiae persecutiones intelliguntur quando martyrum caedibus et effusione sanguinis, tanquam illo defectu et obscuratione, quasi cruentam faciem luna ostendere videtur, ut a nomine Christiano terreantur infirmi. Sed sicut ista post defectum perspicua illustratione clarescit, adeo ut nihil detrimenti sensisse videatur, ita Ecclesia, postquam per martyrum confessionem suum pro Christo sanguinem fuderit, majore fidei claritate refulget, atque insigniori lumine decorata semetipsam latius in toto orbe diffundit. 'Figuratively a lunar eclipse is understood as symbolising the persecutions of the church when there was the slaughter of the martyrs and an outpouring of blood, so when it gives way and is obscured the moon seems to present a blood-red face that the feeble might be terrified by the name of Christ. But just as after its eclipse it shines forth clearly with a clear light and is seen to have suffered no injury, so the church after she has poured forth her bloody witness of the martyrs for Christ, shines with a great light of faith and adorned with a more glorious light extends herself more broadly across the whole world.' DNR 21.

[66] id est, minor mundus est appellatus.

Isidore's championing of this interconnected vision of creation was a key moment in intellectual history. Though not of his devising, it was his works, above all the DNR, that served to popularise and place this idea at the centre of Western European thought well into the modern period, as can be seen by its espousal by Sir Isaac Newton.[68] The link it forged between the heavenly and mundane was to ensure that the natural world remained an important part of Western intellectual endeavours, albeit not in the autonomous fashion envisaged by Fontaine. Moreover, as the power of scientific positivism has waned in recent years, the potential of the work to continue its influence on Western thought shows no sign of abating in the near future.

The Politics of History-Writing

Problematizing the Historiographical Origins of Isidore of Seville in Early Medieval Hispania

Michael J. Kelly

Introduction

In a volume dedicated to exposing and critically exploring the reception of Isidore of Seville (c. 560-636 AD[1]) and the complicated historiography about him, what this chapter will do is take the reader back to the very origins of the historical memory of Isidore. It began in the year 636, in Seville, when the illustrious bishop died and the first historical representation of him was produced. This was followed by several other representations from writers around Hispania. The intention of this chapter is not only to introduce the reader to the inception of the written memory of Isidore, but also to problematize the natures of these first-generation historical representations. In so doing, the author shows that the long historiography on Isidore began as competing constellations for the memory of Isidore.[2] There was never in pre-Islamic Iberia, a singular representation of Isidore or agreement about the meaning and extent of his works or the significance of his life. The differing accounts illustrate the vigor that history-writing played in the fierce struggles for authority endemic to early medieval Hispania. They also demonstrate that any comprehensive account of the reception of Isidore must begin by showing the disagreements that characterized the original historiography of Isidore, which was displaced in the generations after his death and outside his network and kingdom.

First-Generation Historical Representations

There are four first-generation representations and historical accounts of Isidore. The first is the praise obituary known as the Obitus Beati Isidori written by Redemptus, a cleric at or near Seville. The text is from 636 and is preserved in a problematic eighth-century manuscript at El Escorial (R.II.14).[3] The second account of Isidore is Braulio of Saragossa's (590-651), Renotatio Isidori a Braulione Caesaraugustano episcopo edita (Renotatio), added to Isidore's De Viris Illustribus (DVI), and three of his letters (Epistolae), all of which are preserved in the ninth-century Toledan-Cordoban manuscript, León Cathedral 22 (c. 830-839).[4] All that can be said of the dating of the Renotatio is that it was written before Braulio's death in 651.[5] The forty-four letters in the collection were written over the course of two decades and include letters to and from Isidore. Third is the second canon of the Eighth Council of Toledo held in December 653, the oldest extant versions of which come from ninth-century manuscripts.[6] Finally, there is the representation of Isidore in Ildefonsus of Toledo's (c. 607-667) De Viris

Illustribus continuation, written around the middle of the 660s. The oldest remaining copy of this text is in the manuscript León Cathedral 22.[7]

Redemptus: Obitus Beati Isidori

This short text of about seven hundred and fifty words is the obituary of Isidore composed by a cleric named Redemptus. The account is based on the first-hand experience of the clerics around Seville who knew Isidore the most intimately, and were there for the last days of his life. This list includes, notably, John, Bishop of Ilipla and Eparcius of Italica (both relatively near to modern Seville). The Obitus Beati Isidori was the first posthumous account of Isidore. The point of the short text is to announce Isidore's death and to demonstrate that he spent his last days honorably, in peace and in a proper Catholic manner.[8]

Braulio: Epistolae, Renotatio and Isidore's De Viris Illustribus

The three letters of Braulio that were written after Isidore's death do not provide a detailed narrative of Isidore's life. They do, however, demonstrate Braulio's fidelity to the positive image of Isidore as an authority encountered in the Obitus Beati Isidori. In letter 14, written to Fronimian, a priest near the tomb of St. Aemelian, and perhaps the brother of Braulio, Isidore is cited in regards to liturgical protocol.[9] In another letter (22) to Eutropius, a bishop near Zaragoza, Isidore is noted because of his authority on the date of Easter. In letter 44, a response to Fructuosus (unknown-665), Braulio refers to Isidore as an incomparable man of learning (incomparabilis scientiae vir Isidorus), using him to prove a point concerning the age of the Biblical Methusala. In addition to providing evidence of his support for Isidore, recently it has been argued that the letter collection was arranged by Braulio to advance a critical narrative about the monarchy in Toledo. This is consistent with the wider use of historical representations for subtle, sustained criticisms of the monarchy and others.[10]

[9] That he was Braulio's brother is a weak argument based on Braulio's dedication of the Vita S. Aemiliani to his 'brother' (frater), Fronimian. On Braulio's family see note 17. For an edited version of the text see, PL 80, cols. 699-714, and for a translation see Lives of the Visigothic Fathers, ed. and trans. by Fear, pp. 15-43.

The Renotatio of Braulio was added to Isidore's De Viris Illustribus as a continuation, and offers a much fuller account of Isidore's life and character than that in Braulio's letters or in the obituary by Redemptus.[11] The Renotatio tells when Isidore lived, [supposedly all of] the councils he attended, and that he successfully fought heresy.[12] Braulio also spends significant space telling his readers that Isidore was an eloquent, intelligent and talented orator, and a skilled and knowledgeable writer. Braulio even graces his readers with an encomium to Isidore, quoted from Cicero, via Augustine's City of God (6.2).[13]

The most important feature of the Renotatio, however, is the list and short explanation of each of Isidore's works (missing a few small ones, Braulio says). Braulio lists seventeen works by Isidore in an order that is generally accepted as chronological.[14] The list goes from Differentiae, Proemia (introductions to Holy Scripture), De Ortu et Obitu Patrum, [De] Origine[m] Officiorum (known widely, and incorrectly, since at least 1534 as the De Ecclesiasticis Officiis[15]) through his Sententiae, Chronicon (Chronicles), De Origine Gothorum and his last work, the Origines (Etymologies). Braulio also provides a short description of each work and tells the readers for whom they were written.

[10] See Miguel Franco, 'Braulio de Zaragoza'.

[11] In lines 29-30 of the Renotatio, in the middle of the list and description of Isidore's works, Braulio adds, De viris inlustribus librum unum, cui nos ista subiunximus.

[12] Isidore was at the Council of Gundemar in 610 and the Third Council of Seville in the 620s, yet Braulio does not include either. The reasons for excluding them concern the memory of Isidore that Braulio and perhaps his collection editor wanted to preserve. For discussion of these councils see Chapter 4 of Kelly, 'Writing History, Narrating Fulfillment'.

[13] On the quote see Barlow, Iberian Fathers 2, Braulio of Saragossa, p. 10.

[14] Since Aldama's thesis, there have been challenges to the chronology of Braulio's list, from Jacques Fontaine to Pierre Cazier, the latest editor of Isidore's Sententiae (Isidorus Hispalensis Sententiae, ed. by Cazier). The most recent is that of Carlos Martín, in his edition and introduction to the Renotatio. Carlos Martín admits that there are potential problems with the order of the works, but that any alternative conclusions on the chronology should wait for reassessments of each work and their respective manuscript transmissions. For the theses and arguments see Martín, La 'Renotatio Librorum', pp. 74-84, Aldama, 'Indicaciones sobre la cronología', and Fontaine*, Isidore de Séville,* pp 217 and 436.

[15] See the introduction to the De Ecclesiasticis Officiis by Christopher Lawson who proves the original name of De Origine Officiorum through extensive manuscript and contextual research, Sancti Isidori Episcopi Hispalensis, ed. by Lawson. Carlos Martín maintains this naming of the text in his edition of the Renotatio (Martín, La 'Renotatio Librorum', p. 260).

Isidore's De Viris Illustribus was written about the year 619. It was a significant year in which he presided over the Second Council of Seville and finished the first version of the De Origine Gothorum. It was also when his pupil in Seville, Braulio, may have left Seville to return to Zaragoza.[16] The year 619 is also when Bishop Maximus of Saragossa (c. 574-619) died, and his successor John (unknown-631), the brother of Braulio,[17] took over the bishopric of Zaragoza.[18] It was at that point – the end of Maximus and the transfer of the bishopric to Braulio's family, the point at which Braulio himself may have returned to Zaragoza – that Isidore ended his DVI.[19] In so doing, Isidore tied the bishopric and city of Zaragoza, and the family of Braulio in particular, to a list of illustrious Christian men. Furthermore, the inclusion of Zaragoza in a list that proceeded through Pope Gregory I (c. 540-604) and Leander (c. 534-c. 600), Isidore's own brother and predecessor in Seville, connected Braulio's family and the cities of Seville and Zaragoza as twin spiritual centres. The allusion to the conversion of the kingdom to build legitimacy for particular bishoprics is a literary device common in seventh-century Hispania.

In his editing of the DVI, Braulio appropriately repaid the favor to Isidore by supplying an addendum on Isidore to the DVI that continued the story of Hispania's spiritual centres and illustrious figures. It is with this text that the Renotatio is transmitted in the manuscript tradition.[20] Thus, the Bishop of Zaragoza repaid the compliment from Seville with one for Seville, and the student also confirmed the legacy of his teacher, reinforcing and developing new channels between centres and networks of power.

[18] In the past, scholars have had doubts concerning the historical authenticity of Gundemar's council, but it is today widely accepted that it was a real event and the records authentic. E. peninsula', p. 71.

[19] In 619 there was also an inscription to Saturninus prespiter raised in Seville. The inscription, according to its inscribed dates, suggests that it refers to a local priest, but, given the relative lack of inscriptions from Seville, and all that had been happening between Zaragoza and Seville in the year it was presented, one wonders if this did not also serve as a reference to that S. Saturninus of the Eighteen Martyrs of Zaragoza, the sepulchral site next to which John was abbot and to which Eugenius II would flee to from Toledo. For the inscription see Inscripciones Cristianas de la España Romana y Visogoda (ICERV), ed. by Vives, no. 112, p. 38.

Braulio was faithful to Isidore to such an extent that he respected his predecessor's historical lacunae in relation to certain controversial ecclesiastical events. For example, in the Renotatio, Braulio notes Isidore's role in the Second Council of Seville, yet he says nothing about the Third Council of Seville, which was presided over by Isidore. This council was particularly contentious since at it a certain bishop, Martianus, was stripped of his rank and see, which were transferred to one Aventius. This established a battle between Martianus and Aventius that would be played out on the streets around Baetica and eventually in the court at Toledo and subsequent councils.[21] By remaining silent about this council in the Renotatio, Braulio followed the suppression of the records and memory of the council established with the Hispana, the conciliar collection edited by Isidore's network in the early 630s, and reinforced at the Fourth Council of Toledo in 633 (also presided over by Isidore).[22]

The Eighth Council of Toledo

The second canon of the Eighth Council of Toledo in 653 has the following to say about Isidore: 'The illustrious doctor of our time, the newest glory of our Catholic Church' ('Nostri quoque seculi doctor egregius, ecclesiae catholicae novissimus decus').[23] These flattering words about Isidore presented nearly twenty years, and four plenary councils, after his death represent the first recognition of Isidore's authority by the monarchy and church in Toledo. Followed by citations from two of his books, the Sententiae and Synonyma, this also marks the first moment at which Toledo sought to lay out its vision of the historical image and memory of Isidore.

[21] For a full discussion of the Third Council of Seville and the evidence for it see Chapter 4.4 of Kelly, 'Writing History, Narrating Fulfillment'.

[22] Councils will be abbreviated throughout the article in the following manner: Third Council of Seville = III Seville.

[23] VIII Toledo 2.

That this long overdue recognition of Isidore's spiritual authority was to happen at VIII Toledo should be no surprise. This council was a serious attempt by Recceswinth (d. 672) to soothe critical rifts caused by his father Chindaswinth (c. 563-653).[24] Recceswinth hoped to achieve this through an interrelated combination of concession and clemency, the association of this council with III Toledo, at which King Reccared (559-601) had celebrated the conversion of the Visigoths to Nicene Catholic Christianity in 589, and the sublimation of any threats to Toledo's authority. At VIII Toledo imaginary capital – in the sense of the council as the mirror to III Toledo – was ubiquitous, from superficial connections between the two names of the kings – Reccared and Recceswinth[25] – to their personal lineages to Liuvigild (c. 525-586), to their votive crowns, to their shared presentations as good, holy king in juxtaposition to their fathers.[26] Also significant was Recceswinth's elevation of the bishops and bishoprics of Mérida and Seville to the top two spots as signatories of the Eighth Council of Toledo – although their bishops, Orontius (d. c. 661) and Antonius (d. c. 656), were not the most senior at the council – as their predecessors had been at III Toledo. This dual promotion associated VIII Toledo with III Toledo. VIII Toledo was one of only three plenary councils from the 630s to the end of the Visigothic kingdom in the 710s in which the signatory from Seville was positioned higher than that of Toledo.

Making clear its theological position, the first canon of VIII Toledo proclaims Toledo's faith in the Holy Trinity, in consubstantiation, and in single baptism. The second canon, in which Isidore is cited, sets out to deal with deserters and traitors (refugis atque perfidis), in the context of the recent rebellion of Froia. Recceswinth had taken an oath to his father that demanded blinding and capital punishment for attempted usurpers and their associates, a rule that was confirmed by holy authority.[27] This commitment placed Recceswinth in a tough position. On the one hand, he needed to show clemency to the rebel Froia and his supporters (fautoribus), to show that faith and holy authority were above the law, while at the same time he had to maintain the integrity of oaths and the law, and deal with the real threat of rebellion. The council's solution was to cite Isidore, after presenting him as a doctor of the church. After citing the authority of ancient writers and doctors of the Church – Ambrose (c. 340-397), Augustine (354-430) and Gregory I – and praising Isidore, the canon cites Isidore's Sententiae 2.31.9, which says that an oath promised incautiously should not be kept.[28] The canon goes on to cite Isidore again, this time from his Synonyma 2.58.[29] As in the passage from Sententiae, it explains that promises given in bad faith should be rescinded: that which was unwisely offered should not be maintained because an oath should not comply with an evil deed. Toledo's initial historical representation of Isidore was, then, deeply rooted in the context of a political negotiation between the royal power centred on Toledo and aristocrats who sought clemency for former rebels.

[24] For discussion of the events leading to VIII Toledo and Recceswinth's position in 653 see Chapter 5.2 of Kelly, 'Writing History, Narrating Fulfillment'.

[25] Some historians argue that this is no coincidence, in that Recceswinth was related, by marriages, to Reccared's family (see Garcia Moreno, 'La sucesión al trono'). For more on the idea of the Imaginary, as a primary order of identity and alienation, see Jacques Lacan's Seminars and Écrits.

[26] The votive crown was a practice imitating the Byzantines, and perhaps, specifically, the crowns in Hagia Sophia. It represented the symbolic connection between and opposition of the earthly diadem and Heavenly crown, and as such the duality of Christ, but also the cooperation between the Church and the monarch. As Isidore says in Sententiae 3.51.3, royal power is only effective when subordinate to the higher authority. It is also possible that Eugenius II's carm. 20 and 36 refer to a rebellion of Froia as well: the former speaks of a current war in terms similar to Taio's description of Froia's attack on Zaragoza and the latter of the return of refugi after the war. [28] In the chapter, de iuramento, it reads, Non conservandum sacramentum quod malum incaute promittitur, veluti si quispiam adulterare perpetuam cum ea permanendi fidem polliceatur: tolerabilius est enim non implere sacramentum, quam permanere in stupri flagitium. The citation from the Sententiae that is in the Vives edition of the canon is slightly different from other earlier and later editions. For instance, in PL 83 it reads, Non est conservandum, and quo instead of quod, logically presents adulterae over adulterare, and reads perpetuo against perpetuam and flagitio over flagitium. Other than the differences with perpetuam and flagitium, the new critical edition of the Sententiae (CCSL 111) follows the PL version.

Ildefonsus: Isidore and the De Viris Illustribus

Ildefonsus' text on Isidore is noticeably shorter than Braulio's Renotatio, leaving out much about Isidore's personality, for example. The reader is not told about Isidore's charity, his fight against heresy, and his knowledge of antiquity. All that Ildefonsus repeated was that Isidore was a superb orator and a man with intelligence and propriety. The smaller quantity of general information about Isidore in Ildefonsus' account is reflected in a reduction in the number of Isidore's texts to ten. The ten texts on Ildefonsus' list of works attributed to Isidore are not in chronological order (if, indeed, Braulio's list is chronological in its organization), contain almost no descriptions of the texts' contents, and do not include all of the dedications of the books. For example, Ildefonsus does not mention that the [De] Origine[m] Officiorum (De Ecclesiasticis Officiis) was dedicated to Isidore's brother Fulgentius, Bishop of Astigi (modern Écija). The works that Ildefonsus does not mention are: De Numeris, De Nominibus Legis et Evangelorum, De Haeresibus, Chronicon, De Viris Illustribus, Monastica Regula, and the De Origine Gothorum, et Regno Suevorum et etiam Vandalorum Historia. Ildefonsus appears to have left the historical writings and origins stories out of Isidore's body of work. Upon reading Ildefonsus' account of Isidore's works one is provided with a different image of Isidore in which he did not write on history or origins, on spirituality and mysticism, or on monasticism. So, the Isidore of Ildefonsus did not continue the Chronicles of Eusebius-Jerome, did not claim that Swinthila was the king of totius Spaniae or declare Spain to be the 'ornament of the world' (ornamentum orbis), nor is this Isidore the grand architect of consensus and unity through historical discourse and representation that recent studies have emphasised.[30]

The cutting of Isidore's DVI from the lists of his texts in Ildefonsus' continuation of the DVI tradition deserves special attention because it suggests that the text as a whole was a response to Isidore's DVI and Braulio's addendum. As the recent editor of the DVI has pointed out, Ildefonsus' principal concern in writing the DVI was, in contrast to Isidore, to praise the sedes regia, Toledo, but also to insert into the historical record the key role of the Toledan monastery of Agali, from which a number of its bishops were raised.[31] Ildefonsus, who was the last bishop of Toledo to be raised through Agali, not only re-wrote the DVI in favor of Toledo and Agali, his praise for Isidore was somewhat backhanded. In the preface to the work, he acknowledges that Isidore wrote a DVI, but says that he did not do it well, which Ildefonsus intends to remedy.[32]

[31] Codoñer, 'Los De viris illustribus de la Hispania visigótica'.

Instead of writing from the second century forward, as Isidore had done, Ildefonsus' DVI includes only thirteen entries, starting with the Bishop of Toledo, Asturias (late fourth century). The next entry is on Montanus (d. c. 530s), the Bishop of Toledo that oversaw II Toledo in 527. Ildefonsus rapidly moves forward, with the fourth entry, to Aurasius, Bishop of Toledo from 603 to 615. In between Montanus and Aurasius, Ildefonsus mentions no bishops, not even Eufemius of Toledo (d. c. 590s), who presided over III Toledo, the council at which the Visigoths were converted to Catholicism in 589.[33] Instead, he includes Donatus (fifth century), the North African monk that had come to Spain with dozens of monks and books.[34] In this entry, he says that Donatus was the first to bring a monastic rule to Hispania, which likely was not true. Ildefonsus may have included this 'fact' because Agali used Donatus' rule (in privileging the authority of the Toledan monastery of Agali, Ildefonsus also ignored Isidore's Monastic Rule).[35] Ildefonsus' leap from Montanus to Aurasius allowed him to completely ignore III Toledo, and hence Leander of Seville.

In Isidore's DVI, the chapter on Pope Gregory I is followed by one about Leander, a leading figure in the conversion of the Visigothic monarchy. This literary construction placed Seville as the bishopric through which Hispania became Catholic, legitimising its spiritual primacy within the kingdom. It may be significant in this regard that Isidore mentions none of the bishops of Toledo. Ildefonsus, on the other hand, glosses over the conversion and its key figures – even Eufemius of Toledo – and charts an alternative story of ecclesiastical primacy. The lack of detail was so evident here that later scribes felt the need to add their own entries about the figures of this period, especially Gregory I.[36] Ildefonsus left Leander out of the narrative, instead focusing on the bishops who had occupied the bishopric of Toledo since the conversion, while the two bishops who were chronologically more distant provided the appearance of historical depth. Ildefonsus' DVI thus generated a Toledo-centred ecclesiastical history for late antique Hispania.[37] Ildefonsus thus sought to reshape the legacy of Seville, and of Isidore in particular. Ildefonsus' historical representation of Isidore reveals that there were at least two distinct historiographies of Isidore concurrent in the Hispania of the mid-seventh century.

[33] Ildefonsus' exclusion of Eufemius, the Bishop of Toledo at III Toledo, may seem strange: if Ildefonsus was trying to build the legitimacy of Toledo as the primary Catholic see of the kingdom, why would he not include Eufemius? One might reasonably believe that Toledo's bishop and signatory to the council at which the kingdom converted to Catholicism would be a necessary person to include in such a version of the narrative. However, since Gundemar's decretal had, in 610, defamed Eufemius for his 'mistakenly' recognizing Toledo as in Carpetania, not Carthaginensis, Ildefonsus had to be silent on Eufemius. For more on Gundemar's decretal and the problem of Eufemius' signature see Chapter 4.3 of Kelly, 'Writing History, Narrating Fulfillment'.

[34] Ildef., DVI 3. Donatus was a North African monk who brought the rule to Spain with him and who built the monastery of Servitanum. Ildefonsus claims that this was the first rule in Spain, a claim that Roger Collins says should be believed (Collins, Early Medieval Spain, p. 81). In contrast, Andy Fear maintains that there were earlier rules in Spain (Visigothic Fathers, p. 112). For discussion of the Visigothic monastic rules see Allies, 'The Monastic Rules of Visigothic Iberia', pp. 30-31.

The Next Generation: Historical Representations of Isidore

In addition to the first-generation historical representations, other texts were written about Isidore over succeeding decades in Visigothic Hispania: the Vita Fructuosi, Epitaphion beati Leandri, Isidori et Florentinae and the Chronica Regum Visigothorum. These reflect the divergent representations which have been identified in the historiography of the first-generation. The first post-Visigothic historical representation of Isidore is the eighth-century Continuatio Hispana (also known as the Chronicle of 754). This text demonstrates the merging of the original historiographical traditions.

The Vita Sancti Fructuosi was written by an anonymous disciple of Fructuosus, Bishop of Braga, after his master's death in 665.[38] The oldest extant manuscript is the tenth-century MS 10.007 in the Biblioteca Nacional de Madrid (formerly, MS Toletanus 10.25). In the Life of St. Fructuosus, together with the opening laudatory remarks for the eponymous saint, Isidore is praised for his divine love, brilliance, eloquent speech, personal charm, the reintroduction, it is said, of Roman education, as well as his productivity, in a description that is very similar to that of Braulio.[39] Fructuosus himself had been associated with Isidore's network, specifically with Braulio, and seems to have held similarly to anti-Toledan sentiments.

The short, metrical epitaph of twelve lines to the blessed Leander, Isidore and Florentina (Epitaphion beati Leandri, Isidori et Florentinae) is presented as the transcription of an inscription that was made at the time of the death of Isidore in 636. The possibility that this represents an authentic inscription from the 630s is slim.[40] A few puzzling questions come to mind when one reads the text. First, there is no reference to the other brother, Fulgentius, who died several years before Isidore. This absence implies that the person who wrote the epitaph was did not know this fact, or chose to ignore some rather basic information about the family. Second, the person who transcribed or copied the inscription either did not understand the Spanish aera dating system, or did not know when Isidore had died. This is evident from the date of death assigned to Isidore as era DCLXXXIII (Spanish era year 683), the year 645 AD. Jose Vives has argued that this mistake was not the result of ignorance of the Spanish aera system, or Isidore's date of death, simply a mistake by a later hand, the scribe of the eighth-century manuscript Paris, Lat. 8093, who 'confundió la primera I con una X'.[41] If Vives is correct, the transcription reflects an authentic contemporary inscription, now preserved in an eighth- or ninth-century transcription.[42] Although it is possible that the epitaph/inscription could be a later invention, there does appear to have been a tradition in seventh-century Seville of inscribing or writing epitaphs to recently deceased bishops. This can be seen in the case of the Obitus Beati Isidori examined earlier in this chapter and the epitaph to Isidore's immediate successor, Bishop Honoratius, in the Epitaphium Honorati episc. Hispalensis. In this context, the Epitaphion beati Leandri, Isidori et Florentinae is simply part of an ongoing tradition of episcopal commemoration in Seville.[43] Whether created in the mid-630s or later, within Spain or outside, the fact that the Epitaphion has been falsely attributed to both Braulio and to Ildefonsus is a good example of the confused nature of early accounts of Isidore.[44]

Chronica Regum Visigothorum

The Chronica Regum Visigothorum (CRV) is a basic, non-descriptive list (laterculus) of the Visigothic kings from Athanaric in 362 to Ervig in 680.[45] It was originally composed in the late seventh century in Hispania. Appended to the entry on Sisebut is a short note saying that he was king in the time of Isidore, sisebudi temporibus fuit isidorus episcopus. Not much can be gleaned from this reference since in it there is no detail about Isidore other than the fact that he was bishop. Furthermore, the reference to Isidore was very likely not from the original CRV. The oldest extant manuscript of the CRV is the eighth-century MS Vat. Reg. Lat. 1024. Of the twelve extant manuscripts of the CRV, only two contain the reference to Isidore: the tenth-century MS Paris 1557, and the eleventh-century MS Casinas n. 1. Since the latter manuscript is built on the former, there is only one manuscript family with this entry on Isidore, and it is a late one, from the tenth century.

In addition to being the only manuscript tradition of the CRV to mention Isidore, there are other anomalies in MS Paris 1557. First, there is no mention in any of the other copies of the CRV of any figures other than Visigothic kings. The scribe of this manuscript added Isidore to the reign of Sisebut, but also Gregory I and the Byzantine Emperor Maurice (539-602) to the reign of Liugivild (leuuigildus).[46] The other relevant anomaly is that in the MS Paris 1557 family, the CRV is not collected together with the laws of the Visigoths, but rather, between a conciliar decree and letters of Gregory I. It seems, therefore, that these additions were meant to clarify, for the reader, the historical context of the life and times of Gregory I, not to discuss Isidore.

Thus, the entry on Isidore in the CRV appears to reveal little about the developing historical representation of Isidore in later seventh century Hispania. However, there are indications that some copyists were drawing an the seventh century, titled confessio beati Isidori dicta (Index Scriptorum, ed. by Díaz y Díaz, no. 307). In the ninth century, the anonymous Ildemundus abbetis and versus de S. Iohanne were added to the manuscript, and in the eleventh century a life of Isidore was also included in this dynamic manuscript (Index Scriptorum, ed. by Díaz y Díaz, no. 370 and 377).

[45] For the edition of the Chronica Regum Visigothorum (CRV) see the Laterculus regum Visigothorum, in Chronica Minora., ed. by Mommsen, pp. 461-68.

[46] This spelling reflects the general manuscript tradition, but also perhaps contemporary disregard for Liuvigild's attempt to Romanize (Byzantinize) his name into Leogivild. The evidence suggests that various mints in the kingdom purposely ignored royal instructions to write the king's name as 'Leo-'. On the coins and their relation to the names see Grierson and Blackburn, Medieval European Coinage, pp. 49-54.

association between Maurice, Gregory and Isidore in this period.[47] Braulio was the only early medieval author to associate Isidore and Maurice in the same passage, and there is an early manuscript tradition of John of Biclar's (d. c. 621) Chronicle, which continues the text to 602 with supplementary discussions of Gregory I and Maurice alone. The Maurice-Isidore-Gregory association may therefore reach back into the seventh century if MS Paris 1557 is built on this textual tradition.[48] This supposition receives further support from the claim by the author of the Chronicle of 754 that a continuation of John of Biclar's Chronicle until the year 680 was a source. This continuation itself was likely a continuation of the earlier extension to 602, which, as noted above, focused on Maurice and Gregory I.[49] The Isidore reference in the CRV reinforces the impression that divergent historiographical traditions about Isidore were developing in the second half of the seventh century, one of which drew a close association between Isidore, Gregory I and Maurice.

Continuatio Hispana, or, Chronicle of 754

The Chronicle of 754 was written several decades after Arab-Berber armies had overthrown the Visigothic kingdom and established a Muslim state in much of Iberia. It is thus removed from the politics of the Visigothic kingdom, which shaped the earliest accounts of Isidore's life and works.[50] The Chronicle of 754 mentions Isidore together with, but only after praising, his potential rival, the Bishop of Toledo, Helladius (d. 633). All that is said of Isidore is that he was an illustrious teacher and staunch defender of the faith against heresy.[51] Despite the brevity of this notice, this is the first time that the two great, contemporary bishops of Seville and Toledo, respectively, were included in the same discussion. In bringing Seville and Toledo together in this way, the anonymous chronicler synthesised the historiographical traditions, presenting, what might be said to be, a neutral discourse, or a non-dialectical, or non-historical, one. However, this would be an unfair critique, since the chronicler was indeed speaking within a dialectics of power, but it was not the one colored by competition between Christians in Visigothic Hispania; rather, it was one that promoted Christianity within an Islamic polity in Al-Andalus. The chronicler, writing in Toledo or in the southeast of the Iberian Peninsula, was also concerned with the memory of Isidore, but his aim was to deploy the memory of Isidore (and Helladius) as historical evidence for the achievements of Christianity in Hispania: Isidore was now part of a 'unity' narrative, one which sought to see Christians in pre-Islamic Iberia as one community united under their Catholic king.

Conclusion

In summary, the historiography of Isidore emerged from his near contemporaries in Hispania as part of struggles between various networks of power over the politics of historical memory and history-writing. The participants in these debates over the historical representation of Isidore were all Christian, the hegemonic religion in early medieval Hispania. Although our knowledge of life in the Iberian Peninsula of the eighth century is limited, it is evident that Christians living there, after the defeat of the Visigothic monarchy in Toledo, lived under less stable conditions; their religion was no longer an obvious marker of power and status, but put them at a potential disadvantage. It is no surprise then that from the mid-700s the history of Isidore began to be written differently. The anonymous author of the Chronicle of 754 sought to promote Christianity and all of its illustrious figures in the peninsula. The aim of the text was to encourage an image of longstanding Christian, specifically Catholic, unity in the peninsula, and so merge the historiographical traditions, and indeed the history, into a narrative of consensus. The Franks especially, but others too, later found a desire to use Isidore's vision of what might be achieved when the church and monarchy were intimately tied to one another.[52] These two developments severed the historiography of Isidore from the historical conditions in which his memory was originally competed over. This created a displaced or re-territorialized concept of Isidore and his relation to specific pasts and historical narratives. The story of the wider medieval reception of Isidore, not to mention the theory of history, are, however, subjects for other chapters in this volume.

6 Isidorian Texts in Seventh-Century Ireland

Marina Smyth

When working in the 1980s on elucidating the cosmological views current in Ireland during the seventh century, I came to question the prevailing assumption that Isidorian works such as the Etymologiae and De natura rerum were available in Ireland already ca. 650. It had become clear to me that whereas Hiberno-Latin texts of the third quarter of the seventh century shared much technical terminology with those two Isidorian treatises, the Irish authors did not understand the meaning of these words.[1] Hiberno-Latin texts assigned to the mid-years of the seventh century had been adduced as evidence for early borrowings from Isidore of Seville (d. 636).[2] Variations on statements such as '... We can now be almost completely confident that the writings of Isidore were known in Ireland in the 650s. In the case of the Etymologies, it is at least possible that that work reached Ireland before the middle of the seventh century'[3] were commonplace in the field. This conviction led to the assignation of Hiberno-Latin texts to specific periods of the seventh century. Thus, for example, Aidan Breen concluded from his demonstration that the Commentarius in Epistolas Catholicas Scotti Anonymi was not influenced by the Etymologiae – contrary to previous belief[4] – that 'since the text, however, emanated from that very scholastic environment to which the works of Isidore were first introduced in Ireland, a date of 660 seems highly unlikely. In all probability, the text predates 650'.[5] Luned Mair Davies gave a very clear and concise account of the state of the question in the mid-nineties in her paper on Isidorian texts and the Canones Hibernenses,[6] but readers may not think to seek this information in the study of a text generally dated to c. AD 700 or later.

An early transmission of Isidore's works to a remote island lying to the west of northern continental Europe was explained by the high level of classical culture and stability in the Visigothic kingdom at that time, combined with maritime routes from northern Spain to Ireland.[7] Jonathan Wooding has pointed out: 'The presence, or non-presence, of trade routes is not in itself proof of the likelihood of the transmission of texts', and he feels that the 'pre-eminence of Spanish learning in the sixth and seventh centuries was sufficient that its influence was dominant'.[8] Aldhelm of Malmesbury (d. 709) is generally accepted as the first witness to the knowledge of Isidore in Anglo-Saxon England, specifically to De natura rerum. This is consistent with my understanding of the situation in Ireland: I agree with Hillgarth that 'it can be said that Isidore is omnipresent in the Irish writings of the late seventh, eighth and ninth centuries',[9] but I believe one should be very cautious for anything before the late seventh century… and this applies to more than Isidorian texts relating to cosmology.

In this contribution, I investigate the recent research in two areas and determine its implication for knowledge of Isidore's works in seventh-century Ireland: first, the dating of texts originating from Ireland, and second, the extensive studies on manuscript transmission associated with the ongoing (and now almost completed[10]) project of providing new editions for the works of Isidore. I now present my findings on some further aspects of the transmission of Isidorian works to Ireland from the middle of the seventh century.

Changes in the Dating of Texts Written in Ireland

The dating of early Hiberno-Latin texts adduced to show that the works of Isidore were available in Ireland already by AD 650 has been modified by recent scholarship. When preparing this paper, I was surprised to find that in his 1985 edition of Isidore's De ortu et obitu patrum,[11] Chaparro Gómez questioned the credibility of what seemed like perhaps the only solid ground in the study of the spread of Isidore's works to Ireland by the mid-seventh century. Referring to the explicit mention of Isidore in the text of Marc Adriaen's edition of Lathcen MacBaith's Egloga de Moralibus in Iob, Chaparro Gómez commented: si damos credibilidad al testimonio de Lathcen.[12] I had previously accepted that in the beginning of his much abbreviated version of the Moralia of Gregory the Great, Lathcen made explicit reference to Isidore and to his De ortu et obitu patrum: under the heading Dicta Isidori in libro de uita et exitu prophetarum, there is a close paraphrase of the short section in Isidore's work giving information on Job's origins and the duration of his life.[13] The death of Lathcen of Clonfertmuloe is recorded in the Annals of Ulster for the year 661,[14] and the comment in his Egloga seemed to make it secure that Isidore's De ortu et obitu was known in Ireland around the middle of the seventh century. Chaparro Gómez, on the other hand, points out that despite the mutual contamination of the various recensions, not all manuscripts of the Egloga contain this very section attributed to Isidore.[15] Since the earliest manuscripts of the Irish text are from the eighth century, the section may have been inserted any time before that. I also note that even though Ildefonsus of Toledo refers to Isidore's De ortu et obitu patrum as librum de ortu et obitu prophetarum, in early manuscripts of that work, the title normally mentions the life and death of sanctorum, not prophetarum.

[10] For a convenient list of editions available c. 2008, see M. A. Andrés Sanz, J. Elfassi & J. C. Martín, L'Édition critique, pp. 253-254. We can now add for the Etymologies: Book III: De mathematica (with French transl.; 2009), Book VI: De las Sagradas Escrituras (with Spanish transl.; 2012), Book VII: Dieu, les anges, les saints (with French transl.; 2012), Book XI: De homine et portentis (with Italian transl.; 2010), Book XIV: De terra (with French transl.; 2011), Book XVI: De las piedras y de los metales (with Spanish transl.; 2011), Book XVIII: De bello et ludis (with Spanish transl.; 2007), Book XX: De penu et instrumentis domesticie et rusticis (with French transl.; 2010), all in the collection Auteurs latins du moyen âge (Paris, Les Belles Lettres).

Chaparro Gómez identified three main versions for De ortu et obitu patrum,[16] the first being the only one composed by Isidore himself at the end of the sixth century, and remaining in Spain. Another version was created soon thereafter, probably in Spain, adding material from the Breuiarium apostolorum and Chapter 80[17]. This is the text that would have been transmitted to Ireland and Anglo-Saxon England, and also across the Pyrenees.[18] It did not contain the eight sections concerning Old-Testament figures which were added later in some of the manuscripts: 46 = PL86: Micheas; 47 = PL87: Naum; 48 = PL88: Abacuc; 51 = PL91: Zacharias; 54 = PL94: Achias; 55 = PL95: Iaddo; 56 = PL96: Azarias and 57 = PL 97: Zacharias.[19] The third type is later, with numerous and varied accretions.

In her 2012 contribution on Lathcen in Te.Tra. 4, Lucia Castaldi thoroughly reviewed and completely revised the stemma created by Adriaen, thereby showing that he had unfortunately produced a misleading edition in that it presents the text of one of the inflated Carolingian versions.[20] She concludes quite simply and emphatically: 'Lathcen non conosce e non cita Isidoro'.[21] The trump card for early seventh-century transmission of Isidore's work to Ireland is gone.

Bischoff mentioned the anonymous Versus cuiusdam Scotti de alphabeto[22] in his 1961 paper on the early spread of Isidore's works throughout Europe, in this case specifically the Etymologiae.[23] Manitius had assigned this riddle poem to mid-seventh-century Ireland,[24] and his dating had been accepted by most scholars. This early dating hinged on Manitius' belief that the explanatio of the riddles in the poem was composed by the same anonymous author as the verses, though it had been preserved separately, and only in a single manuscript dated to the end of the ninth or to the early tenth century (Chartres, Bibliothèque municipale 75 (55), since destroyed by fire). In addition, Manitius argued that the statement in the explanatio: KARTAGO est metropolis affricae could only be made before or soon after the Muslim conquest, so that, in his view, it must have been made during the first half of the seventh century. (A puzzling statement since it was only at the end of the seventh century that Carthage was destroyed in the course of the Muslim expansion. It follows that insisting on historical currency for the statement that Carthage was a major African city would merely imply that the explanatio was composed before the end of the seventh century.) Manitius added that frequent use of the Etymologiae in the Versus pushed the date of composition forward to the middle of that century. In 1976, Bischoff pointed out that this description of Carthage need not reflect the historical situation when the explanatio was written and that the riddle poem, composed presumably by an Irishman on the continent, fits in well with an early Carolingian cultural environment.[25] This observation is now generally accepted and these verses are no longer cited as evidence for early familiarity with the Etymologiae in Ireland.

[20] The 1969 Adriaen edition of the Egloga says that Job lived for 228 (CCXXVIII) years, whereas the 1985 edition of Isidore's work follows Arévalo (and the Septuagint) in reading fuerunt omnes dies uitae eius ducenti quadraginta octo anni, though the apparatus indicates that manuscripts read septuaginta instead of quadraginta (pp. 137-139). This suggests that the number was not spelled out in the manuscript available to the author of this addition to the Egloga and that the L for fifty may have been missing in CCLXXVIII, or unclear in CCXLVIII (and therefore confused with X). The St Gall manuscript of De ortu et obitu patrum (St. Gallen BA 240, s. IX) clearly reads ccxlviii. Checking this small point in other manuscripts might shed light on the text available to the interpolator of Lathcen's work.

[21] 'Lathcen neither knows nor cites Isidore', Castaldi, Lathcen, Egloga, p. 387. See Anspach, 'Das Fortleben', pp. 337-38, where he suggests that a scribe might have inserted a marginal note into his copy of the text. Anspach was mistaken when arguing that Isidore himself was the author of the Egloga, but his instinct was correct as regards the possibility of an interpolation!

Until the much-awaited 1992 edition of the Anonymus ad Cuimnanum (CCSL 133D), this grammatical treatise was commonly cited as evidence for extensive use of Isidore's works in seventh-century Ireland (De natura rerum, Differentiae, Etymologiae, De ecclesiasticis officiis). One example among others: De natura rerum iii.1-4 is the source in the discussion of feriae, as shown by the parallel passages presented by Hillgarth.[26] However, in his introduction to the edition, Bischoff assigned the text to the continent in the early eighth century, and suggested it originated from Bobbio since it makes use of texts known to have been available there at that time. He concluded that, contrary to earlier assumptions,[27] one 'cannot use the Ad Cuimnanum for information on sources available in Ireland': 'Angesichts dieser Bindung an das Columban-Kloster sind aus den Literatur-Kenntnissen des "Anon." keine Rückschlüsse auf der Bücherbesitz in Irland möglich'.[28]

Toward the end of the twentieth century, developments in the study of computistics related to early medieval Ireland seemed to provide another avenue for demonstrating that the works of Isidore were available very early in Ireland. It was argued that the collection of early computistical materials in the manuscript Oxford, Bodleian Library, Bodley 309 (saec. XI) – the Sirmond manuscript – could be dated to 658,[29] and thus provided evidence for familiarity at least with Isidore's Etymologiae at that time.[30] I questioned this in my 1987 paper, because such bookish collecting of data seemed at odds with the approach to scientific knowledge I encountered in De mirabilibus sacrae scripturae[31] and Liber de ordine creaturarum,[32] both from the third quarter of the seventh century, and in which I could find no evidence for the use of the Etymologiae. It seemed more likely that the short text containing the dating clause AD 658 was another of the earlier compositions included in the collection.[33] In 2010, Immo Warntjes published his analysis of what he identified as a new manuscript in the 'Sirmond group' of similar, but not identical, collections of computistical texts known in Ireland which would have been available to Bede. David Ganz had brought the manuscript Bremen, Staats- und Universitätsbibliothek, MSC 0046 – originating from St. Gall, c. AD 900 – to the attention of Dáibhí Ó Cróinín, who in turn encouraged Warntjes to go and examine it in Bremen. In addition to items found in other manuscripts in the Sirmond group, the Bremen compilation contains a previously unknown Prologue for a Victorian Easter Table, and this text can be dated unambiguously to AD 699. Warntjes points out: 'This is only the second post mid-seventh century and pre-Bedan dating clause to be found in any manuscript of the Sirmond group', and he concludes: 'If both the Oxford and the Bremen dating clauses [AD 658 and AD 699, respectively] are taken as indicative of the compilation of Sirmond material, then this suggests at least two stages, almost fifty years apart, in the same region, namely, southern Ireland'.[34] At present, there is no way of knowing precisely which texts would have been included in any one of such putative stages in the collecting of these computistical materials. It follows that one cannot assume that texts included in Bodley 309 demonstrate the use of Isidorian texts already in AD 658.

Merely scanning through the list makes it obvious that Isidore was known by the time the compilation was made: Sententiae Sancti Augustini et Isidori in laude compoti is Item 3 (fols. 62v-64v) in that list and Item 35 (fols. 105v-106r) consists of excerpts from Isidore's Etymologiae. In this connection, see footnote 55 on pp. XXVIII-XXIX of Warntjes, The Munich Computus, on the need to clarify terminology and to separate out Carolingian items in Bodley 309.

In 1982, Ó Cróinín announced that in fols. 77v-107v of the manuscript Bruxelles, Bibliothèque Royale Albert Ier, MS 5413-22, s. IX-X, he had discovered an Irish computistical treatise which he assigned to the circle of Cummian, author of the AD 632 Paschal Letter, if not to Cummian himself.[35] He gave this computus the name De ratione conputandi and provided an edition based on the two known manuscripts.[36] Isidore is frequently cited by name in this treatise, with selections from both the Etymologiae and De natura rerum. Warntjes recently carried out a very careful analysis of the content of De ratione conputandi in relation to the two other 'known Irish computistical text books from the post-Isidorian and pre-Bedan period, roughly to be dated to AD 650-750'[37]: the Munich Computus securely dated to AD 719[38] and the recently discovered Computus Einsidlensis.[39] He eventually concluded that the Computus Einsidlensis was composed sometime in the period 699-719,[40] and that De ratione conputandi must have been written between 719 and 727. All these computi quote Isidore's Etymologiae extensively, thereby only establishing familiarity with this work in Ireland at the very end of the seventh century and thereafter.

Bruno Krusch, Bartholomew Mac Carthy and Eduard Schwartz already saw that a dating clause of AD 689, occurring twice in the Munich Computus in the context of materials associated with the Victorian reckoning for the date of Easter, points to the existence of an Irish computus from AD 689 advocating the Victorian system.[41] Because of its association with Victorian reckoning, this now lost computus probably originated from east Munster where that system was observed – as opposed to the 84-year system observed in the northern parts of the island – and material from this Victorian computus was incorporated into the Munich Computus.[42] It should be noted that there is a reference to 'Isidore' in Section 63 of the Munich Computus, one of the sections taken from the Victorian AD 689 computus: 'Ysidorus ait:

[40] With the newly discovered evidence that Victorian reckoning was still current in southern Ireland in 699 (Warntjes, 'A Newly Discovered Prologue', p. 278), Warntjes refined his earlier estimate of 689-719 for the composition of the Computus Einsidlensis (The Munich Computus, p. CC).

Quicumque ante XV luna pascha celebrari iubet, transgreditur mandatum' – 'Isidore says: Whosoever approves of Easter being celebrated before luna 15 violates the commandment'. This statement is consistent with Isidore's view that those who celebrate Easter on luna 14 are heretical, as expressed in De ecclesiasticis officiis I.xxxii (xxxi).(8)[43] and Etymologiae VIII.61,[44] so that it could be a paraphrase, but it does not occur as such in the edited works of Isidore of Seville. De ratione conputandi 98.21-22 follows the Munich Computus in making this same attribution.[45] This putative borrowing from the lost AD 689 Irish computus suggests that at least the name of Isidore of Seville was well-known in Ireland by AD 689, and probably also his works relating to the Easter question, though one cannot rule out the possibility that the reference was simply to an Irishman named Isidore.

The Manuscript Transmission of Isidorian Texts

Recent studies of the extant manuscripts of Isidore's works show that:

1. Some of Isidore's works either remained in Spain or had very limited circulation until the eighth century, as already noted by Hillgarth.[46] These include: De haeresibus (only one manuscript, Spain, saec. VII), De fide catholica contra Iudaeos, Regula monachorum, De uiris illustribus, Historia Gothorum.
2. Most of Isidore's works circulated in two versions, if not more. De ecclesiasticis officiis and the S*ententiae* are exceptional in this regard.[47]
3. There is very little seventh century manuscript evidence for Isidore's works, but it is increasingly clear that Lindsay's edition of the Etymologiae as well as the texts of the Arévalo edition in PL 83 are not reliable representations of Isidore's works as they were transmitted in this early period.

In 1991, James P. Carley and Ann Dooley published their discovery on the flyleaves of the codex Longleat House, Marquess of Bath, NMR 10589, of a late-seventh or very-early-eighth century fragment of the Etymologies which was almost certainly written in Ireland. The fragment contains text from

Book VI:16 and Book VII:1 and deals with computistical matters, including a copy of Isidore's 95-year Easter table. The inclusion of Spanish era dating (in addition to anno mundi dating) points towards an original text dating from AD 655 which was written in Spain, but there is no way of knowing the number of intermediate copies. This newly discovered fragment is consistent with the interest in Isidore's views on computistical matters which we observed among Irish scholars at the end of the seventh century. The leaves forming the fragment probably originated from a 'volume measuring a little in excess of 315 x 240 mm.' (p. 137), though 'it is impossible to determine whether or not this fragment was originally part of a complete copy of the Etymologiae'.[48]

Until the discovery of the Longleat fragments, the fragments of Book XI in Sankt Gallen, Stiftsbibliothek 1399a.1 (CLA VII.995) were the only known seventh-century manuscript evidence for the Etymologiae, as jumps out immediately from the table drawn up by Baudoin Van den Abeele to show the number for each century of both fragments and manuscripts containing the entire text of the Etymologiae.[49] The fragments were preserved as part of the binding of Manuscripts 150 and 267 in the St Gall Stiftsbibliothek. Dold, who first reported on these fragments in 1940, believed they were part of a substantial codex and estimated that the folios would have measured some 277 x 165 mm. Lowe estimated the written area to have measured ca. 170 x ca. 145 mm. (CLA VII.995). If Book XI was indeed part of a full text of the Etymologiae in the codex, the manuscript contained a text of the twenty-book 'long version'. The division into twenty books originated from Braulio's editing, but we have no way of knowing how he divided the content within and between the books.[50] Moreover, the codex might have contained only half of this version of the Etymologiae, that is, Books XI-XX, since the long text could be transmitted in two separate codices. There is general agreement that the text in these fragments was written in an Irish hand – called cursive minuscule by Lowe, and cursive half-uncial by Brown[51] – towards the middle of the seventh century, but the question remains whether it originated in Ireland itself or in an Irish-influenced centre on the continent. When commenting on the 1955 revised version of Dold's announcement,[52] Hillgarth said that the fragments were 'probably' written in Ireland itself.[53] Lowe, on the other hand, opted for a continental Irish centre, probably Bobbio. Bischoff, in a 1960 private communication to Hillgarth,[54] noted that the script in the St Gall fragments is close to that of codex Usserianus Primus (Dublin, Trinity College 55), which Lowe and Bischoff dated to the beginning of the seventh century, as well as to the script on the Springmount wax tablets (Dublin, National Museum, S.A. 1914:2; CLA Supplement 1684) first published in 1920 by Armstrong and Macalister,[55] and dated by Bischoff to the seventh century.[56] In his study of the Irish elements in Insular script, Brown assigns the St Gall fragments to a scribe writing in Ireland in the middle of the seventh century.[57] It is worth noting here that both the Longleat fragmentary text and the text in the seventh-century fragments in St Gall may be related to the version of the Etymologiae in the manuscript Leiden, Bibliotheek der Rijksuniversiteit, Voss. Lat. F.74.[58]

Van den Abeele derived his information from the manuscript list drawn up by Fernández Catón in 1966, itself a published version of the Anspach Nachlass. Note: Catón lists some 1,000 manuscripts (including fragments) and this high number recurs frequently thereafter in the secondary literature, but Van den Abeele points out that this information needs to be carefully double-checked. He sees only some 500 serious contenders from the eighth to the sixteenth century for relaying the text of the Etymologiae (La tradition manuscrite, p. 198).

In my 1987 study on the lack of evidence until the late seventh century for cosmological information drawn from Isidore's works, I pointed out that while the St Gall fragment was probably written in Ireland, 'all this really proves is that the beginning of Book XI: De Homine et Portentis (Of man and unnatural births; edited by Gasti in 2010) was almost certainly read and copied in Ireland by the middle of the seventh century'.[59] It is well known that sections of the Etymologiae, sometimes corresponding to one or more of the libri in the long recension of that work, were transmitted separately. Books I (grammar), I-III (liberal arts), IV (medicine), the Chronicon and the legal matter in Book V, and the sections on heresy in Book VIII, are usually mentioned in this connection. In addition, Books I-XX were often copied in two separate codices, with the break after Book X, so that the two main parts could circulate independently. It should be noted, however, that when Díaz y Díaz, in his 1982 introduction to the Latin/Spanish text of the Etymologiae based on Lindsay's edition, talks about sections of the Etymologiae that commonly circulated separately, he does not mention Book XI among them.[60] The anatomical lists in the lorica/prayer Suffragare Trinitatis Unitas[61] composed by Lathcen of Clonfertmuloe (d. 661), and in the exorcism Collectio super hominem qui habet Diabolum[62] in the Antiphonary of Bangor – a late-seventh-century collection of liturgical texts – argue for the presence in Ireland of Book XI or of glossaries derived from that text at the time the lists were composed. It is, however, also likely that detailed terminology associated with parts of the body was drawn from lists of words intended to increase familiarity with the Latin language.[63] I have shown elsewhere that such lists would explain the often bizarre use of cosmological terms in the Hisperica Famina.[64] After all, Isidore himself used glossaries when writing: those of Placidus and Nonius Marcellus, for instance.[65] Referring to the 'detailed anatomical enumerations' in the two Irish texts, Patrick Sims-Williams observed: 'Many similarities in wording and order result from the subject-matter; nevertheless they are sufficient to show that the exorcism probably derives from the same glossary-steeped milieu in seventh-century Ireland as Laidcenn's lorica'.[66]

As Herren noted, Etymologiae XI.1 (or glossaries compiled from it) do not account for some 35 of the 120+ of the terms in the extensive anatomical list in the lorica, so there must have been other sources. He created a very useful table of corresponding terms in the lorica and in the Etymologiae as found in the Lindsay edition.[67] Patrick Sims-Williams made a similar table showing the anatomical terminology common to Etymologiae XI.1, the Bangor exorcism and the Lathcen lorica.[68] Only two ninth-century manuscripts of Differentiae II (Paris, BN lat. 12236 and BN lat 12237) omit the lengthy section on the parts of the human body (CCSL 111A: 125* and 127*)[69] so that it is almost certain that this section, which is heavily dependent on Lactantius' De opificio Dei, was included in the early version(s) of the text that travelled to Ireland. If the much more limited (less than 30 items) and superficial list of the parts of the body in the Bangor exorcism is not simply drawn from memory or from some elementary word-list, it could well have been derived from section XVII of Isidore's Differentiae II (CCSL 111A: 34-48; PL 83: 69-98) since only two items cannot be accounted for in that way.

In manuscripts, Differentiae II with incipit Inter Deum[70] is sometimes called simply Differentiae, or Liber differentiarum or Differentiae spirituales, and the recent editor believes it was composed c. 600 and no later than 610.[71] It circulated at first independently from what is now known as Differentiae I, and was consistently attributed to Isidore in the numerous extant early manuscript witnesses.[72] Maria Adelaida Andrés was aware of 26 manuscripts dated from the eighth to the tenth century[73]! In the Liber de ordine creaturarum (DOC)[74] composed in Ireland between 655 and c. 680,[75] all references to Isidore's Differentiae are in fact to Book II of the Differentiae.[76] In particular, DOC VIII: Concerning the devil and the nature of demons relies heavily (though not exclusively) on Sections XIV-XV of Differentiae II (CCSL 111A: 28-32; PL 83:76-77). Comparing De ordine creaturarum VIII.16 and Differentiae II.14.42 (CCSL 111A: 29) we note that there is no reference to the rationality of demons in De ordine creaturarum.[77] Since this detail is also lacking in a number of manuscripts of Isidore's text, it should be possible to narrow down the type of manuscript available in Ireland when De ordine creaturarum was composed.

Two fragments of a codex containing Differentiae II are now in *Milan, Bibliotheca Ambrosiana,D. 23 sup, and were formerly used as fly-leaves to the Bobbio Orosius (Milan, Bibliotheca Ambrosiana, D. 23 sup). They are probably from the same quire and encompass sections XXXVII.146-XL.167; PL 83:93-97 (that is, XXXV.146-XLI.167; CCSL 111A: 94-110).[78] The script is 'Irish majuscule, saec. VIII' and the fragments originated 'probably from Ireland' according to Lowe (CLA II, 329), and are even 'charakteristisch echt irisch' according to Bischoff,[79] not only on account of the script but because of the thick vellum on which the text is written. These fragments would thus confirm that Differentiae II was available in Ireland by the eighth century. This tells us nothing, however, about the availability of Differentiae I in Ireland at that time, since the manuscript evidence points to the late eighth century for the first occurrences of both texts in the same manuscript (Paris, BN lat. 2994A and Montpellier, ÉM 306) – and even then, they are not placed next to one another as parts of the same treatise.[80] We cannot therefore infer from the influence of Differentiae II on DOC, a text written in Ireland sometime between 655 and c. 680, that Differentiae I was available in Ireland at that time – whether in its probably original Inter caelum form organized by subject matter or in the alphabetized form with incipit Inter aptum.[81] It is possible that Differentiae I reached Ireland independently, but I am not aware of any evidence for an early arrival.

Another Isidorian text was used by the anonymous author of De ordine creaturarum: the De ecclesiasticis officiis. Díaz y Díaz had noticed that the four-fold division of souls described in the Moralia of Gregory the Great (CCSL 143B: 1304-06) did not explain the full scheme of the fate of individuals after death as presented in the Hiberno-Latin treatise. De ordine creaturarum XIV.6 states: 'The Lord himself does not deny that some sins shall be forgiven in the world to come, when he says: "He that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost shall never have forgiveness, neither in this world nor in the world to come, but shall be guilty of everlasting sin" [Mark 3:29 with 'neither in this world nor in the world to come' added from Matt 12:32]. This implies that there are some sins which, though not forgiven in this world, can nonetheless be wiped out by fire in the judgment to come. Were this not the case, the Lord would never have made this distinction'.[82] Díaz y Díaz suggested two possible sources: Gregory's Dialogues IV.40-41 or Isidore's De ecclesiasticis officiis I.xvi.12 – but was hesitant to accept either one since this would be the only time the source was used by the Irish author and there was no evidence that these texts were available in Ireland at that time. However, since the anonymous Irish author endorsed the idea that really bad people are eternally damned and really good people enter eternal blessedness immediately at death, and the others must wait till the last judgment to have their ultimate destiny determined, he does not allow for any kind of intermediary stage of cleansing punishment, that is, for what came to be called Purgatory.[83] By the time Pope Gregory I wrote Book IV of the Dialogues, he was advocating the notion of that very type of cleansing process taking place before the last judgment, so that it is most unlikely that the Irish author had read Dialogues IV.41.3, for instance. As for De ecclesiasticis officiis I.12, it is much more vague as to the time or location of the purgatorial fire and even includes a citation from Matt 12:32: 'For when the Lord says: "whoever speaks against the Holy Spirit will not be forgiven, either in this age or the age to come" [Matt 12:32], he makes clear that for some their sins will be forgiven there and cleansed by some purgatorial fire' (my translation).[84] Recent studies on the Canones Hibernenses (for which the earliest extant manuscripts are from the middle of the eighth century and from the continent) posit an Irish proto-version from between AD 669 (arrival in England of Theodore of Canterbury – the latest source) and AD 700. The 2011 edition by Roy Flechner[85] and the tables created by Davies[86] of Isidorian borrowings in the two recensions *Hib.*A and *Hib.*B of the Canones Hibernenses indicate that the proto-version of that text – compiled in Ireland and from which the two recensions appear to have derived independently[87] – must have made numerous borrowings from Isidore's De ecclesiasticis officiis, especially in matters relating to church hierarchy and liturgy. It therefore seems safe to assume that De ecclesiasticis officiis was available in Ireland by the end of the third quarter of the seventh century. There is strong evidence, however, that this was not the complete text since a letter of uncertain date from one Colman to his colleague Feredach (Brussels, Bibliothèque Royale Albert Ier, Ms. 5649-67) states that 'our manuscripts' – presumably manuscripts available in Ireland – contain two serious gaps. Christopher Lawson has identified a group of manuscripts of De ecclesiasticis officiis which 'suffer two considerable lacunae which were caused in the subarchetype by the loss of bifolia'.[88] Were Colman and Lawson noticing the same gaps?

It is well-known that already during the lifetime of Isidore, his friend Braulio was complaining of the circulation of faulty, incomplete copies of the Etymologiae. Braulio himself had no qualms reorganizing the text Isidore finally sent him. It is likely that Isidore originally composed only the content of the first ten books (possibly even without Book IV), and that this spread rapidly, with or without his consent.[89] After Braulio divided the longer text Isidore sent him later into twenty books, that version also underwent numerous types of alterations in different environments.[90] It follows that regarding the Etymologiae even more so than for other works by Isidore, the following questions should be investigated as much as possible for any medieval citation to that text: Which version was being used? How much of the text was available to the author using it? Did Isidore write it?

The late seventh-century Commentary on Genesis in Clm 17739 refers many times to Isidore, or to several of his works: Sententiae, De natura rerum, Etymologiae, and perhaps Allegoriae.[91] When Adomnán wrote his De locis sanctis in AD 680-690, he had access to both a version of the Etymologiae and the long version of De natura rerum.[92] The two recensions of the Canones Hibernenses contain citations from other works by Isidore: Etymologiae, Sententiae, Quaestiones in uetus testamentum, and the Chronica. While a number of these citations would have been added later and on the continent, it now seems likely that at least the Sententiae and some version(s) of the Etymologiae were used in the proto-version since they were available in Ireland during the late seventh-century, as we have just seen. We have also seen above that computistical material from that period presents Isidore as one of the authorities on the subject, citing from the Etymologiae and De natura rerum.

There is no doubt that several works of Isidore, including at least one version of the Etymologiae, were available in Ireland in the later part of the seventh century – whether transmitted directly from Spain, or part 'of wider patterns of insular cross-cultural connections during the late seventh and early eighth century'.[93] While investigating which recension is involved – or even which manuscript – remains a conjectural process even for this later period, certainty about even the availability of an Isidorian text, let alone a complete text as written by Isidore, is elusive for the earlier period. In general, I hope this study shows that given the alterations to the original text made already in the medieval period and of which later scholars may not have been aware, we should not take anything for granted, so that conclusions based on earlier editions need to be revisited.

7 Isidore of Seville in Anglo-Saxon England

The Synonyma as a Source of Felix's Vita S. Guthlaci[1]

Claudia Di Sciacca

Recent scholarship has demonstrated that Isidore was, together with Augustine, Jerome, and Gregory, one of the four major patristic authorities for the Anglo-Saxons, and his Etymologiae, De natura rerum, Synonyma, and De ecclesiasticis officiis belonged to the 'small core of staple patristic texts' housed in a typical Anglo-Saxon library.[2] Isidore undoubtedly proved an influential source for a variety of fields of Anglo-Saxon literary culture, ranging from grammar to computus, from history to homiletics and hagiography, from exegesis to charters.[3]

This chapter focuses on the Synonyma[4] and investigates, in particular, their role as a source for one of the founding and most popular Anglo-Saxon hagiographies, the Vita Sancti Guthlaci (henceforth VSG), authored by the elusive Felix in the first half of the eighth century.[5] The Synonyma have not been enlisted among the rich network of source texts underlying Felix's work until very recently.[6] The case study in this chapter will hopefully contribute valuable insights into the early dissemination of the Synonyma in Anglo-Saxon England and enhance our understanding of the subtle 'source-layering' which can be considered Felix's most distinctive compositional technique.[7]

The Synonyma

Generally grouped with Isidore's minor and juvenile works, the Synonyma enjoyed an 'immense' popularity and were the third most copied work by Isidore after the Etymologiae and the Sententiae.[8] Alternatively classified as a grammatical, ascetic, and dogmatic text, the Synonyma resist any clear-cut categorisation.[9] They consist of two books, one decidedly different from the other as to theme, tone, and sources employed. The first contains an effusive and pathetic lamentation (lamentum paenitentiae) expressed by a sinful man overwhelmed by guilt and despairing of redemption, while in the second book Reason draws a very detailed norma uiuendi for the penitent, consisting of pragmatic prescriptions and precepts to pursue a virtuous lifestyle and resist temptations. The penitential lament and hortatory consolation are distinctively combined with a most idiosyncratic style, the so-called stilus ysydorianus, a rhymed, rhythmical prose making pervasive use of synonymical variation and paraphrase, which was to become one of the four major kinds of Latin Kunstprosa in the Middle Ages.[10] It was this characteristic blend of eloquium and uotum, to put it in Isidore's own words,[11] that secured the Synonyma an exceptionally vast and enduring popularity throughout the Middle Ages in the Latin West, firstly as a spiritual primer and, secondarily, as a grammatical handbook.[12]

The editor of the recent critical edition of the Synonyma has identified two recensions, Λ and Φ, which apparently stemmed from the independent revision of two parallel versions of a primitive text carried out by Isidore himself. Contaminations of the two recensions started as early as the first half of the eighth century and are so numerous and extensive that they represent the most distinctive and recurrent feature of the manuscript tradition of the Synonyma.[13] As has been shown, both recensions circulated in Anglo-Saxon England, itself a symptom of the variety and complexity of the Anglo-Saxon reception of this Isidorian text.[14]

Isidore and the Synonyma in Anglo-Saxon England

Knowledge of Isidore's texts in Anglo-Saxon England was both early and plentiful. The first testimonies can be dated to the renowned Canterbury school of Archbishop Theodore (d. 690) and Abbot Hadrian (d. 709 or 710),[15] and to the 'first Englishman of letters', Aldhelm (c. 640?-709 or 710), himself a student of Theodore and Hadrian and eventually abbot of Malmesbury and bishop of Sherborne.[16] From the evidence afforded by the two major witnesses to the syllabus of the Canterbury school, namely the Canterbury Biblical Commentaries and the Leiden family of glosses, as well as by Aldhelm's corpus, it can be inferred that by the beginning of the eighth century at least the Etymologiae, De natura rerum, Synonyma, De ecclesiasticis officiis, De ortu et obitu patrum, De differentiis uerborum, and the dubious Liber numerorum were known to the Anglo-Saxons.[17] In particular, the literary and manuscript evidence shows that the De natura rerum, the Etymologiae, and the Synonyma were the first Isidorian works that reached Anglo-Saxon England and the most abundantly attested in Anglo-Saxon centres, both insular and continental.[18]

Anglo-Saxon England was particularly receptive to the Synonyma. Anglo-Saxon libraries, whether in England or on the continent, were well stocked with copies of the Synonyma: no fewer than eight manuscript witnesses were written or circulating in pre-Norman times and another six codices are associated with Anglo-Saxon foundations on the continent.[19] Also, another copy of the Synonyma is recorded in the list of books sent by Æthelwold, bishop of Winchester (d. 984), to the monastery of Medeshamstede c. 970.[20]

As mentioned above, both recensions of the Synonyma are attested in Anglo-Saxon England. Indeed, the earliest witnesses of both Λ and Φ are either of definite Anglo-Saxon origin or have strong Anglo-Saxon connections. Two Southumbrian codices of the first half of the eighth century, St Petersburg, Russian National Library, Q. v. I. 15,[21] and Würzburg, Universitätsbibliothek, M. p. th. f. 79,[22] first attest to the Λ recension, while one of the earliest witnesses of the Φ recension is Fulda, Domschatz, Bonifatianus 2,[23] an eighth-century continental manuscript with 'insular symptoms'[24] and links to Boniface (c. 675-754),[25] the renowned Anglo-Saxon missionary and, together with Aldhelm and Felix, one of the earliest named readers of the Synonyma in pre-Conquest England.[26] Furthermore, source-studies of both the Old English and the Anglo-Latin corpus have shown the variety of uses the Anglo-Saxons made of the Synonyma, ranging from the homiletic to the devotional and the didactic, and it can be concluded that the Synonyma were 'the Isidorian text most abundantly attested in pre-Conquest England after the Etymologiae'.[27]

It has been argued that the Anglo-Saxon reception of the Synonyma was idiosyncratic in that, while most of Isidore's other works would have reached both South- and Northumbrian England chiefly thanks to Irish transmission,[28] the Synonyma would have arrived in Southumbria via France and their influence would have been concentrated in south-west

[27] Di Sciacca, Finding the Right Words, p. 54.

[28] The routes of transmission of Isidore's texts from Visigothic Spain to the British Isles and the role of the Irish in it are two vexed and still largely unresolved questions; for a summary of the scholarly debate, see Di Sciacca, Finding the Right Words, pp. 37-47 and 55-68.

Mercia and Wessex.[29] In fact, manuscript evidence indicates two major routes of transmission of the Synonyma, an insular and a French one, the former pertaining to recension Λ and the latter to recension Φ, respectively.[30] However, the insular and continental paths of dissemination can hardly be kept discrete.[31] If Λ has got an unquestionably insular trademark – six out of the nine Λ-witnesses collated by Elfassi originated either in Anglo-Saxon England or on an insular centre on the continent, and the Λ-text of the Synonyma was likely the one first known in both England and Ireland[32] – the evidence concerning its actual route from Visigothic Spain to Anglo-Saxon England is inconclusive. In particular, although the manuscript evidence suggests that recension Λ reached England directly from Spain, a dissemination across the English Channel via France cannot be excluded.[33]

In sum, the transmission of the two recensions of the Synonyma as envisaged by their modern editor as well as the frequency of contaminations and interpolations between Λ and Φ suggests that the dissemination of the Isidorian text to the British Isles was probably the result of more than one route or one group of mediators, as the scope of the cultural contacts and exchanges that linked Spain, France, Anglo-Saxon England, Ireland, Italy, and Germany was wider and more complex than it has often been acknowledged.[34]

Although the Synonyma seem to have been less influential than other Isidorian texts in Ireland,[35] still it should be reminded that they feature among the sources of the Collectio Canonum Hibernensis (c. 725). Also, the most distinctive product of seventh-century Irish Latinity, the Hisperica Famina, betrays the stylistic influence of the Synonyma, as well as of the contemporary Spanish Reimprosa more generally.[36]

Furthermore, the diffusion of the Synonyma within Irish circles is indirectly attested by two miscellaneous continental manuscripts, Munich,

Bayerische Staatsbibliothek, Clm 6433,[37] and St Gall, Stiftsbibliothek 908.[38] The former is a codex written at Freising in the second half of the eighth century and is the only surviving witness of the Florilegium frisingense, a veritable compendium of distinctively Irish exegetical, theological, and homiletic literature which draws extensively on both authentic and pseudoepigraphical Isidorian texts, including the Synonyma.[39] The Florilegium frisingense is anonymous but was possibly compiled by the scribe of the Munich manuscript, namely the Northumbrian-trained Anglo-Saxon scribe Peregrinus,[40] a circumstance which, incidentally, would challenge the argument that the early circulation of the Synonyma in Anglo-Saxon England was confined to Southumbria. Also, the Frisingense is immediately followed in the manuscript by the second book of the Synonyma and by the Liber scintillarum,[41] one of the most popular biblical and patristic florilegia of the early Middle Ages, especially widespread in Anglo-Saxon England,[42] and also heavily indebted to the Isidorian text.[43] In sum, both the textual and codicological evidence suggests that the Munich miscellany was put together in a milieu thoroughly au fait with and appreciative of the Synonyma. The fact that the Frisingense was composed in an insular foundation on the continent is a welcome reminder that 'continental' and 'insular' should not necessarily be read as mutually exclusive terms, since insular agents of transmission were active also on the continent, and insular foundations on the continent, such as Bobbio, were undoubtedly centres where Isidore's texts were well known and zealously copied from very early on. The St Gall codex 908 is another case in point: written 'in a centre of insular cultural influence', probably in the Milan area or Bobbio, it contains three excerpts from the Synonyma and one from Isidore's Sententiae alongside the only copy of the Commentary on the Creation and Fall – the fourth item in Bischoff's (in)famous catalogue of Hiberno-Latin Biblical commentaries and itself indebted to Isidorian sources – as well as a number of texts of apocryphal content which were distinctively popular with the Irish.[44]

The Synonyma as a Hagiographic Source

Both manuscript- and source-studies have shown that throughout the Middle Ages the Synonyma were increasingly perceived as a moral treatise. In particular, it has been argued that they proved especially popular with authors of moral florilegia, prayers, and devotional texts, homilies and hagiographies, as well as canonical collections.[45] As regards hagiographic literature in particular, the Synonyma have been identified as a source (albeit often an indirect one) of at least eight continental saints' lives up to the beginning of the thirteenth century,[46] and they are associated with hagiographic texts in no fewer than five manuscripts collated for the modern critical edition of the Synonyma.[47]

Of these five codices, one, that is Munich, Staatsbibliothek, Clm 15817,[48] is particularly relevant, because here the Synonyma follow the earliest (if incomplete) surviving copy of the Vita S. Cuthberti, written by an anonymous monk (or perhaps, monks) of the Lindisfarne community c. 699-705.[49] This manuscript has been dated to Archbishop Aldaram of Salzburg's period of office (821-836), but it probably derives from an early exemplar in insular script, whose distinctively Northumbrian spellings were largely preserved by the conservative, if often careless, scribe of the Munich manuscript.[50] Another hint supporting the insular origin of this manuscript is the fact that the copy of the Synonyma it contains belongs to the Λ recension, which, as has been mentioned above, had a predominantly insular circulation. Also, although the circumstances of the arrival of the anonymous Vita S. Cuthberti in Salzburg by the early ninth century are still obscure, a possible context for it and perhaps also for the association of the Anglo-Saxon hermit-saint's life with the Synonyma might be provided by Virgilius, the erudite Irish bishop of Salzburg in the second half of the eighth century (d. 784). During Virgilius's episcopate at least two popular Isidorian pseudo-epigrapha, the Liber de numeris and De ortu et obitu patriarcharum, were compiled. Another text that can be associated with Virgilius's entourage is the question-and-answer dialogue Prebiarum de multorium exemplaribus, which draws on at least three of Isidore's texts, the Etymologiae, De ecclesiasticis officiis, and Sententiae, and on the pseudepigraphical Liber de numeris.[51]

To my knowledge the only Anglo-Saxon saint's life where the Synonyma have been drawn on is the VSG and, thereby, the two derivative Old English prose texts, the so-called Vespasian Life and Vercelli Homily xxiii. The following pages will analyse the borrowing from the Synonyma in the VSG, identify the possible antecedent consulted by Felix, and map out the context in which such a borrowing could have taken place.

Felix and the Vita S. Guthlaci

A generation younger than the Northumbrian Cuthbert, Guthlac is the second earliest and most popular Anglo-Saxon hermit saint. The VSG provides a comprehensive account of Guthlac's life, from his youth as a successful warlord of aristocratic descent, to his conversion and tonsure at the monastery of Repton, Derbyshire,[52] and, finally, to his withdrawal to Crowland, a small island (in fact, a promontory linked to the mainland by a gravel ridge), haunted by demons on the fenland marking the border between the Mercian and East Anglian kingdoms, where he spent the last fifteen years of his life as an anchorite.[53] Guthlac soon attracted attention from the most prominent ranks of society: his visitors included Hædda, bishop of Lichfield (d. 716-727), who ordained Guthlac as priest, and Æthelbald (716-757), future king of the Mercians. His rapidly growing popularity and saintly reputation was commemorated and reinforced by the highly-literary Latin uita by Felix.[54]

Over time, a vernacular tradition developed and lasted throughout the Anglo-Saxon period and beyond the Norman Conquest.[55] Though Guthlac – somewhat surprisingly – found no place in the two major Anglo-Saxon sanctoralia, those of Bede and of Ælfric, respectively,[56] he is one of the few native saints to be added to the originally continental collection of the so-called Corpus-Cotton Legendary, the major hagiographic collection circulating in late Anglo-Saxon England and the chief source of Ælfric's sanctorale.[57] But more importantly, Guthlac is the Anglo-Saxon saint most celebrated in Old English and the only one commemorated in vernacular poetry. There are five major pre-Conquest vernacular texts on St Guthlac:

1. Anonymous, Old English Martyrology (prose; s. ix^{2}; The Old English Martyrology, ed. and trans. by Rauer, pp. 80-81 and 252)
2. Anonymous, Vespasian Life (prose; s. ix^{ex}-x^{in}; Das angelsächsische Prosa-Leben, ed. by Gonser, pp. 100-173)
3. Anonymous, Vercelli Homily xxiii (prose; before c. 975; The Vercelli Homilies, ed. by Scragg, pp. 383-392; corresponds to Felix's VSG, chpts. xxviii-xxxiv)
4. Anonymous, Guthlac A (verse; uncertain dating; The Guthlac Poems, ed. by Roberts, pp. 83-107; corresponds to Felix's VSG, chpts. xxviii-xxxii)
5. Anonymous, Guthlac B (verse; uncertain dating; The Guthlac Poems, ed. by Roberts, pp. 108-124; corresponds to Felix's VSG, chpt. l)

While the relationship between the vernacular texts and the Latin life is not always unequivocal (especially in the case of the entry in the Old English Martyrology and the poem Guthlac A),[58] the VSG represents the cornerstone of this vast and enduring hagiographic tradition. Unfortunately, we are in the dark as to the exact circumstances of its composition. Felix's dedication of the VSG to Ælfwald, king of the East Angles (c. 713-749),[59] and his use of Bede's prose Vita S. Cuthberti (c. 721)[60] as a source provide a fairly definite chronological range for the text. Otherwise, the details of Felix's life and schooling and of the place where he composed the VSG are unknown. Even his nationality is uncertain and he may not even have been Anglo-Saxon,[61] although he must have spent at least a substantial portion of his life in England, presumably in East Anglia, since in the prologue to the VSG, Felix addresses the East Anglian King Ælfwald as dominus meus and later on refers to King Aldwulf without mentioning that he was king of the East Angles.[62] Ælfwald is an equally elusive figure.[63] According to the VSG (chpts. xlviiii and l), Ælfwald's sister, Ecgburh, an abbess, was in touch with Guthlac, and this family connection with the saint may have been at the origin of Ælfwald's commission to Felix[64]. More relevant for the purposes of this study, however, is that the king can be counted in among Boniface's correspondents, since Ælfwald addressed a letter to the missionary in the late 740s promising prayers from the seven monasteries in his kingdom.[65]

[54] The VSG is attested in thirteen manuscripts in total, of which nine were written or owned in England up to c. 1100: see Gneuss, Handlist, nos. 88, 103, 215, 344, 434.5, 456, 484, 781, and 804.

[56] Bede's knowledge of Mercia has been defined as 'patchy': Roberts, Guthlac of Crowland, p. 7. As to Ælfric, his reliance on Bede as a favoured source for Anglo-Saxon saints is probably the reason behind his omission of Guthlac: see Di Sciacca, '"concupita, quaesita, ac petita solitudinis secreta"', pp. 174-175.

It is possible that Felix was a monk at one of these seven East Anglian foundations. Otherwise, the only evidence concerning Felix and his environs is that provided by the VSG itself. In spite of its heavy debt to previous saints' lives and the author's frequent concessions to hagiographic topoi, the VSG reveals a closeness to the events related and the characters portrayed.[66]

[64] VSG, chpt. xlviii: Felix's Life of Saint Guthlac, ed. and trans. by Colgrave, pp. 146-149 and 191. According to the twelfth-century Liber Eliensis, Ecgburh was abbess of Repton, Guthlac's own motherhouse, but this is 'probably pure guess-work': Meaney, 'Felix's Life of St Guthlac: Hagiography and/or Truth', pp. 30-31; cf. The Guthlac Poems, ed. by Roberts, p. 5; Roberts, 'Guthlac A', p. 70.

[66] Meaney, 'Felix's Life of St Guthlac: Hagiography and/or Truth', p. 30.

Hence the impulse to connect Felix with the very same foundations to which Guthlac himself had been attached. In fact, the VSG mentions only one monastery, namely Repton, the double house in Derbyshire where Guthlac received his (Petrine) tonsure and from where he set off for the fens after two years of monastic training. What is more, Repton was associated with the Mercian royal house and Æthelbald (d. 757), king of Mercia in Felix's lifetime and a devotee of St Guthlac, was buried there.[67] From the account of Guthlac's eremitic life in Crowland, however, it is clear that the saint must have relied on the logistic support of a neighbouring foundation, which is never named by Felix. According to Meaney, the most likely candidate for the role of Guthlac's base was Medeshamstede (Peterborough today), a monastery only about seven miles south of Crowland and one of the most influential and thriving foundations in the area at the time.[68]

Why Felix should have kept quiet about Medeshamstede's putative role as Guthlac's logistic base is a matter of speculation,[69] as is the question of whether Felix himself could have been a member of either Repton or Medeshamstede. What seems certain is that he cannot have been a monk of Crowland, since it is unlikely that the local abbey predates the tenth-century Benedictine reform movement.[70] Thus, all that can be concluded at this stage is that Felix must have been active in a Southumbrian, presumably East Anglian, centre endowed with a library of remarkable size.[71] Indeed, the wide range of sources and their subtle integration and layering as well as the ornate, flamboyant Latin displayed by Felix reveal that he was a well-read, sophisticated author who must have benefited from a high standard of Latin training and access to a well-stocked library.[72] In particular, Felix seems to have been thoroughly conversant with and heavily influenced by Aldhelm,[73] who, notably, is also the earliest literary witness to the circulation of the Synonyma in Anglo-Saxon England.

The Synonyma as a Source of the Vita S. Guthlaci

The borrowing from the Synonyma occurs in one of the central chapters of the VSG, that is in a section of the life which recounts the early stages of Guthlac's anachoresis and his strenuous fights with the evil spirits infesting the barrow he had chosen as his hermitage. In particular, the chapter in question tells how two devils in human form suddenly materialise in front of Guthlac while the saint is meditating and deceptively try to tempt him to fast to excess by admonishing him about the examples set by the illustrious hermits of the past – Christ himself, Moses, Elijah, and the Egyptian monks – who had all excelled in their abstinence.[74] The quote from the Synonyma is embedded within the lengthy address by the two demons and reads:[75]

> Quanto enim in hoc saeculo frangeris, tanto in perpetuum solidaris: et quanto in praesenti adfligeris, tanto in futuro gaudebis.
> ('For insofar as you are broken down in this world, you shall be made whole and firm in eternity; and to the degree that you are afflicted in this present life, so much shall you rejoice in the future'.)

The principle that the more one suffers in this life the more one will rejoice in eternity can be considered a commonplace tenet of Christian ethics. However, a comparison with the Synonyma (i. 28) shows a verbatim debt to Isidore, in that Felix's phrasing and wording are basically identical with the source-text:[76]

> Quanto enim in hoc saeculo frangimur, tanto in perpetuum solidamur; quanto in praesenti adfligimur, tanto in futuro gaudebimus.
> ('For insofar as we are broken down in this world, we shall be made whole and firm in the eternal world; to the degree that we are afflicted in this present life, so much shall we rejoice in the future'.)

[74] On the psychological or physical nature of such demonic apparitions, see Meaney, 'Felix's Life of St Guthlac: Hagiography and/or Truth', pp. 36-40; Vos, 'Demons Without and Within'; Almond, The Devil, pp. 111-117 and 206-216.

The only notable discrepancy is that, while in the Synonyma the verbs are in the first person plural, in the VSG they are in the second person singular, which can be explained by the dialogical context of Felix's text.[77]

The quote from the Synonyma is a brief extract from a longer passage uttered by Reason and devoted to the principle of inverse proportion ruling the destiny in the afterlife (Synonyma i. 27-30). In view of the concision of the borrowing, on the one hand, and of the frequency with which the Synonyma were abstracted and epitomised throughout the Middle Ages, on the other, it could be expected that Felix had known the Isidorian sentence second-hand and picked it from a florilegium or a devotional collection. Indeed, the sentence in question occurs in the Liber scintillarum (chpt. i. 29):[78]

> Quantum enim in hoc saeculo frangimur, tantum in perpetuo solidamur. Quantum hic in presente adfligimur, tantum in futuro gaudebimus.
> ('For insofar as we are broken down in this world, we shall be made whole and firm in the eternal world; to the degree that we are afflicted here in the present, so much shall we rejoice in the future'.)

This passage from the Liber scintillarum has been classified as Felix's direct source in the Fontes Anglo-Saxonici database,[79] while more recently Bremmer has argued that it is not possible to determine whether the VSG draws directly on Isidore or on Defensor's excerpt.[80]

What is certain, however, is that Felix and Defensor ultimately relied on two different recensions of the Synonyma, at least as far as the quote in question is concerned. This sentence features in both Λ and Φ, but while the VSG shares four distinctive readings with the Λ recension, namely *quanto (x2) and *tanto (x2), Defensor's text as we know it from Rochais' edition features the corresponding Φ-readings, namely *quantum and *tantum; also,

[77] The passage from the Synonyma was eventually translated into Old English in both the Vespasian Life and Vercelli Homily xxiii, while it has no counterpart in Guthlac A and B: see Di Sciacca, Finding the Right Words, pp. 99-103.

Defensor adds the adverb hic in the phrase hic in presente which is not recorded in any of the witnesses collated by Elfassi.[81]

This circumstance is consistent with the general picture of the Anglo-Saxon manuscript tradition of the Synonyma, according to which the Λ recension was the first to reach Anglo-Saxon England and had the widest circulation there. Felix predictably knew this text of the Synonyma, while the compiler of a continental florilegium such as the Liber scintillarum, whether from Ligugé or not,[82] presumably drew on the predominantly continental Φ recension.

Now, at least two Southumbrian witnesses of the Λ recension are contemporary with the VSG, namely the St Petersburg and Würzburg manuscripts. In particular, Felix's text seems to be closer to the latter codex, in that both read *futuro while the corresponding reading in the St Petersburg manuscript is *futurum.[83]

The St Petersburg manuscript has been traced to a south-west English scriptorium, but it was eventually moved to the insular foundation of Corbie by the middle of the eighth century; indeed part of the contents, including the final part of the Synonyma, were added at Corbie.[84] In addition to its early date and Southumbrian origin, the St Petersburg Synonyma are especially relevant to us for their links with two Anglo-Saxon literati that, together with Felix, are the earliest named readers of the Synonyma in England, namely Aldhelm and Boniface, and whose writings, especially Aldhelm's, were current in the milieu where the VSG originated. Indeed, in the St Petersburg codex the Synonyma are bracketed by an acrostic poem on St John, Iohannis celsi rimans mysteria caeli,[85] which has been attributed, albeit not universally, to Boniface, and by Aldhelm's Enigmata.[86] What is more, it has been argued – again not unanimously – that one of the hands at work on the codex was that of Boniface himself, whose handwriting has apparently been detected in the two texts preceding the Synonyma, namely a copy of the Athanasian creed (Quicumque uult) and the St John poem.[87] If the St Petersburg manuscript really is a Bonifatian autograph, then it must be dated before 718, when Boniface set off for the continent. Boniface could even have played a role in the arrival of the codex itself on the continent because the St Petersburg manuscript could have been part of an exchange of gifts between Boniface and Grimo, abbot of Corbie (741-751).[88]

Indeed, according to Elfassi, the Liber scintillarum relies on a contaminated Φ-text of the Synonyma similar to the text transmitted by an early ninth-century south German manuscript, Munich, Bayerische Staatsbibliothek, Clm 6330 (Elfassi's ms. m): Elfassi, 'Defensor de Ligugé', pp. 246-248; Isidori Hispalensis Synonyma, ed. by Elfassi, pp. li-lii.

There is also a Bonifatian dimension to the Würzburg Synonyma. The bishopric of Würzburg was established by Boniface in 741 or 742 and the Synonyma seems to have been 'besonders [beliebt] in Würzburg'.[89] At least five manuscripts of the Isidorian text dating up to the first half of the ninth century are associated with Würzburg and the codex M. p. th. f. 79 is the earliest of them.[90] Dating to the first half, possibly the first quarter, of the eighth century, this manuscript has been traced to a Mercian or southwestern centre with Frankish cultural contacts, probably Worcester, on the basis of both the palaeographical evidence and the dialectal features of a number of Old English drypoint glosses roughly contemporary with the production of the manuscript.[91] The codex reached the Rhine-Main area by the end of the eighth century or beginning of the ninth and finally arrived at Würzburg, likely via Mainz, Boniface's see, by the mid-ninth century.[92] Once in Germany, a number of drypoint glosses in an east Frankish dialect were entered in a hybrid minuscule which has been dated to the early ninth century and classified as 'nachbonifatianisch' and 'deutsch insular'.[93]

It would be tempting to speculate that Felix consulted one of these two manuscripts, especially the Würzburg one with which it shares the reading futuro. However, if the dating of the two codices is consistent with this hypothesis, their putative places of origin (a southwestern English scriptorium for the St Petersburg codex, and a Mercian or southwestern centre, possibly Worcester, for the Würzburg one), do not correspond with the proposed East Anglian place of composition for Felix's VSG. Here Felix must have had access to at least one copy of the Λ-text of the Synonyma (whether in its entirety or in excerpts); in particular, this copy probably contained a text closer to the one preserved in the Würzburg codex. As mentioned above, Felix's putative East Anglian mother-house must have been provided with an extensive library, where hagiographic sources as well as Aldhelm's works must have featured prominently. The final part of this chapter will attempt to sketch out the contents of such a library and the original milieu of the VSG.

The Literary Milieu of the Vita S. Guthlaci

Quellenforschung on the VSG has shown that Felix relied on an ingrained knowledge of scripture as well as on an extensive hagiographic library ranging from the lives of the two archetypal Desert Fathers, Antony and Paul the Hermit, to the two most influential hagiographies of the western Middle Ages, Sulpicius's Vita Martini and Gregory the Great's Vita Benedicti, to the lives of two of the earliest insular saints, Fursey and, especially, Cuthbert.[94] Indeed Bede's prose Vita S. Cuthberti is the saint's life to which Felix is most indebted, so much so that 'it is difficult to imagine that Felix was not in some way attempting to create an East Anglian counterpart to Cuthbert'.[95] Finally, Felix was familiar with Virgil and the VSG is frequently scattered with Virgilian echoes,[96] as is the case with the chapter in which the borrowing from the Synonyma occurs.

Guthlac's vision of the two devils and their long address to the saint on the spiritual benefits of extreme fasting where the quote from the Synonyma is embedded do not have an exact antecedent. In general, the whole passage could be described as Antonian, in that, although Antony himself does not experience an equivalent vision, in a long speech recorded in Evagrius's Latin version of the Vita Antonii (chpt. xvi),[97] the saint warns his disciples against the devil's mischievous attempt to lure monks to ascetic excesses only to throw them into despair.[98] The Antonian resonances are corroborated at the end of the relevant chapter of the VSG, when Guthlac dispels his demonic antagonists who ultimately vanish like smoke from his presence into thin air.[99] As Downey has demonstrated, this sentence represents 'a particularly complex moment of source-layering',[100] because it conflates a phrase possibly from Virgil's Aeneid (XII, 591-592),[101] but more likely from Bede's prose Vita S. Cuthberti where it describes the saint's dispelling of a false devilish fire,[102] with a biblical echo of Psalm lxvii. 2-3.[103] Notably, the same psalm is chanted by Antony in a similar context of demonic harassment and it is probably through the Vita Antonii that the scriptural quote filtered into Felix's text, where it is in turn echoed three more times, always to describe Guthlac's chasing away of devilish tormenters.[104]

On the Vita Antonii as a source of the VSG, see Downey, 'Intertextuality', pp. 33-39.

The sophisticated integration of sources and multiple criss-crossing of intertextual and intratextual borrowings has been shown to be the most characteristic of Felix's compositional techniques.[105] Indeed, in view of this practice, I would suggest that the above-quoted fumus-simile might provide a further link, albeit an indirect one, between the VSG and the Synonyma, particularly with the most popular and elaborated-on passage from the Isidorian text, namely the ubi sunt.[106] The ubi sunt passage of the Synonyma itself does not mention any smoke – the two concluding similes read ‘quasi umbra transierunt, uelut somnium euanuerunt’ (‘they passed away as if they were a shadow, they vanished like a dream’)[107] –, but no fewer than six Anglo-Saxon ubi sunt passages, four in Latin, namely Aldhelm’s Epistola ad Acircium, Boniface’s Epistles ix and lxxiii, and the anonymous sermon In nomine Domini in ms. Cambridge, Corpus Christi College 190, and two in Old English, namely the anonymous homilies Napier xlix and Irvine vii, feature a smoke-simile and they are all demonstrably derivative of the Synonyma.[108]

As has been shown, the ultimate source for the fumus-simile itself in these Anglo-Saxon ubi sunt passages is biblical, that is Wisdom V. 13-15. In particular, in Aldhelm’s and Boniface’s ubi sunt passages, this scriptural echo was spontaneously triggered by and conflated with the Synonyma, a text which itself often echoes the Old Testament.[109] Given Felix’s scriptural know-how and familiarity with Aldhelm’s corpus, on the one hand, and his distinctive multi-layering of sources, on the other, it is possible that his image of the devil vanishing like smoke might betray, besides Virgilian or Bedan antecedents, also an echo of the Aldhelmian elaboration of the fumus-simile in the Epistola ad Acircium.

As to Boniface, although no firm evidence exists concerning Felix’s knowledge and use of his writings, Boniface exchanged letters with at least two royal personages mentioned in the VSG who were contemporaries of Felix himself, namely the very dedicatee of the uita, the East Anglian king Ælfwald, and the Mercian king Æthelbald. The former was probably a subject king to the latter, and indeed Æthelbald features prominently in the VSG as a pious devotee of the saint, who frequently visited Guthlac for counsel and encouragement during his youth as an exile and who generously enriched Guthlac’s shrine after he had finally ascended to the throne.[110]

Notably, Æthelbald is the addressee of one of the two above-mentioned epistles by Boniface featuring the ubi sunt motif and the concluding particular, Cross demonstrated that the Isidorian text is ‘quite the favourite individual source’ for the ubi sunt passages in Old English prose and poetry: Cross, ‘“Ubi sunt” Passages in Old English’, p. 25; Di Sciacca, ‘Il topos dell’ubi sunt’; Di Sciacca, ‘The ubi sunt Motif’; Di Sciacca, Finding the Right Words, pp. 105-159.

fumus-simile, namely Epistle lxxiii.[111] Here the Mercian king is depicted in far less flattering terms than in the VSG, as Boniface sternly reprimands Æthelbald for his depraved mores and violations of church privileges and property. With its emphasis on the transience of any worldly grandeur, the ubi sunt paragraph perfectly fits Boniface's admonition to the king to amend his wicked ways. Indeed, this letter can be considered as a veritable manifesto of church reform. It was authored by Boniface but nominally signed by seven other Anglo-Saxon bishops. Given the public dimension of the epistle, it is reasonable to suppose that such a well-read contemporary as Felix, possibly even in personal contact with the king targeted by Boniface, was aware of it and its flamboyant ubi sunt passage featuring the fumus-simile. Also, stylistic parallels seem to link the Bonifatian ubi sunt paragraph and the VSG, in that like the latter, the former is of 'derivative, repetitious and innately formulaic nature'.[112] Like Boniface's, Felix's own style and compositional techniques also employ a complex network of intertextual and intratextual resonances, and such a network could well have included Boniface's Epistle lxxiii and its fumus-simile.

Finally, a further connection between Boniface's Epistle lxxiii and Felix's VSG can be identified in the negative portrayal both authors give of Ceolred, king of the Mercians (709-716), predecessor and distant cousin of Æthelbald.[113] According to Felix, Ceolred had cast Æthelbald into exile and persecuted him further. Indeed, shortly before Guthlac's death, Felix has the saint prophesise to Æthelbald the death of wicked Ceolred and Æthelbald's long-awaited accession to the Mercian throne.[114] Boniface does not touch upon the dynastic controversy implied in Felix's account, but fully agrees with the latter's depiction of Ceolred as a dissolute king who ultimately died raving mad at a banquet (only, unlike Felix, Boniface uses Ceolred as a cautionary example for the equally depraved Æthelbald).

Notably, Boniface had already chastised Ceolred decades earlier, when, recounting the otherworldly vision of the monk of Much Wenlock within his epistle to Eadburg (717-719), he had depicted the soul of the evil king falling prey to a host of demons.[115] This very vision too could provide a further connection between Boniface and the VSG, especially the episode of Guthlac's descensus ad inferos, when at the height of a demonic assault, the saint is carried by a host of devils to the gates of hell and there he is made to witness the torments inflicted on the damned souls and threatened to be cast down into the hellish abyss, but is eventually rescued due to his faithfulness and the intercession of St Bartholomew.[116] Although to my knowledge no specific debt of the VSG to Boniface's account of the Wenlock vision has been pinpointed, it is nevertheless significant that Guthlac's descensus ad inferos has been associated with other early Anglo-Saxon visions, including those of Dryhthelm[117] and Fursey,[118] as making up 'a visionary tradition in early Anglo-Saxon ascetic circles in which the Latin and literary and the vernacular and oral intermingled'.[119]

In sum, although the evidence concerning Felix's knowledge of Boniface's texts remains largely circumstantial, I think there is a strong possibility that they too circulated in Felix's circle, where – it must be remembered – the works of Boniface's great model, Aldhelm, proved so influential. Not unlike Aldhelm, Boniface, one of the earliest Anglo-Saxon admirers of the Synonyma and an enthusiastic propagator of the Isidorian text in the Anglo-Saxon missions on the continent, could have endorsed a broader appreciation of the Synonyma.

Conclusion

Analysis of the Synonyma excerpt in the VSG contributes interesting data as to the circulation of this Isidorian text in Anglo-Saxon England, in that it confirms that by the mid-eighth century the Synonyma were already widely disseminated in Southumbrian England. In particular, the text circulating at this stage seems to have been that of the Λ-recension. The St Petersburg and the Würzburg manuscripts of the Synonyma are the earliest witnesses of this recension and Felix also seems to have consulted a Λ-text, indeed a version of the text which was apparently close to the Würzburg Synonyma. The locales to which Felix and the Würzburg manuscript have been traced, an East Anglian foundation and a southwestern centre, possibly Worcester, respectively, do not seem to be compatible and the circumstances of both Felix's life and the itinerary followed by the Würzburg Synonyma from its original scriptorium to the continent are just too hazy to posit a definite association between them. It is therefore safer to suggest that Felix must have had access to another Λ-copy of the Synonyma, possibly related to the Würzburg codex, thereby virtually expanding our estimates of the Anglo-Saxon manuscript tradition of the Synonyma. Alternatively, it could be speculated that what Felix consulted was an excerpt or a florilegium, based on a Λ-text or even on the Würzburg Synonyma.

Previous scholarship has pointed out that the Synonyma proved especially popular with Anglo-Saxon anonymous homilists, and that in pre-Conquest England the Isidorian work contributed to the definition of a specifically Anglo-Saxon stock of eschatological, penitential, and devotional motifs. As an eschatological and devotional source, the Synonyma were often associated with that corpus of texts, mostly of eastern origin and Irish-transmitted, which shaped Anglo-Saxon cosmology and vision literature as well as spirituality and devotion.[120]

Within the wide pre-Conquest readership of the Synonyma, there are at least two distinctive intellectual environments from the early Anglo-Saxon period where the Synonyma were particularly appreciated, namely Aldhelm's entourage and, in turn, that of Aldhelm's great epigone, Boniface. Not only did Aldhelm and Boniface demonstrably draw on the Isidorian text in their own writings, but Boniface and his fellow missionaries also actively promoted the diffusion of the Synonyma in the area of the Anglo-Saxon missions on the continent.[121]

The evidence from the VSG both confirms and augments this picture. Through Felix's work we can glimpse a milieu that, besides holding Aldhelm in high esteem and demonstrating an extensive scriptural and hagiographic proficiency, nurtured an interest in eremitic values and had a detailed knowledge of some of the key hagiographies concerning the founders of eastern monasticism, namely Antony and Paul the Hermit, as well as Guthlac's own 'predecessor' as native Anglo-Saxon hermit-saint, namely Cuthbert.[122] Thus, the VSG affords precious evidence as to the association of the Synonyma with hagiographies specifically devoted to hermit-saints, which confirms the ascetic component of the Isidorian text and helps to illustrate and explain its fortune as a classic of monastic spirituality in the western Middle Ages.[123] More specifically, analysis of the VSG brings into sharper focus the literary corpus to which the Synonyma probably belonged in pre-Norman England and to sketch out a more detailed picture of the Anglo-Saxon library to which they virtually belonged.

Paul the Deacon, Isidore, and the Lombards

Christopher Heath

The jurist and philologist Friedrich Lindenbrog's (1573-1648) edition of Diversarum gentium historiae antiquae tres – published in 1640 and dedicated to Johann Friedrich (1579-1634), the Archbishop (administrator) of Bremen and Bishop of Lübeck – associated three authors who provided histories of the origins and migrations of peoples.[1] Lindenbrog collated three authors in this work: first, the De Regnorum ac temporum successionibus of Jordanes (better known as the Historia Romana);[2] three items of Isidore of Seville;[3] and a De Gestis Longobardorum, better known as the Historia Langobardorum of Paul the Deacon.[4]

It is not entirely surprising that Lindenbrog should collect these writers and their works in one volume. His note to the readers emphasises the connections between the origins of the 'Germans' and the relevance of the works of Jordanes, Isidore and Paul as materials for the early histories of their peoples.[5] At the same time, Isidore of Seville and Paul the Deacon embody authors who not only delineate the origins of the gens upon which they write but also, through their works, assist in shaping the ethnic constructions that we term Visigoth and Lombard. As they composed their histories, we see the processes that have been termed ethnogenesis begin to crystallise so that both social (peoples, power) and spatial zones (geography) coalesce. Where previously in the late sixth-century both Visigothic and Lombard kings had endeavoured to perpetuate political, socio-economic and cultural hegemony over populations of Hispano- and Italo-Romans by the enforcement of legal separation, both kingdoms began to mould a territorial identity which encompassed, commanded and acquired the loyalties, or at least aimed to do so, of all the inhabitants under their rule.[6]

How the situation on the ground affected the context and content of the narratives of both Isidore and Paul the Deacon has been the subject of considerable recent interest and debate. Whilst the influence of Gregory of Tours, for instance, on Paul's Historia Langobardorum (hereafter HL) has been acknowledged, and the inspiration provided by both the examples of Jordanes and Bede in prompting Paul to compose a general work of history on the Lombards has been identified, the influence of Isidore at significant junctures in Paul's work and thought have not been sufficiently addressed. Isidore generally and his Etymologiae sive Origines specifically had a profound impact on the cultural and intellectual developments of the late eighth- and early ninth-centuries that we know as the Carolingian 'Renaissance'. As Laistner pointed out in 1957:

> The Etymologiae far surpassed (in demand) any other of his [i.e. Isidore's] books in popularity; for this encyclopaedia was a sine-qua-non in every monastic library of any pretensions. Its use by a long list of writers from the seventh to the tenth century is easily demonstrable, it appears constantly in medieval library catalogues, and the number of extant manuscripts is exceedingly great.[7]

Isidore's influence is evident in three of Paul's important works. First, in his earliest historical compilation-composition, the Historia Romana, composed at some point in the 760s at the bequest, we are told, of Adelperga of Benevento, daughter of Desiderius (757-74) the last Lombard king;[8] secondly, the Homiliarium completed in the 780s upon the direction of

Charlemagne;[9] and thirdly, his best known and last work, the Historia Langobardorum, written in the 790s – the last decade of Paul's life.[10]

The use of Isidore in the first two works is not extensive. Often overlooked and under-rated in the canon of Paul's writings, the Historia Romana is a work of three distinct sections. The opening ten books are an amended version of the Breviarium ab Urbe Condita composed by Eutropius (c. 320-c. 390).[11] The next six books attached to this Eutropian core are Paul's own work with extensive use of Orosius, Jerome and the Epitome de Caesaribus to name but three.[12] As one would expect from a work of political history of Rome and the Roman empire up to the time of Justinian (527-65), the Goths are dealt with as an important but incidental element within the orbit of the general narrative. Crivellucci identified six occasions within the extension that appeared to have some Isidorian influence.[13] Whilst Paul was not averse, in common with most early medieval writers, to reproduce lengthy passages verbatim from sources, only one short passage on the death of Transamund, the treatment of the catholic bishops of North Africa, and the career of Fulgentius are close enough to suggest direct use of Isidore. Thus the Chronica maiora has:

> [390] Transamundum Wandalorum rex catholicas ecclesias claudit et cxx episcopos exilio Sardiniam mittit
> [391] Fulgentius quoque in confessione fidei et scientia floruit
> Transamund king of the Vandals shut the catholic churches and sent 120 bishops into exile in Sardinia.
> Fulgentius also flourished in the confession of faith and knowledge.[14]

In order these deal with: the return of Genseric to Africa; events in Constantinople; the division of the Goths under Alaric and Fritigern; the exile of the North African bishops to Sardinia; and, the career of Fulgentius and Transamund's death.

[14] Mommsen (ed.), MGH Auctorum Antiquissimorum II, p. 474. See Crivellucci, Pauli Diaconi, p. 226. Whilst Bede's Chronica Maiora mentions the activities of Transamund – Bede's notice refers to 'ccxx episcopos' and makes no connected reference to Fulgentius. See Mommsen (ed.), Auctorum Antiquissimorum III, p. 306.

And Paul's Historia Romana has:

> [XVI 3] Eo tempore Transamundus qui fratri Honorico apud Africam in Wandalorum regno successerat, fratris vel patris Genserici secutus perfidiam clausis catholicorum ecclesiis cxx episcopos in Sardinia exilio religavit.
> [XVI 4] Inter hac tempestas beatus Fulgentius in confessione fidei et scientia floruit.[15]
> At that time, Transamund who was the brother of Huneric succeeded to the Kingdom of the Vandals in Africa, following the perfidy of his brother and father, Genseric, closing the catholic churches, he sent 120 bishops into exile in Sardinia.
> During this time blessed Fulgentius flourished in the confession of faith and knowledge.

Within the orbit of the Historia Romana, Isidore is not a source that Paul draws upon frequently. Whilst the section above suggests a close use of that particular passage for details of events in Vandal Africa, the remaining five passages do not lead us to conclude that there is any particular pattern in Paul's use of Isidore. A similar scenario is presented by Paul's compilation, the Homiliarium. A compilation in four parts, the Homiliarium uses sermons and homilies from primarily western Patristic fathers. Out of a possible 244 items, Isidore's presence is restricted to two sermons in the Pars Hiemalis.[16] This in itself is a little more surprising, given the influence of Isidore upon the court intellectuals at the heart of the Carolingian renaissance.[17] The relative modest footprint of Isidore in these two works need not, however, lead us to the conclusion that Isidore remained a minor influence on Paul globally.[18] For it is in the third work, the HL, that there is a closer convergence of aims and interests between the two – in particular, the creation of a narrative that depicts the maintenance of strong and effective orthodox kingship of their respective peoples.

[17] See Laura Carlson, Adoption, Adaptation, & Authority: The Use of Isidore in the Opus Caroli in this volume.

[18] This is demonstrated in this volume by: Melissa Markauskas, Rylands MS Latin 12: A Carolingian example of Isidore's reception into the Patristic Canon.

The creation of a unified and orthodox Visigothic Iberian kingdom was both difficult and uncertain. In similar circumstances but with different results, the intersection between the social, political, and religious identities of the Lombards also raised questions for Lombard rulers and those they ruled. This was neither straightforward nor un-problematic for Paul or his people. Despite the themes of the Historia Langobardorum, where Iberia and the Visigoths remain peripheral to the main thrust of the narrative, Isidore of Seville has an impact upon two important sections in the work. In the first place, as we shall see, Isidore has significant influence upon the ethnographic and historico-geographic material with which Paul commenced book I of the HL; and, secondly, his excursus on the Italian provinces in book II of the HL provides particular evidence for Paul's knowledge and use of Isidorian materials. This chapter seeks to analyse the etymological and ethnographic responses of Paul's works and how these were formulated and crafted with an eye on the Laus Spaniae which introduces Isidore's Historia Gothorum. Isidore's image of a Gothic past based on the providential migrations of peoples provided a template for Paul's comments on the origins of the Lombards. Once settled in Italy, Paul could use an Isidorian approach to deal with the difficult (for him) pagan origins and history of his own, now catholic, gens. In both respects Isidore's works provided Paul with both answers and solutions. But before we can analyse these elements, we must consider Isidore's responses to the origins of the Visigoths and how these dovetail with modern perceptions of the situation on the ground.

Origines Gentium: Identities, Texts and Ethnicities

Identity and ethnicity and what might be termed the construction of identities through texts are as Pohl has demonstrated an uncertain business.[19] The trajectory in ethno-political terms of the successor 'states' of the western Roman empire and the often opaque processes that produced the Visigothic and Lombard kingdoms have generated considerable scholarly debate.[20] Identity is at the core of these processes, which of course matters as 'the interface between the individual and a given society where social codes, cultural languages and political integration are in flux or are being negotiated'.[21] book IX of Isidore's Etymologiae sive Origines provides definitions of languages and nations. Isidore tells us:

[19] Pohl, 'Paulus Diaconus', pp. 375-405. See also Wood, 'Religiones', pp. 126-7.

[20] Some of this debate has been uncharitable at best. The literature is extensive, but for a good introduction to the issues see Gillett (ed.), On Barbarian Identity which includes papers from

> Gens est multitudo ab uno principio orta, sive ab alia natione secundum propriam collectionem distincta ut Graeciae, Asiae.
> A nation is a number of people sharing a single origin or distinguished from another nation in accordance with its own grouping, as the nations of Greece or of Asia Minor.[22]

The writer of history is not exempt from these processes or influences and will influence and be influenced by the contextual situation on the ground. In broad terms, the historian marks the point of contact as narrator/composer/compiler with his motive(s), audience(s) and inspirations. Isidore's Historia Gothorum embodies these difficulties. One might characterise Isidore's temporal and spatial experience as being at the sharp end of both the creation and consolidation of a unified and orthodox Visigothic kingdom. As Lung has pointed out Isidore's works of history are written from a Toledan point of view, which flows from 'le centre de l'espace politique'.[23] Yet Isidore himself embodies a somewhat paradoxical position. In terms of ethnicity, in the first place, it is more than likely that both Isidore and his family were Hispano-Romans.[24] Secondly, as a writer, Isidore looks back to Classical Antiquity but at the same time develops an independent response to his world which does not depend upon nostalgia for the Roman Empire. Finally, he acts as an intermediary between clerical and secular culture. How he negotiates these conflicting paradigms is exemplified by critics of the 'ethnogenesis model' and a reasoned response from Walter Pohl who is termed a 'prominent spokesman for the Traditionskern model'.

Merrills, 'Comparative histories', pp. 35-46, at p. 37 'the unity of gens and history under the aegis of the Catholic Church certainly represented a central part of Isidore's historical argument and did much to shape the inclusion or omission of material within his account'.

the approach that he adopts in the structural composition of the Historia Gothorum.[25]

The Historia Gothorum details the history of the Goths from their bellicose interventions into the ancient Mediterranean basin up until the rule of Swinthila (621-31). Here the Visigoths form the principal narrational spine of the work but, whilst Isidore must have been aware of the heterogeneous landscape of ethnicities in Hispania, his work concentrates on the Visigoths as the principal leitmotif, using the Vandals and the Sueves as useful and illustrative contrasts to emphasise Visigothic success.[26] A key feature of his approach is to provide an introductory section, now known as the Laus Spaniae and to conclude with a complementary Laus Gothorum. In this way the reader is aware from the commencement that the Historia Gothorum is designed to prove the appropriate and providential rule of the Visigoths in Hispania.[27] Isidore is selective in how he presents the origins of the Visigoths and their subsequent adventures. In his discussion of their origins he observes:

> Gothorum antiquissimorum esse gentem certem est: quorum Originum quidam de Magog Iafeth filio suspicantur a simulitudine ultimae syllabae; et magis de Ezechiela propheta id colligentes. Retro autem eruditi eos magis Getas quam Gog et Magog appellare consueverunt.
> It is certain that the Gothic people are very ancient. Some suspect that they originated from Magog, son of Japheth on the basis of the similarity of the last syllable, or they conclude the same from the prophet Ezekiel. But in the past learned men were in the habit of calling them 'Getae' rather than Gog or Magog.[28]

[26] Merrills, History and Geography, pp. 195-196. Merrills notes that Isidore did not subscribe to the belief in a homogenous Hispano-Roman entity identifying Gallaeci, Asturi and Cantabri separately within the Origines.

[27] Merrills suggests that this approach is in distinct contrast to Jordanes and Paul the Deacon. Whilst not as explicit Paul the Deacon does provide one small pointer to his own similar agenda i.e. Pari etiam modo et Winnilorum, hoc est Langobardorum gens, quae postea in Italia feliciter regnavit.(HL I,1) ('In similar fashion, also, the people of the Winnili, that is, of Langobards, which afterwards ruled happily in Italy…') Capo, Paolo Diacono, p. 4; and, Merrills, History and Geography, p. 36. [28] Mommsen (ed.), MGH Auctorum Antiquissimorum, p. 268; and, Wolf, Conquerors, pp. 80-81 (amended). This from Jerome. Ezekiel reference: 38-9.

Later within the recapitulatio that concludes the Gothic part of the history, Isidore returns to the same issue but whilst, once again, we are told that the Goths originated from Magog, a new element is introduced. On this occasion, he remarks that 'they have a common origin with the Scythians. That is why they are not much different in name with one letter changed and one removed. Getae becomes Scythae'.[29] So far as origins are concerned Isidore depends upon a combination of biblical exegesis and etymological sleight of hand.[30] The fusion of Isidore's political and religious concerns prompts, as Wood has suggested, a 're-write of significant proportions of the history of the Goths', which seeks to reinforce the 'Catholic identity of the Visigothic gens'.[31] His treatment of the emperor Valens (364-78) is a case in point. Isidore attributes the blame for Visigothic Arianism to the emperor who had 'sent heretical priests' (haeriticis sacerdotibus) in the first place.[32] It was he tells us:

> Ut in tamen preaclarum gentem virus pestiferum semine pernicioso transfudit sicque errorem, quem recens credulitas ebibit, tenuit dieque servavit. 'With this pernicious seed [that] he infused a deadly poison into this excellent people, who held and maintained for a long time the error which they had trustingly accepted'.[33]

Subsequently, Isidore attempts to minimise the impact of the Visigothic sack of Rome in 410. In describing this, he details the despoiling of St Peter's Sanctuary and recounts how Alaric directed that the items taken should be returned dicens cum Romanis gessisse bellum, non cum apostolis (saying that he was waging war against the Romans, not against the Apostles).[34]

Detailed analyses elsewhere have identified Isidore's cumulative message that the Goths have been re-fashioned by their contact with the Roman and Christian world.[35] Isidore has created an interpretation of Visigothic origins and identity based on an impulse to deal with the new realities on the ground in seventh-century Hispania.[36] Isidore's agenda shaped history into a 'picture of the operation of God's will' and his example affected Paul's responses to the origins of his own people, which, as we shall see in what follows, were selective and moulded by Isidore's interpretations.[37]

'These things are worthy of laughter'

Unlike the Historia Gothorum, which survives in both short and long redactions that most commentators associate with respectively earlier and later recensions, one cannot identify with ease the process of gestation of the Historia Langobardorum. So far as the earliest period of Lombard history is concerned Paul's problems were somewhat similar to Isidore. So far as books I and II were concerned, in particular, Paul was distant in both spatial and temporal terms from his subject matter. One has the impression that paradoxically, due to this distance and the extensive citation of classical authors in the first two books, Paul's sources were rather 'thin' and to compensate, he employs digression and oral witness in the narrative. Thus we find, for instance, notices on whirlpools and Amazons.[38] Isidore's influence in book I, which will be discussed here, however, affects the core origin story provided by Paul and his understanding of its significance.

The story of how the Langobards acquired their name is a well-known narrative that has attracted the attention of scholars such as Stefano Gasparri, Stefano Cingolani, and Walter Pohl, who have considered the importance and presentation of the Lombard origin myth.[39] It was clearly important to Paul to recount the story notwithstanding the pagan ambience of the subject, but the composition of the origin story was one of the most acute examples of his difficulties when composing the HL. Classical authors were silent as to Lombard origins and confined their brief and infrequent remarks to observations relating to the Lombards' fierceness in battle and their limitation in number.[40] These textual remarks place the Winnili (who subsequently become the Langobardi) in the region of the upper Elbe around the first-century C.E. rather than the island of 'Scadinavia' from which Paul suggested his people first originated.[41] Paul relied upon later material. The story of the origins of the Lombard name survives in three sources: first, the earliest extant source is the Chronicle of Fredegar – composed at some point before c. 660 probably in Burgundy;[42] secondly, the Origo gentis Langobardorum, also composed in the mid seventh-century provides a short summary of Lombard history from its origins up to the rule of Perctarit (672-88);[43] and, finally, Paul's HL. None of these three narratives are entirely the same – and whilst Paul knew and referred to the OGL his version remains distinctive. In his narrative, Paul's Winnili leave Scadinavia and arrive in Scoringa where the Wandali demand tribute. Battle is prepared when the Winnili decline to pay. The Winnili and Wandali seek divine assistance of Godan and Frea respectively. Frea advises Gambara to ensure that the Winnili women fashion their hair into beards and stand with their men in the east.[44] Upon seeing them at sun-rise Godan says:

> Qui sunt isti longibarbi?
> Who are these long-beards?[45]

Frea then invites Godan to give the now-named Longobardi victory over the Wandali.

Apart from the clearly pagan atmosphere of the story, two features stand out. In the first place, it is remarkable that Paul should mention the story at all given the presence and importance of Godan and Frea in the text. Why, one wonders, did he bother to include the story at all? Everett suggested that Paul felt 'compelled' to include it 'for fear of disappointing his readers'.[46] It is, of course, impossible to demonstrate that this was true – although any cursory analysis of the HL would certainly suggest that Paul enjoyed any opportunity to tell a good story and could exhibit a rather 'gossipy' tone. Secondly, Paul's presentation of the passage is illuminating. At the start of the chapter he indicated:

[46] Everett, Literacy, p. 94.

> Refert hoc loco antiquitas ridiculam fabulam: quod accedentes Wandali ad Godan…

At this point the men of old tell a silly story about the Vandals coming to Godan…[47] Subsequently he concludes the chapter with this observation:

> Haec risui digna sunt et pro nihilo habenda. Victoria enim non potestati est attributa hominum, sed de caelo potius ministratur.
> These things are worthy of laughter and are to be held of no account. For victory is due not to the power of men, but it is furnished from heaven.[48]

The passage is thus framed between two markers that distance Paul as author from the material presented but also prepare the reader for his own opinion based upon Isidorian material. This continues in the next chapter where Paul informs us:

> Certum tamen est, Langobardos ab intractae ferro barbae longitudine, cum primis Winnili dicti fuerint Ita postmodum appellatos. Nam iuxta illorum linguam lang longam, bart barbam significat
> It is certain, however, that the Langobards were afterwards so-called on account of the length of their beards untouched by the knife, whereas at first they had been called Winnili; for according to their language lang means long and bart beard.[49]

This is clearly an echo of the entry in Isidore's Etymologiae where he says Langobardes vulgo fertur nominatos prolixa barba et numquam tonsa ('It is commonly said that the Lombards are named Langobardi from their widely spreading never cut beard').[50]

Here then we see that Paul has used Isidore's etymological definition to emphasise his own point that the origin story of the Lombards should be discounted. There are at the same time less obvious impulses at work which have been affected by Isidore's work. Due to its circulation and importance, he was not able to disregard the tale entirely. Instead, following Isidore's lead where Isidore has managed and manipulated the origins of the Goths, Paul attempted to re-formulate the presentation to mitigate the pagan details of his material. One generation later, the anonymously written HL Codex Gothani excluded the origin story of the Lombards entirely and draw a veil of silence over the whole mythic episode, preferring to simply ascribe the name to the length of beards of the Winnili.[51] With his second book, the narrative follows the Lombards from the north to Italy and it is here, subsequently, that we can also discern Isidorian influence on the structure and composition of the material.

'Touching briefly upon other provinces of Italy'

Whilst the first book moves the story of the Lombards forward from the north to the Elbe and on to Pannonia and finally Italy, book II deals with the period from the use of the Lombards as unruly allies by Narses in the Gothic wars in 552 up to the murder of the Lombard king, Cleph (572-4) in 574. The structure of the book can be divided as the following slightly simplified schedule shows in the table below:

Table 1 Simplified Structure of Book II of the Historia Langobardorum

Section	Subject	Chapters of book II
A^1	The Victory of Narses and the Advent of the Lombards	1-9
	Interlude: Gaul in 561, Pope Benedict I & Paul of Aquileia	10
B^1	The death of Narses & Alboin and the Bishop	11-12
	Interlude: Venantius Fortunatus	13
C	Alboin, Venetia and the Italian Provinces	14-24
A^2	The Undoing of Alboin	25-30
B^2	Cleph and the Lombard Dukes	31-2

Book II has a complex set of interlocking narrative threads that associate, on the one hand, Narses and the misfortunes of Byzantine Italy with, on the other hand, Alboin and the good fortune of the Lombards. If one sets aside the narrative interludes in the structural arrangement, one may discern that the geographical section knits the separate parts of the book together and acts as a chiastic pivot. Standing at this point in the book, the reader is encouraged to associate the Lombard arrival in Italy with providential rule over the entire peninsula and associated islands.[52] Paul's descriptions are not as hyperbolic as the highly accomplished Laus Spaniae but nonetheless we are told of the 'very rich cities of Capua, Neapolis and Salernus' (opulentissimae urbes);[53] of the very fertile plain of Capua' (uberrima);[54] that Emilia is 'adorned with wealthy cities' (Haec locupletibus urbibus decoratur);[55] and Ravenna is the 'most noble of cities' (nobilissima urbium).[56] Where one might expect rhetorical flourish or even a riposte to Isidore's classical allusions on Italy in the Laus Spaniae, these are not deployed. Instead, Paul's depiction of each of the provinces and his emplacement of it between an account of Alboin's capture of most of Venetia and his entry into Mediolanum mirrors for the Lombards – the marriage of Iberia and the Visigoths- thus, we understand that it is the Lombards who are the ruler-heirs of the Romans in Italy, as Paul points out at the very start of the book.[57]

In terms of content book II of the HL has the greatest accumulation of Isidorian material. A significant cluster of references is contained within a section of the book which introduces the provinces of Italy. Debate amongst scholars in the late nineteenth- and early twentieth-centuries concentrated on the sources of Paul's excursus, the origins of errors in the text, and the correlations between and across extant manuscript copies.[58] Isidore's influence upon both the formulation and creation of the excursus has attracted rather less attention.[59] There are two features here that merit closer scrutiny: first, the use and knowledge of the Etymologiae; and, secondly, the impact of Isidore upon Paul's structural arrangement of the book.

[59] Waitz insisted that the additions in what he termed the Catalogus Provinciarum Italiae were drawn mostly from Isidore – see Waitz (ed.), MGH SrL, pp. 188-189. For context, see Foulke, History of the Lombards, p. 383.

Paul's excursus on the Italian provinces occupies the central third of book II. In eleven chapters he describes eighteen provinces commencing with Venetia and Histria in chapter 14 and concluding with the islands of Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica in chapter 22. There is much of interest in these chapters, not least Paul's extensive use and re-use of classical authorities.[60] It is particularly noteworthy that we see Paul both updating and adapting material from the Etymologiae in his text. His notices in this section follow a pattern. He commences with the etymological foundations of the provincial name, discusses particular features of that area (e.g. lakes, mountains), and lists the important cities. In chapter 16, for instance, Paul describes Tuscia and Umbria. We are told:

> Sexta provincia Tuscia est, quae a ture, quod populus illius superstitiose in sacrificiis deorum suorum incendere solebant, sic appellate est.
> The sixth province is Tuscia which is thus called from tus which its people were wont to burn superstitiously in the sacrifices to their Gods.[61]

And

> Umbria autem dicta est, quod imbribus superfuerit, cum aquosa clades olim populos devastaret
> … and it is called Umbria because it remained above the furious rains when long ago a watery scourge devastated the nations.[62]

Both these passages reveal a connection to Isidore for their etymological foundations. Their example could be replicated with further instances in the geographical section.[63] Whilst this use of Isidore is significant, Paul's adaptation of this structural segment into his historical narrative is of fundamental importance in appreciating Paul's agenda in this part of the HL. Although Paul does not explicitly follow the Isidorian arrangement of the Laus Spaniae and Laus Gothorum to open and close the narrative, his delineation of the Italian provinces allows him to promote Lombard kings as the heirs of the Byzantine Empire in the Italian peninsula.

[63] For Isidore's comments see Barney et al., Etymologies, p. 196 (Tuscia IX.2.86) and p. 251 (Umbria XIV.4.20); and, Reta & Casquero, San Isidoro de Sevilla, p. 184. Further influence may be detected in HL II.14, II.17, II.18, II.20 and II.22. II.23 and II.24, which describe how the Galatians and the etymology of Italy are also influenced by Isidore's Etymologies.

The construction of textual identities and the adaptation, adoption, and manipulation of texts is neither straightforward nor simple. Although the focus of Isidore and Paul the Deacon varied, their aims were similar in respect of the creation and progress of their chosen gentes. Paul as an'assiduous user of sources' was able to bring Isidore to the foreground in the HL on two crucial occasions.[64] As we have noted, Paul provides two readings of the origin story of the Lombards. In the first, he presents a detailed tradition redolent of a northern pagan ambience; but, in the second, familiar to his clerical and intellectual audiences, he not only discounts the story but uses the authority of Isidore to provide a straightforward etymological response. This turn to Isidore, as authority, is illustrative of his use of materials from the Etymologiae in book II of the HL where Isidore is the basis for his comments – but also, at this point, as a rhetorical template for the description of the Italian provinces. Having associated the Lombards with all of Italy, Paul was subsequently free to develop his themes in the remaining four books of the HL.

Although, as we have seen, it is possible to identify the imprint of Isidore's influence in a number of respects in his HR and HL, Paul does not make explicit reference to the authority of Isidore. Similarly, even though one might be tempted to see Paul's excursus on the Italian provinces as a riposte to Isidore's Laus Spaniae, one cannot be certain that Paul knew or consulted Isidore's Historia Gothorum and consequently formulated this digression. Instead, it is possible to indicate that Isidore was one of many authorities that Paul used to enhance his work. In this respect, Isidore's authority allowed Paul to approach and resolve the difficult and uncertain history of the Lombards and to provide his own providential account of his own history and gens.

9 Rylands MS Latin 12

A Carolingian Example of Isidore's Reception into the Patristic Canon

Melissa Markauskas

Introduction

Rylands MS Latin 12 is a homiliary – a collection of readings set for specific occasions during the liturgical calendar – of medium size (295 x 210 mm).[1] It includes some minimally decorated initials, but otherwise is a quite workman-like, practical copy. It was very likely written at the scriptorium at Luxeuil Abbey, which was originally founded in the late sixth century by the Irish monk Columbanus but refounded in the Carolingian period under the Benedictine rule.[2] This is the period in which the core of the manuscript was written.[3] It remained at Luxeuil until at least the eighteenth century, after which it moved from the continent to London, and ultimately to Manchester.[4]

Setting aside the later addition of the first quire, Rylands MS Latin 12 is arranged liturgically and encompasses the entire year, albeit limited to particular saints' festivals within the calendar.[5] The texts excerpted are for the most part what we would term "Patristic", with Bede appearing as the latest identifiable author. Many, but not all, of the manuscript's choices of readings correspond to the so-called Paul the Deacon's Homiliary. One particularly noteworthy variation for the purposes of this volume is the curious inclusion of a high number of excerpts of Isidore of Seville's De Ortu et obitu patrum (hereafter DOOP), a text that was written between 598 and 615 and gives brief accounts of the lives and deaths of a number of figures from the Bible.[6] Isidore combined scriptural material with biblical commentaries and a small number of histories and chronicles to create a sacred chronology focused on the Old Testament.[7] Although by no means one of Isidore's major works, the DOOP did circulate relatively widely, often in combination with other Isidorian works, and was excerpted as a source by compilers of biographical catalogues elsewhere in the early medieval West.[8]

This chapter sheds light on Isidore's reception in the Carolingian period, using this manuscript to consider how and why Isidore would have been re-deployed in this liturgical context. It examines the relationship between the Isidorian material and the other texts with which it was copied in Rylands MS Latin 12 and contextualises the manuscript and the use made of Isidore by reference to Carolingian homiliary production more generally. Discussions of the Carolingian use of Isidore typically focus on his influence on Carolingian historiography.[9] This chapter is instead concerned with Isidore far from the exploits of kings, where he was re-used in a solidly liturgical, monastic context.

Carolingian Homiliaries

Homiliaries as a book-type predate the Carolingian period, but gained wider prominence and production as a highlighted element of Carolingian ecclesiastical reform.[10] In his 802 De Examinandis Ecclesiasticis, Charlemagne listed homilies for all feast days among the minimum required knowledge for all priests.[11] The 813 reform councils of Rheims and Tours make specific reference to the duty to preach 'the sermons and homilies of the Holy Fathers'.[12] The statutes of Riculf, of Hincmar of Rheims, and of another anonymous author recommend that individual copies of Gregory the Great's Homiliae in evangelia be available for every priest,[12] while the statutes of Haito of Basle demand an unspecified homiliary that encompassed each Sunday and feast day throughout the year.[13] Carolingian imperial and conciliar legislation clearly promoted homiliaries as a necessary part of the Carolingian sacerdotal library. However, this promotion has tended to be narrowly interpreted in light of its potential effect on popular preaching, leading scholars to privilege both the pastoral uses of homiliaries and the contemporary composition of homily texts.[14] This focus ignores the fact that Carolingian copies of Patristic homiliaries far outnumber the so-called 'Carolingian' composed homiliaries.[15] Furthermore, it also overlooks that Charlemagne's one commission for a 'state' homiliary,[16] that given to Paul the Deacon, emphasised a correction and revision of the Night Office drawn from the fathers of the Church, an obviously monastic rather than pastoral use.[17]

As noted in the brief overview of its travels offered above, Rylands MS Latin 12 belongs squarely to a monastic context as it spent the first nine centuries of its existence at Luxeuil Abbey. Its correspondences to the content/arrangement of the so-called Paul the Deacon's Homiliary also link the manuscript to a monastic context.[18]

Rylands MS Latin 12

Rylands MS Latin 12 has itself been seldom studied, with James's catalogue entry from the 1920s providing only an incomplete identification of the manuscript's contents.[19] My own investigation began by providing firm identification for all Patristic extracts in the manuscript.[20] Thus, I will begin with a brief analysis of the manuscript's construction, decoration, and arrangement to offer a more comprehensive contextualisation of the Isidorian material within the manuscript. I will then outline the overall parallels between the Rylands MS and Paul the Deacon's Homiliary before turning to the Isidorian material, which appears to be unusual among the family of 'Paul the Deacon'- type homiliaries so far identified.

Rylands MS Latin 12 binds together three main sections that show clear signs of separate production. Its core is the final seventeen quires, which are preceded by an additional six leaves of paper and a medieval first quire. The paper leaves contain an eighteenth-century description of the second and third sections by Dom Victor Perrin (d. 1740), the sub prior of Luxeuil Abbey.[21] He indicates that the homiliary began with Fulgentius of Ruspe (f.ir) in his day, so it is certain that the first quire was part of the manuscript at least by this time. A hand very similar to his has written 'homiliae sanctorum patrum' at the top of f.1r, suggesting that Perrin viewed the second and third sections as a whole. However, as the second section contains no Isidorian material, my discussion will focus mainly on the third and largest section.

Quires two through eighteen contain what is described on f.10v, as a 'Liber de Nataliciis Sanctorum'. Though it does not contain the entire liturgical cycle, the material for the saints' feasts found there is arranged according to the liturgical calendar. The main cycle (ff.10v-96r) progresses from St Stephen on the seventh Kalends of January (Dec 26) to St Thomas the Apostle on the twelfth Kalends of January (Dec 21),[22] followed by three readings that are given for the martyrs (ff.96r4-106v3).[23] Next comes a further cycle of recapitulatia, alternative readings, which are also arranged liturgically from St Agnes to St Thomas the Apostle (ff. 106v4-132r4).[24] The collection concludes with an incomplete copy of Serapion's De Octo Principalibus Vitiis taken from John Cassian (ff.132r5-143v).[25]

The third section of the homiliary is a working copy with minimal decoration. The text in the third section of the homiliary appears in consistent one-column blocks with an average of twenty-nine lines per page. Fifty-three of the sixty-one items begin with rubricated titles, while the other changes of text are indicated with a dot of rubrication in the first letter of the next text[26] or a marginal note.[27] Sometimes there is no indication at all. The textual format for titled items over the first calendrical cycle is usually consistent, with rubric headings listing in order the calendar date,[28] the festal occasion,[29] the gospel from which the homily pericope comes (not always rubricated),[30] the pericope itself (never rubricated),[31] and finally the attributed author.[32] The homily text itself begins with a minimally decorated initial in red and brown-black, the colours of the main text and the rubrication. These initials vary in detail, with few as fine as the initial on f.10v, beginning the first homily. In the remaining items, those described as 'for martyrs' and the recapitularia, the titles omit the calendar date, and more frequently omit the gospel, the pericope, and the author.[33] As a hint towards the manuscript's overall tendencies towards the Isidorian material, which will be discussed later, it is worth noting here that most of the excerpts that omit such details are those taken from the DOOP.

The table of homilies of f.10r lists thirty capitula, listing the saint's or saints' names only and eight numerals for De plurimorum recapitulationibus sanctorum. This table matches the first thirty 'titled' items in the following folios, though it subsumes several paired items under one capitulum. The main hand of f.10v has not filled in attributions for the eight recapitulatia. A further hand has indicated the presence of relevant recapitulatia in the margin beside the foot of related readings in the first cycle.[34] The table of homilies and the recapitularia marginal notes suggest two methods by

Rylands MS Latin 12 and the So-called Paul the Deacon's Homiliary

Despite their use and production being advocated by Carolingian ecclesiastical reforms, Carolingian homiliaries have been relatively little studied and their serious examination has only begun in recent years. It is still true, as McKitterick noted in the 1970s, in reference to Grégoire's Les Homéliaires du Moyen Âge and the homiliaries printed in Migne's Patrologia Latina, that studies of the homiliaries themselves remain at the level of catalogue entries, sacrificing much of the richness of manuscript variance.[35] Barré's Les Homéliaires Carolingiens de l'École d'Auxerre and Grégoire's more recent Homéliaires Liturgiques Médiévaux are invaluable comparisons of most known homiliary collections, but they are by necessity selective rather than exhaustive in their use of manuscripts.[36]

Barre and Grégoire offer indices for the extracts chosen in many Merovingian and Carolingian homiliary collections which pre-date Rylands MS Latin 12.[37] The Rylands MS contains none of the Auxerrois 'Carolingian'-composed homilies, and parallels between the patristic sources reproduced in the Auxerrois homiliaries are few. Among the earlier homiliaries investigated by Grégoire, only Paul the Deacon's Homiliary offers significant parallels with Rylands MS Latin 12 sharing almost thirty of its sixty-eight homiletic items.[38] The homiliary of Agimond has the next most concordances: a mere four. The Roman homiliary known as that of Alan of Farfa offers only two.[39] There are no parallels between Rylands MS Latin 12 and the two seventh-century Luxeuil lectionnaires considered by Grégoire.[40] Grégoire also noted that while homiliary collections before the Carolingian reforms show substantial overlap amongst themselves in terms of their text selections, the collection he termed that of Paul the Deacon showed almost total divergence, suggesting a significant difference in liturgical practice following the Carolingian reforms.[41] Rylands MS Latin 12 confirms this trend.

There has not yet been a critical study investigating the manuscript tradition of Paul the Deacon's Homiliary.[42] Thus, it is impossible to comment on whether the copyist of Rylands MS Latin 12 had access to any particular copy.[43] The homiliary appears in Migne's Patralogia Latina, reprinting a 1539 Cologne version that includes a homily cycle 'de tempore' of 202 items followed by another 'de sanctis' of 96 items.[44] Migne's version is obviously interpolated as it includes the later ninth-century homiliaries of Haimo and Heiric of Auxerre. The un-interpolated version proposed by Wiegand in the late nineteenth century remains authoritative, with a trimmer 244 items, 110 items in the winter section, and ninety-nine in the summer section, which also included a further thirty-five 'generic' items to be used commonly for saints' feasts.[45] The most recent account of the homiliary, by Grégoire, does not substantially alter Wiegand's list aside from more recent textual identifications and some altered capitula.[46]

Despite the substantial differences between the versions edited by Migne and Wiegand, twenty-four of the Rylands extracts correspond to the same-titled extracts in both versions,[47] with a slightly greater number of odd items matching in the Wiegand[48] edition compared to Migne's.[49] As Rylands MS Latin 12 focuses on saints' feasts, it is not surprising that most (though not all) of the concordances are found in Migne's 'de sanctis' cycle or the saints commonly found in Wiegand.[50] In Victor Perrin's eighteenth-century description of the manuscript, he suggested that Luxeuil had presumably once had another codex covering the festivals related to Jesus Christ and the mysteries, as these are entirely omitted by Rylands MS Latin 12.

This will allow for a better understanding of the relative uniqueness of particular extract selections amongst this corpus. At an early stage of research, Guiliano indicated in personal correspondence that Isidorian material is rare among such homiliaries.

Grégoire, Homéliaires, 427. Further explanation of this difference is another line of enquiry frustrated by the lack of a concordance between Paul the Deacon manuscripts. On their choice of manuscripts, see Wiegand, Homiliarum, 5-12; Grégoire, Homéliaires, 425-426.

As noted earlier, the homilies of quires II-XVII follow two cycles of a calendar of saints. This calendar is more expansive than the one employed by any of the reconstructed editions of Paul the Deacon's Homiliary, but it shares substantial parallels with that calendar. In comparison with Wiegand's edition, the Rylands MS celebrates almost all the saints' feasts that appear in Paul's homiliary,[51] with only three feasts absent, that of St Cyprian and two additional Marian feasts, her purification and birth.[52] As noted above, Grégoire's edition expands some of Wiegand's capitula. His edition includes St Martin 'or another confessor', where Wiegand has only 'saint' or 'confessor'[53] and St Felicitas 'or another female saint'. [56] Migne also omits Cyprian and shares with Rylands Latin 12 five additional feasts not included in Wiegand's edition,[54] with feasts for St Felicitas, Mary Magdalene and Luke the Evangelist appearing in Migne alone. In addition to these common feasts, the Rylands MS also includes feasts for the apostle Simon Zelotes and Judas, St Agatha of Sicily, the exaltatio of the holy Cross, St Germanus of Paris, St Medardus of Noyons, St Martin of Tours, St Denis and the martyr saints Crispin and Crispinan. Item III.7 in the Rylands MS, for St Agatha, is a text that appears in Migne and Wiegand's editions, where it is set simply for a virgin.[55] It would be impossible to say whether the template for Paul the Deacon's original homiliary, which was a state project and sponsored by the Carolingians, was intended to be as freely adapted as it has been in Rylands MS Latin 12. However, the homilies incorporated a range of material on saints, martyrs, virgins and confessors and therefore do offer scope for selective and creative adaptatation.

The copyist also included material that cannot be matched to any of the published Paul the Deacon templates, and several of the new inclusions substitute different material for feasts explicitly named in Paul the Deacon's Homiliary. Between Wiegand and Migne's frameworks, there are a possible eight items listed as suitable for the veneration of the Holy Innocents. However, Rylands MS Latin 12 has a ninth reading at item III.5, a portion of Jerome's Commentarii in euangelium Matthaei. Disparities such as this may explain why the present first quire was added to the original homiliary manuscript as many of the additions in the first quire correspond to 'missing' Paul the Deacon's Homiliary entries (see appendices for details).

Items in the Rylands MS that cannot be matched to either edition of Paul the Deacon's Homiliary include extracts from Augustine's In Iohannis evangelium tractatus and his sermons, Jerome's Commentarii in euangelium Matthaei and his De Viris Illustribus, Gregory of Tours' Liber in gloria martyrum, Rufinus' Latin translations of Eusebius' Historia Ecclesiastica. The most frequent new addition, however, is Isidore's DOOP.

Before moving on to a discussion of how often and in what ways Isidore's text was used in this manuscript, it is worth noting that almost all of the above texts have also all been excerpted in one or other of the editions of Paul the Deacon's Homiliary, and this includes Isidore's DOOP. This may suggest that when the copyist inserted different readings, he or she chose to turn to the texts that Paul the Deacon had already vetted as suitable for extraction when compiling his homiliary. However, more importantly, it implies that whomever compiled the texts copied in Rylands MS Latin 12 had access not only to some sort of exemplar of Paul the Deacon's Homiliary, but also access to some of the full texts from which he took his 'homilies'.[56]

Isidore in Rylands Latin MS 12

Rylands MS Latin 12 includes ten excerpts from Isidore's DOOP. The manuscript only makes use of his account of a number of New Testament figures.

[56] On the contents of Carolingian libraries, see McKitterick, Carolingians and the Written Word, 166-196. For homiliaries in particular, see Deleeuw, 'Gregory the Great's "Homilies on the Gospels"', 860-865. Cf. McKitterick, 'Cambridge, Corpus Christi College MS 334', 201: 'The Homiliary [of Paul the Deacon] itself witnesses to the transmission and circulation of knowledge of particular patristic authors and their works within the Carolingian world.'

There are three excerpts in the main cycle of the readings: those for John the Evangelist, James the Lesser and Philip. They are all included following a longer text from an earlier patristic author: coincidentally the same in each case, Augustine's In Iohannis evangelium tractatus.

The main cycle includes the only extract for which I have located a parallel in any of the homiliary types listed by Barré or Grégoire. This is item four in the Rylands' manuscript's third section (DOOP, 72) which is item 31 in the Wiegand framework (as printed by Gregoire) and does not appear at all in Migne's version. This short paragraph of bibliographical material about John the Evangelist is the only extract from Isidore's DOOP listed by Barré or Grégoire. It is one of only two correspondences between Rylands MS Latin 12 and the so-called homiliary of Alan of Farfa (Gregoire, 145-148). It is also repeated in the homiliary of Eginon (Gregoire, 198), considered to be quite closely related to the previous homiliary type.

In general, Isidore is poorly represented among Merovingian and Carolingian homiliaries. The Alan of Farfa homiliary contains extracts from Isidore's De ecclesiasticis officiis (Gregoire, 155-56), De fide catholica contra Iudaeos (Gregoire, 157-8, 171) and the Sententiae (Gregoire, 180). These are six extracts in a work that totals over one hundred and fifty items. These six exactly are repeated in the quite closely related homiliary of Eginon. (Gregoire, 198, 204, 206, 210, 216). The homiliary of St Peter of the Vatican repeats four from this group (Gregoire, 233-34, 241, 244), and those of Ottobeuren and of Agimond repeat just one of these same readings, albeit different ones (Gregoire, 338, 379). Gregoire's account of Paul the Deacon's Homiliary also includes one further Isidorian excerpt, although this is a different extract from De ecclesiasticis officiis than that which is found in the other homiliary types, which are far more closely related to one another (Gregoire, 433). This makes for only two Isidorian extracts among several hundred entries. The ten extracts from Isidore in Rylands MS Latin 12, just under one-sixth of the total number of entries in the manuscript's original homiliary core, mean that it is unusually rich in its use of Isidore.

In the recapitulationes, a secondary cycle of readings in the Rylands manuscript, Isidore is better represented, with seven excerpts: under John the Baptist, St Paul, James the Greater, Jude, Simon the Zealot, Andrew and Thomas. Five of these appear as texts in their own right rather than simply following on from another author. This second cycle covers roughly nineteen percent of the original homilary core, some forty-nine sides of parchment. The Isidorian material in the recapitulationes, seven out of eighteen texts, makes up only around seven percent of this already comparatively smaller section. In part, this is surely because Isidore's text comprises short, pithy chapters on each biblical figure, but it is also part of a broader trend where the Isidorian material seems to be judged worthy of inclusion in this collection, but is treated as of secondary importance to other authors.

A comparison with Gregory the Great, another author with substantial numbers of extracts in this manuscript, illustrates this point. As noted above, Gregory the Great's homilies themselves were sometimes considered to be the only homiliary collection that a Carolingian cleric needed. Gregory's homilies are substantial texts in their own right in contrast with the brief biographical entries that made up Isidore's DOOP. Covering over thirty percent of the original homiliary core, there are more lines from Gregory in Rylands MS Latin 12 than any other author. However, this manuscript has exactly the same number of extracts from Gregory as from Isidore, ten each, with only Jerome having a greater number with ten extracts from his commentary on Matthew and a single extract from his De Viris Illustribus.

The use made of Isidorian material in this manuscript is comparable to a few other authors in this collection. For example, short extracts from Gregory of Tours' Liber in gloria martyrum and Rufinus' Latin translation of Eusebius of Caesarea's Historia Ecclesiastica are included in the main cycle only after a longer text. However, although their use is similar, the compiler of this manuscript reached for Isidore's text far more frequently than Gregory of Tours or Rufinus, who are only represented by three items each. Thus, while Isidore may be second-string, his text is definitely preferred to others on that lower level.

The extracts from Isidore are also visually relegated to a second level, below the more typical Patristic authors such as Gregory the Great, Augustine, or Jerome. Entries in the main cycle typically begin with a rubricated line listing the date, the saint and the particular gospel from which that day's reading is taken. This is followed by a gospel pericope and a further rubric listing the patristic author's name. Despite the frequent recourse to the DOOP, Isidore's name does not appear within Rylands MS Latin 12.

The Isidorian extracts, along with those of Gregory of Tours and of Rufinus, are often barely distinguishable from the text that precedes them. A squiggle mid-line is sometimes present to mark the break in texts, but at other times, no indication is given at all. Isidore's entries among the recapitulationes are clearly distinguished from the preceding text by a rubricated title, but these titles only indicate the saint that the extract concerns. Even among the recapitulationes, 'Patristic' authors like Augustine or Bede are named in a rubric. One exception to this is the extract from Jerome's De Viris Illustribus. While Jerome is otherwise usually named in the rubric, here his text seems to be treated similarly to Isidore and the other 'second-string' texts. Perhaps this can be explained by the encyclopedic nature of this particular text, in contrast with the more obviously exegetical content of the commentary on Matthew from which all other Jerome extracts in this manuscript derive.

The fact that Isidore's name is not associated with the extracts from the DOOP is striking. Carolingian texts do not always explicitly signal their Patristic contents, but this manuscript does indicate a Patristic author in most cases. The DOOP therefore does not seem to be classified as the work of a church father. This suggests that Isidore was not considered to lie within the top bracket of past authorities for Carolingian copyists, although the material that he had included in the DOOP was judged to be useful by the manuscript's compiler.[57]

Isidore's De ortu et obitu patrum in the Carolingian Period

This chapter concludes with some brief comments about how this manuscript fits into the broader Carolingian reception of Isidore, and in particular, the DOOP. A homiliary is a text with a liturgical context, so the focus in this manuscript on readings that expound on the gospel verse for a particular saint's day – the longer texts like those of Gregory the Great, Augustine, and Jerome – makes obvious sense. However, we can also see value placed on more explanatory material about the saint's life and death, which is exactly the sort of material Isidore's DOOP provides. This might help to explain the attractiveness of his text in this Carolingian milieu.

Another text roughly contemporary with this manuscript makes significant use of Isidore's DOOP: the universal chronicle of the ninth century historian Bishop Freculf of Lisieux.[58] Written in the second quarter of the ninth century and dedicated to Charles the Bald, Charlemagne's grandson, its twelve books cover all history from creation to the author's own day. Yet, while Freculf sometimes takes Isidore's details as the starting point for further elaboration on the lives of Biblical figures, Rylands MS Latin 12 adheres strictly to Isidore's text. Freculf also does not reference Isidore's name explicitly when he makes use of DOOP even when he quotes from it rather than paraphrasing, although he does name other authorities such as Jerome. An examination of Freculf's chronicle shows us that, as with the Rylands manuscript, Freculf used Isidore as a source of data rather than as an authority.

[57] Here we might draw a comparison with Laura Carlson's chapter elsewhere in this volume, which demonstrates the frequent use the Opus Carolii made of Isidore's writings, although with more frequent attribution. In contrast, Christopher Heath's chapter on Paul the Deacon's historical writings suggests unacknowledged borrowing from Isidore.

[58] Allen, 'Fréculfe de Lisieux', 59-79.

Finally, coming back to the manuscript itself, Rylands Latin MS 12 shows significant medieval wear, including the re-writing of several passages in fresh ink where the original script had worn away. Occasionally, the rubrication has been copied over in blue, perhaps to remedy fading.[59] Far more frequently, the main text itself appears to have been re-copied by tracing over the original lettering in a darker ink. This is particularly visible over ff. 86v-88v, with another interesting example at f. 11r2 where the descender of quin can be just barely discerned from beneath a later scribe's cum. The leaf 11r-12v also shows one of several stitching repairs in the manuscript.[60] On f. 103r, the same portion of original text is copied once over the original text space and again, in a different hand, in a marginal note. Re-copyings like this complicate the identification of the manuscript's hands. In the only palaeographic study of the manuscript, Jones suggested that quires II-XVIII are the work of a single ninth-century scribe, except for f. 10r and f. 21v, which are a table of homily capitula and the conclusion of the homily for St Agnes and beginning of the homily for St Agatha, respectively.[61] The different hand on f. 21v might be explained by a later scribe engaged in re-copying, particularly as this is the only folio on which a homily begins that involves absolutely no rubrication. The main hand on f. 10r may also be a later addition, a table of capitula composed on what had initially been a blank fly-leaf.

These indications suggest that the MS enjoyed use by readers concerned with the preservation of the text over a substantial period of time. This shows that this manuscript experienced significant use in the monastery. It was not a copy set aside for special occasions or display; it was clearly being used, and, given the broader context and purpose of homiliaries in this period, it seems a safe assumption that this use involved reading aloud to a monastic community. Thus, curiously, Isidore's encyclopedic text seems to have found a place in the Carolingian liturgy. His name might not have been considered worthy of rememberance, but Isidore's words were apparently exactly what the unknown Carolingian compiler at Luxeuil and subsequent users were looking for.

[60] Another example can be found at f.56. The Rylands MS shares these stitching repairs with the other Luxeuil manuscripts discussed by Jones, 'Victor Perrin', 178.

Appendix 1 Full Manuscript Description of Rylands MS Latin 12

Listed for each item is the encompassing folio(s), the quire number,[62] the hand, and a suggestion for the hand's date.[63]

For items in the two medieval sections (II & III), incipits and excipts are also provided as well as the item's identified original source and parallels between the MS and the various editions of Paul the Deacon's Homiliary where these exist.

Bold text in the following indicates rubrication in the manuscript.

10 Adoption, Adaptation, & Authority

The Use of Isidore in the Opus Caroli

Laura Carlson

The art historian Ernst Kitzinger once framed the period between the fourth and the ninth centuries as one overwhelmed with talk about images.[1] The eighth century certainly would seem to illustrate his case. The adoption and subsequent abandonment of Iconoclasm by the Byzantine Empire rekindled a long-standing debate about the appropriateness of imagery in Christian worship throughout the Mediterranean world, engaging not only the Byzantines, but also the papacy and the emergent Carolingian Empire. The formal repeal of Iconoclasm at the 787 Second Council of Nicaea produced not one but two Carolingian treatises that explicitly discussed and rejected Byzantine image theory. Both treatises, the earlier, and now lost, Capitulare adversus Synodum and the later Opus Caroli regis Contra Synodum (often referred to as the Libri Carolini), often are contextualized as 'response' texts, written specifically to combat the conclusions reached at Nicaea, where the Byzantines revealed a new image-inclusive spiritual policy.[2] That Nicaea was the instigation behind these two texts cannot be denied; however, the presumed centrality of image theory in the Opus Caroli can obscure the broader insight it (and presumably the lost Capitulare) provides on the emergent linguistic philosophy within the Carolingian intellectual world. Yes, the Opus Caroli was written to combat a new Byzantine perspective of the spiritual worth of images, but in doing so it advocated a specifically Carolingian understanding of language, reflective of a growing incorporation of the etymological and linguistic philosophy of classical, late antique, and early medieval writers, specifically Isidore of Seville. The core of the Opus Caroli is not images, but language.

What has often been called the working copy of the Opus Caroli (Vaticanus Latinus 7207) clearly once commanded considerable attention at the Carolingian court. At least four distinct hands worked on the text, resulting in over 3,400 distinct corrections as well as marginal notes in Tironian shorthand.[3] Although this early manuscript lacks a title, preface, or the majority of Book One, a later, more complete, and polished manuscript (Paris, Bibliothéque de l'Arsenal, MS 663) attributes the work to Charlemagne ('The Work of Charles against the Synod'), a textual example of the Frankish king's spiritual as well as political sphere of influence. The significance of this attribution is rarely commented upon but it should serve to indicate the text's one-time prominence within the Carolingian intellectual world.[4] The attachment of Charlemagne's name to the text provided a broader cultural and geopolitical context for the image debate, in which the Carolingians (as a whole) dismissed the cultural, political, and theological legitimacy of Byzantium.[5] Analysing the text is daunting due to its size (four books of 120 chapters); however, its heft provides unparalleled access to a singular attempt at representing Carolingian linguistic and semiotic theory. The text's predominant author, Theodulf of Orléans, worked largely as a ghost-writer (his name does not appear in any of the extant manuscripts), accorded the responsibility of demonstrating the superiority of Carolingian spiritual ideology to that of the Byzantines.[6] Such an ideology was not an inclusive one. Similarly seen in attitudes towards the pagan Saxons or the Spanish Adoptionists, blanket condemnation and even violence were frequent tools of enforcing Carolingian interpretations of Christianity.[7] Accordingly, this chapter will not examine Theodulf's (and, by proxy, the Carolingians') mastery of Byzantine theology, but instead will analyse his explanation of Carolingian image theory in terms of its milieu of the late eighth century Carolingian intellectual world. Theodulf's denigration of the Greek Patriarchate, the Byzantine imperial court, and overall Greek intellectual society might be usefully understood as a 'straw man' argument, in which the Byzantines acted as a foil for the author to present and promote a Carolingian linguistic philosophy nascent within the international community of scholars at Charlemagne's court. This task was underpinned by geopolitical resonance as the Carolingians worked to establish themselves politically, militarily, and spiritually as the true successors of Rome.

Prior to an examination of the Opus Caroli's linguistic arguments, it is worth discussing the means by which the text rejects the authority and conclusions of the 787 Council of Nicaea. Early medieval conciliar authority traditionally rested on two intersecting arguments: horizontal and vertical. The vertical approach invoked the historic authority of the Christian church, referencing both the received transmission of scripture and the inspired authority of patristic authors. In contrast, the horizontal appeal rested in current ecclesiastical authority, traditionally the pentarchy of ancient patriarchates (Jerusalem, Alexandria, Antioch, Constantinople, and Rome) and decisions made within ecumenical councils.[8] The Opus Caroli relies heavily on the vertical argument, condemning the council of 787 for wilfully departing from received patristic and Bible authority.[9] Numerous chapters of the work allude to the prohibition of image worship based on these precedents (e.g. Book I, chapters 12, 14, and 26). Interestingly, however, the Opus Caroli lacks any invocation to horizontal arguments, that is, appeals to current ecclesiastical authority, such as the Pope or recent church councils. Thomas Noble has surmised the prominent absence of this form of argument might be rooted in Pope Hadrian's refusal to side with the Carolingians against the 787 Council, rendering them unable to invoke current ecclesiastical authority. The Carolingians may also have taken an even more extreme approach: rejecting the 787 Council's status as a valid ecumenical council outright, claiming that it was neither catholic nor universal (as they pointedly noted they had not been invited).[10] By stripping the 787 Council of its status as ecumenical, the Carolingians simultaneously removed its 'horizontal' authority, that is, any ability to dictate or define appropriate Christian practice.

Theodulf's vertical arguments also may be linked to the broader circumstances of the dissemination of the Acts of the 787 Council to the Carolingian court. Ironically, the Carolingians' condemnation rested on a poorly translated copy of the Byzantine Council. Papal representatives who attended Nicaea in 787 provided the papal archives with a copy of the conciliar acts in Greek, to be later translated into Latin. Although the name of the scribe given this task has been lost to history, the effects of his poor translation attempt endure. The Greek Acts reveal the Byzantines' careful demarcation in vocabulary between worship (latreia, a term applicable exclusively to the worship of God) and reverence (prokynesis, a widely used term related to the action of "bowing down") when referring to images, advocating the latter as an appropriate Christian attitude toward religious imagery. The distinction between 'worship' and 'reverence', so carefully demarcated in the Greek, was removed from the Latin translation. Both prokynesis and latreia were translated indiscriminately as either adorare or osculauri, denuding the Acts' original and purposeful vocabulary choices. The reasons behind the poor translation can never be known or why the Carolingians, when receiving this Latin version, accepted the text as a genuine reflection of Byzantine image policy. Regardless, it was this Latin text on which the Carolingians (i.e. Theodulf) based the predominant arguments of the Opus Caroli.[11] But, as mentioned above, Theodulf's arguments should not be judged on the basis of their adequacy in representing the Byzantine position, as the Carolingians were rarely interested in expressing their enemies' views correctly.[12] Instead, we should focus on how Theodulf constructs these linguistic arguments in light of the wider context of the Carolingian intellectual world. Within this context, Theodulf's heavy incorporation of Isidore of Seville comments not only upon Isidore's increasing influence within the Carolingian literate world, but also speaks to a nascent consideration of linguistic philosophy among the intellectual elite, one that indicated a developing formal relationship between the study of language and Christian doctrine throughout the early medieval Mediterranean.

Isidore of Seville and the 'Spanish' Presence at the Carolingian Court

Study of the Latin language, both from a grammatical and philosophical perspective, reached new heights in the Carolingian court during the late eighth century. As Peter of Pisa and Alcuin of York turned to writing new technical grammars, they embraced an emergent sense of the higher purpose of linguistic study, in which the traditional disciplines of the trivium (grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic) could be applied to biblical study.[13] These writers, in addition to later ninth century intellectuals such as Hrabanus Maurus and John Scottus Eriugena have often been cited as the turning point for the development of early medieval grammatical discourse: the years after them are marked with vocational grammars increasingly absorbing other disciplines, especially dialectic, mythology, theology, and biblical exegesis.[14] Yet these developments stemmed from a markedly increased recognition of the spiritual ramifications of etymological and linguistic theory, rooted largely in the works of Isidore of Seville.

Isidore's most influential text, the Etymologiae, not only provided an 'encyclopaedic' approach to knowledge (discussing everything from geography to military tactics), but was also a means of understanding knowledge itself via a Christianization of the secular liberal arts. This work is one of the largest distinguishable influences on Theodulf's arguments in the Opus Caroli. Although neither Isidore nor the Etymologiae is mentioned by name in the text, Ann Freeman's work revealed over seventy direct references to phrasing and vocabulary from the Etymologiae within the Opus Caroli, a number almost commensurate to biblical or exegetical references in the text.[15] What these references reveal is that Isidore was a model for both Theodulf's content and methodology on language in the Opus Caroli. Theodulf appropriated a range of topics from the Etymologiae, more than half of his references to Isidore relate specifically to the topics of language, largely from the first two books of the Etymologiae, those related to the trivium (grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic).[16] The similarities between the dialectical and syllogistic reasoning in the Opus Caroli and these sections of the Etymologiae are striking, suggesting Theodulf's familiarity with the text. Simultaneously, these books provided Theodulf with extensive authoritative reasoning advocating the importance of language over images, using inherited linguistic philosophy adopted from classical and late antique writers such as Aristotle, Augustine, and Boethius. An epistemological explanation of language, as defined by the Etymologiae, underpinned Theodulf's arguments against the Greeks.

Theodulf's awareness and subscription to Isidore of Seville extends beyond the Opus Caroli, going so far as to append Isidore's Chronicon to his biblical manuscripts.[17] Theodulf's preference for Isidore as a Christian authority has also been suggested to stem from Theodulf's perception of their shared Iberian origins. Theodulf's sympathies for his fellow countrymen is marked in other examples of his work: a reference to Prudentius as 'noster et ipse parens' suggests a Spanish origin as well as a reference in a poem to Charlemagne, 'Annuit is mihi qui sum inmensis casibus exul'.[18] Although Theodulf believed (albeit erroneously) he shared a Visigothic heritage with Isidore as well as a well-developed antipathy for the Greek world, no specific allusion to Isidore's distrust for the Byzantines can be found in the Opus Caroli.[19] Interestingly, despite his prominence Isidore is never cited explicitly by name; that honour is reserved for a precious few patristic and classical authorities (i.e. Aristotle, Apuleius, Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, Boethius, and Gregory the Great). Freeman postulated these writers held such authority within both the eastern and western medieval worlds that invocation of their works commanded unqualified assent.[20] Theodulf's decision not to include Isidore in these ranks may indicate an assumption that his works were relatively unknown in the Byzantine world. Although access to and appreciation of Isidore's texts had increased markedly in the Carolingian literate world in recent decades, his work did not convey the same authority as those of Aristotle or Augustine. Though explicit reference to Isidore may be lacking, the pervasiveness of his works in the Opus Caroli indicates their availability in the Carolingian world.[21]

Byzantine Error and Isidore's Theory of Language

The Greek misunderstanding of language, both in its technical form (e.g. grammar) and in its role in Christian theology (e.g. the understanding of the Bible and patristic writing) underpins Theodulf's wide-sweeping attacks on the Byzantines; a profound error at the root of Greek society.[22] Theodulf embarks on an extended discussion of language: its origin, its ability to communicate God's law, and its role in human development. Theodulf and Isidore share a common approach to language as a predominantly human, as opposed to a divine, institution. Within the Etymologiae, Isidore refers to words '[having been] established by the ancients' either according to nature or by whim (secundum placitum).[23] This adhered to an emergent form of naturalism in terms of the Christian understanding of language as a human invention. Although other classical philosophical views of naturalism had led to the dismissal of language as a 'conventional' institution, in which words and their meanings were subject to change and variation according to culture or time, Isidore's (and by proxy Theodulf's) linguistic naturalism gave language a permanence rooted in Christianity. Despite its human origins, God had allowed language to accurately reflect elements of His creation. Such a philosophy was derived from Genesis 2:19, in which God accorded Adam the responsibility of naming all creatures on Earth, and man provided the first linguistic link between word (the signifier) and object (the signified): 'Now the Lord God had formed out of the ground all the wild animals and all the birds in the sky. He brought them to the man to see what he would name them; and whatever the man called each living creature, that was its name.' God's approval of Adam's names for creation instilled a semi-divine nature to language: its human origins had been transformed and elevated to having a fundamental and inseparable tie to reality. Language was thus established as an eternal institution: words and their meanings were fused irrevocably. To change or misappropriate the meaning of a word was to disrespect God's blessing of human language. Theodulf invokes this link when condemning the Greeks for their idolatrous mistake in confusing and conflating two different words in reference to the worship of images (adorare and osculari):

[22] Arguments against the Greeks based on language can be found as early as Book I, Chapter 1, in which Theodulf attacks Constantine and Irene for claiming to 'co-reign' with God. This argument develops into an exposition on language according to the pseudo-Augustinian Categoriae about the three modes of speech. Theodulf of Orleans, Opus Caroli, pp. 106-108.

[23] "Non autem omnia nomina a veteribus secundum naturam imposita sunt, sed quaedam, et secundum placitum." Isidore augments this understanding with the origin of written words in the Hebrew language, which he derives ultimately from the Law transmitted by Moses. Isidore, ed. Lindsay, Etymologiae I.29.2-4; trans. Barney, Lewis, et al. The Etymologies, p. 39.

> And it is clear that "osculum" and "adorationem" are the names of two [different] things. For how can there be unity in the names as much as in sense, when there is such a difference in their meaning? Or why can't the words be different in sense, when the origins of the words are different when said aloud? For things are not created according to their names, but names are created according to things, nor should it be believed that things are fitted to names, but more often that names are fitted to things, since all living things were brought to the first man by God, so that he might see what he would call these things [as he saw them], the names were chosen; for the same father of the human race (Adam) gave names to the material world created by God. He did not look at material objects [res] that were brought before him in order to apply names themselves which he had created [previously].[24]

God's permission for man to provide names for all of creation solidified the relationship between a representation of the world (i.e. language) and the world itself. Isidore's search for etymological origins stemmed from a common patristic belief that Latin contained the fundamental linguistic elements of this original 'Edenic' language, Hebrew.[25] This link between language and Edenic purity allowed any sacred language (Hebrew, Greek, or Latin) to link to something beyond itself: to God's plan for humanity. In Christian epistemology, this allowed for language to remain a vehicle for accurate communication between man and God, expressed most fully in scripture.[26] Idolatry, the worship of images, violated this sacred relationship. Only words, a human invention blessed by God, could adequately express God's message to humanity. Images, as purely man-made creations, could never hope to rival this connection. To worship images was to worship only the world: man-made images could not possibly rival the allegorical and multi-layered nature of Scripture. Having been sanctioned by God, the Bible represented the deepest and most perfect expression of God's law, accessible on an infinite number of symbolic and allegorical layers. In confusing the words of worship (osculari and adorare), the Greeks were forgetting the fundamental link between linguistic 'symbols' and an external divinely-ordered reality. To confuse two words particularly in reference to worship was to deny the proper relationship that joined man and God via language.

Aut cur non possint vocabula differri in sensu, cum possint vocabulorum origines differri in actu? Non enim res sunt conditae propter nomina, sed nomina propter res, nec credendum est, ut res aptentur nominibus, sed nomina potius aptentur rebus, quoniam et protoplasto animantia adducta a Domino fuisse, ut videret, quid vocaret ea, leguntur; rebus enim a Deo conditis idem humani generis pater nomina dedit, non nominibus a se conditis res, quibus ipsa nomina inderet, ad se adductas perspexit. [26] See Mary Beagon's chapter in this volume for additional information on the Christian understanding of Adam's conferral of names to mankind.

In the Opus Caroli, Theodulf, successor to Isidore's etymological approach, bases language in an extra-verbal authority (i.e. God), which guarantees the connection between word and reality.[27] Exemplified by the biblical account of Moses receiving God's law on Mt. Sinai, the proper relationship between man and God is via words, not images. Not via painting, Theodulf argues, but in writing, did humanity receive God's law. On those tablets were not images but apices or letters, which are the 'signs for things', a phrase at the heart of Isidore's Etymologiae:

> And thus forty days after the immolation of the lamb and the crossing of the Red Sea "the Lord descending on Mount Sinai" gave the law to Moses not in pictures but writing, and delivered "in written stone" not in images but in the form of letters, which are signs for things or the [physical marks] for the words which have been assigned [to them].[28]

The 'Isidorian' definition of language Theodulf provides echoes throughout the Opus Caroli and roots Theodulf's justification of Carolingian opposition to the Greeks. Although seemingly minor, Theodulf's invocation of Isidore's etymological approach to language marks a significant development in the intellectual Christian world, as Davide del Bello states: '[Isidore's work provided] an etymological account of both the world and language, of the world as language'.[29] Although the theory of etymological inquiry as a means of understanding reality was certainly not unique to Isidore, the popularity of his Etymologiae, which combined a Christian encyclopaedic knowledge with this theory of etymological inquiry, marked a new Christian linguistic philosophy emergent within early medieval intellectual circles. Theodulf's incorporation of this philosophy within the Opus Caroli, a purposeful representation of Carolingian Christian philosophy, should be understood as a significant turning point in the acceptance and promotion of this approach to language within the early medieval world.

The Christian Encyclopaedia and the Spiritual Implications of Language

Isidore's adherence to a form of linguistic naturalism, that language has some permanent connection to reality, is evident in the philosophy that drives his most popular work, the Etymologiae. Isidore's etymological accounts imply a belief in the worthwhile knowledge that can be gleaned from a word's meaning or roots. Yet this philosophy was by no means widespread as an integral component of Christian learning. Rather, this text should be contextualized by the developing treatment of classical linguistic philosophy within Christian intellectual circles. A linguistic philosophy advocating naturalism or the benefits of etymological inquiry can be found in numerous classical and late antique writers, such as Plato's Cratylus (fifth century BCE), Aristotle's De Interpretatione (fourth century BCE), Varro's De Lingua Latina (second-first century BCE), and Quintilian's Institutio Oratoria (late first century CE).[30] Yet an inherent relationship between language and existence was not one universally accepted by the early Christian intellectual community. In his Principia Dialecticae, Augustine largely dismissed the use of etymological inquiry for the purposes of spiritual study. He refused to acknowledge the validity of the search for the true 'etymon', arguing, 'Discerning the origin of words is like the interpretation of dreams; it is a matter of each man's ingenuity'.[31] Augustine rejected the use of grammatical science for the purposes of discovering the origins and uses of words and, by association, any fundamental link between language and existence.[32] Although not widely popular in the patristic world, the seventh and eighth centuries reveal a much wider acceptance of etymological inquiry, perhaps most prominently demonstrated by the Etymologiae's popularity, but more broadly in the transmission and transcription of other works advocating its use within Christian study. The Principia Dialecticae, in which Augustine rejected etymological study, was largely unknown or rarely copied during this period. Although Theodulf may have known of it, only one phrase from the Opus Caroli has been linked to the text.[33] Instead, a popular pseudo-Augustinian text, the Categoriae Decem (often known by its alternate title, the Paraphrasis Themistiana), was far more influential in determining early medieval understanding of Augustinian etymological theory, a text which ironically supported the philosophical relevance of etymological study, based largely on the linguistic philosophy of Aristotle, who was enormously influential in his posited relationship between language and reality.[34]

[30] Varro's lost work Disciplinarum libri IX would also presumably be in this category.

If the seventh and eighth centuries mark a new approach to linguistic philosophy, particularly the 'naturalism' suggested by Isidore, this philosophy should be broadly compared with the overall role of linguistic study within Christian education. In addition to the first purpose-written etymological text of the early medieval period, Isidore's Etymologiae also has been considered a benchmark in the development of the medieval Christian encyclopaedia. As Jacques Fontaine has indicated, the formation of a text such as the Etymologiae represented more than a random synthesis of divine and worldly knowledge.[35] Both Isidore and other early encyclopaedists, such as Cassiodorus with his Institutiones (mid-sixth century), derived the structure and philosophy of their work from the classical episteme: 'a way of knowing, conditions of knowing and how these conditions determine the object of knowledge'.[36] Isidore's approach to his subject(s), arranging his material according to the trivium and quadrivium, evoked the aims of the classical enkyklios paideia: to discuss the full range of subjects appropriate for comprehensive knowledge, stimulus for the eventual development of the traditional medieval curriculum.[37] In Book I of the Etymologiae, this approach to language and knowledge is made purposefully clear: 'A discipline (disciplina) takes its name from "learning" (discere), when it can also be called "knowledge" (scientia)'.[38] Especially resonant in this area were the disciplines of the trivium (grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic), in which the study of language itself could yield knowledge and understanding about the world.[39] The theory of the use of secular disciplines such as the trivium within a Christian setting should be distinguished from the etymological inquiry and linguistic naturalism also at the heart of Isidore's work. The acceptance and perceived benefit of the secular disciplines was one suggested in patristic writings, notably by Augustine.

Augustine's rejection of etymological inquiry in the Principia Dialecticae may appear incongruent with his apparent support for the use of the liberal arts in Christian contexts, as argued in his De Doctrina Christiana. But although the ideas are related, they should be considered distinct, particularly in terms of changing perspectives on the two within the early medieval Christian intellectual world. Although Augustine rejected etymological inquiry as a philosophical basis for knowledge of existence, he did support the application of the trivium (grammar, rhetoric, dialectic) as a means of better understanding scripture. Augustine's De Doctrina Christiana advocated a new perspective on the Bible as the epitome of eloquence, in which all modes and methods of speech were most fully realized, 'The literary-minded should be aware that our Christian authors used all the figures of speech which teachers of grammar call by their Greek names of tropes [...] Those who know about these tropes recognize them in sacred literature and to some extent helps them in understanding it...'.[40]

In the centuries following Augustine, the acceptance of pagan disciplines such as the trivium did not always indicate a similar appropriation of the philosophical implications of etymological inquiry. The growth of early medieval Christian linguistic treatises often evoked Augustine's approach to the liberal arts within the De Doctrina Christiana, as opposed to the Categoriae Decem. Study of technical aspects of language (e.g. grammar, tropes, etc.) increased as a focus of monastic pedagogy and intellectual activity, resulting in proto-encyclopaedic texts such as the seventh century Irish text, Anonymus ad Cuimnanum (St Paul in Carinthia, Stiftsbibliothek, 2/1, ff. 21-42rb), and grammatical collections such as the seventh century Italian Ars Ambrosiana and the ninth century Ars Laureshamensis.[41]

The emergence of texts incorporating Christian and pagan disciplines, such as Cassiodorus' Institutiones as well as his Expositio Psalmorum, supported and supplemented a Christian appropriation of classical disciplines for religious purposes. The increased production of Christian texts advocating the use of the liberal arts may have spurred a renewed interest in the other component to linguistic study: language's relationship to reality. The increased transmission and translation of classical philosophical texts, such as Boethius' commentaries on Aristotle in the sixth century, may have fomented a wider examination of linguistic study within the seventh and eighth centuries.[42] The promotion of the liberal arts within the De Doctrina Christiana as well as the 'rediscovery' of the pro-etymological Decem Categoriae (which advocated a largely Aristotelian view of language) may have contributed to the continued transmission of many classical and late antique linguistic philosophical treatises on etymology, such as those by Varro and Quintilian. This perspective led perhaps understandably to the supposition that the technical arts associated with language (e.g. grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic) as well as the investigation into the origins of language itself (e.g. etymology) could be viewed as support systems through which one could better understand language (and in correlation, existence and/or God). The prominence of the pseudo-Augustinian Decem Categoriae, in addition to the growing acceptance of classical disciplines such as the trivium within Christian intellectual thought indicates a blended approach to the role of language by the time Theodulf was composing the Opus Caroli in the late eighth century. His acceptance of the etymological naturalism advocated by Isidore (and more distantly by Aristotle and Boethius) echoes throughout the Opus Caroli, as all feature prominently in his arguments against the Greeks.[43] Theodulf also relies heavily upon Cassiodorus' Expositio Psalmorum (c. 540-548), a text allied closely to the etymological program of Isidore.[44] Within the Opus Caroli, the Expositio is second only to Isidore's Etymologiae in terms of numbers of appearance.[45] As heir to these two traditions, Theodulf's subscription to the belief that an understanding of the origins or meanings of words could lead to a fuller understanding of the concepts they represented permeates the Opus Caroli, providing the groundwork for his attack on the Greeks.

Isidore, and subsequently Theodulf, demonstrate both an acceptance of and application of secular disciplines, but they also subscribe to the more complex philosophy that language itself denoted something fundamental about reality. The popularity of this perspective, to the degree that Theodulf felt confident in expressing it as a part of Carolingian spirituality, must to some extent rest on Isidore's shoulders. Isidore's Etymologiae might be considered among the first widely influential Christian texts to advocate a joint perspective: a culmination of the appropriation of the secular liberal arts in addition to a heavy emphasis on the fixed relationship between language and reality.

The Etymologiae, as a successful bridge to the Christian appropriation of secular disciplines, prompted a new approach to biblical study. During the Carolingian period, we find the increased copying, compilation and transmission of linguistic treatises incorporating secular education as a necessary path for deeper spiritual understanding. In Alcuin's preface to his De Grammatica (late eighth century), the Disputatio de vera philosophia, the teacher explains that grammatical study sets the student on the search for true knowledge, God, pure thought, and eternal life.[46] Knowledge of language (via grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic) was considered essential in understanding scripture; the culmination of not only God's words but human wisdom.[47] Those without this education were to be considered spiritually suspect. Isidore explicitly stated the new repurposing of Christian grammar in his De Natura Rerum, assuming the authority to speak for the proper divine doctrine (sana sobriaque doctrina).[48] This newfound responsibility (and the spiritual dangers associated with its lack) encapsulates Theodulf's argument against the Greeks. In the preface to the work, Theodulf invokes Isidore's words as the stimulus behind the Opus Caroli: 'Therefore ambition, puffed up by arrogant winds and the most arrogant desire for empty glory, inflamed not only the rulers but also the priests of the eastern regions to such an extent that they disregarded proper and divine doctrine…'.[49] Having established their inability to recognize the importance of words as the appropriate bond between God and man, Theodulf further demonstrates the Bible as the compendium of human wisdom. Theodulf lists how the Greeks have failed to train themselves in language and thus have misunderstood God's law:

[46] 'Est equidem facile viam vobis demonstrare sapientiae, si eam tantummodo propter Deum, [propter rerum scientiam], propter puritatem animae, propter veritatem cognoscendam, etiam et propter seipsam diligatis…' Alcuin, De Grammatica, PL 101: 850B.

[47] This is exemplified in the Anonymus ad Cuimnanum.

> [In the Bible] one also will find the brilliance and fluency of eloquence (Isidore Etym. 1.2.1), the states and types of arguments (2.4.1 & 2.5.1); there exordiums, by which listeners are rendered benevolent, docile, and attentive (2.7.1); there brief and candid narratives and also long and obscure (2.7.1), which are not related except by the revealed Holy Spirit; there conclusions by which the property of things is shown, arguments in which the souls of the listeners are stirred to carry out what is said (2.7.2); there laws (2.10.1) or maxims (2.11.), there are related [the three registers of speaking]: speaking grandly, speaking humbly, and speaking moderately (2.17.1); there prosopopoeia (2.13.1), ethopoeia (2.14.1), and all types of speech, which were bequeathed by the rhetoricians. One will also find many other types more glorious than these which when he finds them, he will take pleasure in them, which neither the school of grammarians nor that of the rhetoricians was able to grasp.[50]

This laundry list of linguistic terminology drew largely on the vocabulary and phrasing of the Etymologiae (as shown above in the parentheses).[51] Whether Theodulf had a copy of the text in front of him as he worked on the Opus Caroli may never be known; however, the ease with which Theodulf incorporates Isidore's discussion of linguistic tropes and figures into his own work demonstrates a high degree of familiarity with the Etymologiae.[52]

But Theodulf's use of these linguistic terms extends beyond simply listing prosopopoeia and other forms of rhetorical speech. He conspicuously demonstrates his ability to use these linguistic forms and dialectical reasoning (in the form of syllogisms) as a means to further contrast Carolingian linguistic mastery to Byzantine ignorance. As Freeman has shown, the Opus Caroli is littered with syllogistic phrasing; a classical method re-appropriated to demonstrate a specifically Carolingian Christian truth.[53] As the idea of the multiple layers of Scripture gained traction in the late antique and early medieval world, Christian scholars such as Theodulf increasingly had recourse to the classical disciplines – as a means to 'pull back the curtain' and reveal the various deeper meanings of the Bible. The Byzantines, by failing to demonstrate an appreciation for semiotic importance, thus had shown themselves to be poor, uneducated Christians. As the earlier Anonymus ad Cuimnanum argued (a sentiment Isidore and Theodulf clearly shared), 'the grammarian was an expert Latinist who had mastered the ratio of a foreign language in a formal way and corrects grammatical errors... Without the grammarian, Latin literary and Christian wisdom cannot be attained'.[54] As the author implies, the proper Christian is the correct speaker.[55] Theodulf argues that the Byzantines prove the truth to this philosophy: their inability to understand the forms and styles of biblical and patristic language has led them into idolatry. Their ignorance of language has produced an ignorance of Christian doctrine.

[50] 'Illic etiam inveniet nitorem et copiam eloquentiae (Isidore, Etym. 1.2.1), genera causarum (2.4.1) et status (2.5.1); illic exordia, quibus benivoli, dociles vel adtenti auditores fiunt; illic narrationes apertas et breves (2.7.1), clausas etiam et longas, quae non nisi Spiritu sancto reserante panduntur; illic conclusiones quibus proprietas rerum monstratur, argumentationes, quibus animi audientium concitantur ad implenda ea, quae dicuntur (2.7.2); illic leges (2.10.1) sive sententiae (2.11.1), illic magna granditer, parva summisse, mediocria temperate (2.17.1) promuntur; illic prosopopeian (2.13.1), ethopopeian (2.14.1) vel omnes figuras loquutionum, quae a rethoribus traduntur, inveniet et plures illis augustiores quae percepisse se gaudebit, ad quas nec grammaticorum nec rethorum scola pertingere potuit.' Theodulf of Orléans, Opus Caroli, p. 314 ll. 3-30.

[51] The MGH edition classifies this entire section as a reference to Isidore; however, given the numerous linguistic or grammatical treatises available during this time, I am not convinced Theodulf is intentionally citing the Etymologiae. This could either be a list from memory or a list of terms gleaned from any grammatical treatise.

[52] Freeman 'An Introduction', p. 78.

Syllogistic phrasing illustrates the extent to which the classical trivium had been adopted into a Christian framework. Theodulf did not only employ biblical quotations to show how the Greeks' idolatry violated God's law, but also methods of deliberative rhetoric and dialectical syllogisms to illustrate how the Greeks had failed to construct a logical argument to defend their idolatrous ways.[56] Theodulf flaunts his (and by proxy the Carolingians') superiority in these disciplines, consciously invoking 'the authority of Roman eloquence' to warn the Greeks of his impending rhetorical attack in subsequent books: 'and thus it ought to be argued as such, that first we establish our position, and then demolish [our] adversary's [position],' a direct quotation from Cicero's De Oratore via Isidore.[57] Logic, or better stated, reason (rationalis) is at the heart of both Isidore and Theodulf's examination of language, one which incorporates the disciplines of grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic. In his Differentiae (De differentiis verborum), Isidore attributes an introspective and ontological definition to dialectic, 'A rational method of discussion which sharpens intelligence and distinguishes truth from error'.[58] The essence of rationalis was to discover, via language, the true causes of things.[59] For Theodulf, the Greeks failed to do this at Nicaea. Theodulf repeatedly upheld the rationality of Christian truth: '[For] the Lord God is spirit, and He ought to be adored in spirit and in truth. One should not cling carnally but spiritually to Him. It is right to cleave to him neither carnally nor via the senses, but rather by the rationality of the soul's intuition'.[60] For Isidore, and subsequently Theodulf, truth was now defined by a rationalis Christianity; what had been traditionally agnostic or at least predominantly secular disciplines became crucial to biblical exegesis and revelation.[61]

Conclusion

Theodulf's obvious access to and application of classical deliberative rhetoric counters our understanding of the prevalence and continued copying of rhetorical, grammatical handbooks during the early medieval period. Jacques Fontaine, in his study of Isidore's language and use of rhetoric, saw in the sixth, seventh, and eighth centuries a weakening appreciation of the practicality of the linguistic disciplines. Ascribing a profound unoriginality in grammarians from Pseudo-Apuleius to Isidore, Fontaine saw these centuries as representative of the 'weakening of the agility of the mind' ('une sorte d'affaiblissement de l'agilité d'esprit').[62] Fontaine argued that the increased prominence on jargon rather than practical applications in these rhetorical handbooks signalled an increasingly elementary understanding of these subjects. Indeed, other linguistic handbooks from the period of Theodulf and Alcuin have been described as 'dry, technical manuals', with little to no relevance outside the schoolroom[63]. Yet this does not take into account Theodulf and the Opus Caroli. This is not the dry jargon-based academic texts that Fontaine warned us about, but instead a practical synthesis of both Isidore's encyclopaedic offerings on language, combined with more extensive sources on specific forms of dialectic and logic; each applied to prove the error of the Greeks.[64]

[61] The theme of ratio or the role of reason in spiritual thinking is one found throughout the writings of both Jerome and Augustine (from the Latin perspective) and also within the works of the Cappadocian Fathers. On the 'rational' in Augustine's work, see Conybeare, The Irrational Augustine, particularly chapter 5, 'The Interrogation of Reason'. Gregory of Nyssa's concept of the individual also plays largely into the role of logic or reason as a fundamental element of humanity. See Turcescu, Gregory of Nyssa and the Concept of Divine Persons, particularly chapter 2, 'Philosophical Concepts that Shaped Gregory of Nyssa's View of the Individual'.

Unfortunately, Theodulf's Opus Caroli was destined never to reach its intended audience. The working manuscript, never fully completed, was shelved by the time of the 794 Synod of Frankfurt, at which Greek idolatry was barely referenced.[65] The text was effectively wiped out of existence, although Hincmar of Rheims attempted to produce a complete, corrected copy of it in the early ninth century.[66] But its significance should not be forgotten. Theodulf's treatise demonstrates a slow turning point in Christian intellectual circles, augmented by Alcuin in the late eighth century, and reaching full stride by the ninth. Although few would relegate Isidore to simply a 'transmitter of earlier sources', an increasingly rare generalization, his specific spiritual and intellectual influence on the later medieval world still demands more investigation, as is demonstrated by a number of other papers in this volume. This examination of the Opus Caroli has shown that Isidore was a source for medieval writers on a variety of levels. His Etymologiae provided quick access to a number of subjects and earlier writers; however, this cannot have been its sole function. Tying together Aristotelian ideas of the signifier-signified relationship in addition to early patristic formulations on the multiple meanings of Scripture (and language more generally), Isidore fused these concepts to create a more comprehensive philosophy, defined by what Davide Del Bello calls, 'Christian language as a verbal construction motivated by an extra-verbal reality'.[67] So fundamental was this formulation that, by the Carolingian period, Theodulf was able to use it to justify the entire Carolingian spiritual policy of opposition to the Greeks. Found in other Carolingian writers, such as in Hrabanus Maurus' De Universo and John Scottus Eriugena's universals in his commentary on the Categoriae Decem as well as his Periphyseon in the ninth century, and of course amplified and expounded in the twelfth century, Isidore was much more than simply a vehicle of transmission for late antique and early medieval intellectual thought.[68] Isidore's Etymologiae (and his entire corpus generally) provided the groundwork for Christian rational inquiry, but in emphasizing the 'science' of linguistic (specifically biblical) semiotics capable of analysis and understanding by the human mind, he also simultaneously cleared a path for a more well-developed sense of biblical allegoria in the later medieval period.[69] By localizing the origin and meaning of language in the ratio of the human mind, Isidore, and the etymological tradition he represented, allowed for a dual 'scientific' (analysis via a word's origins) and 'non-scientific' (allegory based on human interpretation) examination of the Bible for the rest of the middle Middle Ages.

LATE ANTIQUE AND EARLY MEDIEVAL IBERIA

Isidore of Seville (d. 636 AD) is a crucial figure in the preservation and propagation of Classical and Patristic learning. He put this learning to varied use in his own day, ensuring in the process that it could be made useful for future generations. Because of the depth of what he preserved and the breadth of its diffusion, Pope John Paul II proclaimed Isidore the patron saint of the Internet in 1997. His influence was felt throughout the middle ages, most acutely in early medieval Western Europe. Isidore's compilations of the works of earlier authorities provided theological, pastoral, scientific and historical resources that formed an essential part of monastic curricula for centuries.

Representing a cross-section of the different approaches that have been taken to Isidore's writings, the collected essays in Isidore of Seville and his Reception in the Early Middle Ages: Transmitting and Transforming Knowledge explore the sources on which Isidore drew, how he selected and arranged them, and the different ways in which his legacy was appropriated by future generations across the early medieval West.

Andrew Fear is Lecturer in Classics and Ancient History at the University of Manchester and author of Rome and Baetica (Oxford, 1996), The Lives of the Visigothic Fathers (Liverpool, 1997) and Orosius: Seven Books of History against the Pagans (Liverpool, 2010).

Jamie Wood is Senior Lecturer in History at the University of Lincoln, author of The Politics of Identity in Visigothic Spain: Religion and Power in the Histories of Isidore of Seville (Leiden, 2012), and a number of other articles on late antique and Visigothic Spain, especially the works of Isidore of Seville.

PREFACE BY THE EDITOR.

IT is now five years since the present volume was first laid before the public by Mr. George Smith, just before setting out on his last ill-fated expedition to the East. It naturally awakened extreme interest and curiosity. The earlier chapters of Genesis no longer stood alone. Parallel accounts had been discovered by the author among the clay records of ancient Babylonia, which far exceeded in antiquity the venerable histories of the Bible. All those who had a theory to support, or a tradition to overthrow, turned eagerly to the newly-discovered documents, which possessed an equal interest for the students of history, of religion, and of language.

The five years that have elapsed since the publication of "The Chaldean Account of Genesis" have been five years of active work and progress among Assyrian scholars. The impulse given to Assyrian research by Mr. Smith has survived his death; numberless new tablets and fragments of tablets have been brought to Europe from Assyria and Babylonia; fresh students of the inscriptions have risen up in this country and on the continent, more especially in Germany; and the scientific spirit which has been introduced into the study of the Assyrian language has immeasurably increased our knowledge of it. Thanks to the labours of men like Oppert, Lenormant and Guyard in France, or of Schrader, Delitzsch, Haupt and Hommel in Germany, texts which were obscure and doubtful at the time of Mr. Smith's death have now become almost as clear as a page of the more difficult portions of the Old Testament. The Assyrian student, moreover, has an advantage which the Hebrew student has not; he possesses dictionaries and vocabularies compiled by the Assyro-Babylonians themselves, and these frequently throw light on a word which otherwise would be a "hapax legomenon."

The more backward condition of our knowledge of Assyrian, however, was not the only difficulty against which Mr. Smith had to contend. He was pressed for time when writing the present volume, which had to be finished before his departure for the East. The class of texts, also, which he had brought to light was a new class hitherto unknown, or almost unknown, to the Assyrian decipherer. He had to break fresh ground in dealing with them. Their style differed considerably from that of the texts previously studied; they had a vocabulary of their own, allusions of their own, and even, it may be added, a grammar of their own. If the texts had been complete the difficulty perhaps would not have been so great; but it was enormously increased by their mutilated condition. The skill and success with which Mr. Smith struggled against all these difficulties show more plainly than ever what a loss Assyrian research has sustained in him.

Nevertheless, even the genius of Mr. Smith could not do more than give a general idea of the contents of the fragments, and not always even this. A comparison of the translations contained in the present edition with those contained in the preceding ones will show to what an extent the details of translation have had to be modified and changed, sometimes with important consequences. Thus the corrected translation of the fragments relating to the Tower of Babel will remove the doubts raised by Mr. Smith’s translation as to his correctness in associating them with that event; thus, too, the corrected rendering of a passage in the Izdubar Epic will show that the practice of erecting a Bethel or sacred stone was familiar to the early Babylonians. In some instances Mr. Smith has misconceived the true character of a whole text. What he believed to be a record of the Fall, for instance, is really, as M. Oppert first pointed out, a hymn to the Creator.

On the other hand, the fresh materials that have been acquired by the British Museum during the last five years, or a closer examination of the treasures it already possessed, have enabled us to add to the number of cuneiform texts which illustrate the earlier portions of Genesis. Mr. Rassam, for example, has brought home a fragment of the Deluge tablet, which not only helps us to fill up some of the lacunæ in the text, but is also important in another way. It is written, not in Assyrian, but in Babylonian cuneiform characters, and comes, not from an Assyrian, but from a Babylonian library. But it agrees exactly with the corresponding parts of the Assyrian editions of the story, and thus furnishes us with a proof of the trustworthiness of the Assyrian copies of the old Babylonian texts. The text, again, which relates to the destruction of a country by a rain of fire, though long contained in the British Museum Collection, was first noticed by myself as being apparently the Babylonian version of the biblical account of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah.

Numerous alterations and insertions have had to be made in the text which accompanies the translations. The latter necessarily occupied the main part of Mr. Smith’s attention; he had neither time nor inclination to enter very elaborately into the questions raised by them, or the illustrations they might receive from elsewhere. In fact, any adequate treatment of the great Izdubar Epic, for instance, demanded a special acquaintance with the method and results of Comparative Philology, as well as a more intimate knowledge of its history and character than was possible at the time when Mr. Smith wrote.

A large proportion of the cuneiform texts from which the translations contained in the present volume are made has not yet been published. I have, however, gone carefully over them all with the exception of a small portion of the Izdubar Epic, and endeavoured to bring the translations up to the level of our present knowledge of the Assyrian language. I am indebted to the ready kindness and accurate eye of Mr. Pinches for copies of almost all the unpublished portions of the Izdubar legends. In these he has corrected several faulty readings, more especially that of the name of the pilot of Xisuthrus, which ought to be Nes-Hea, “the lion of Hea.” Mr. Pinches assures me that the name of the deity composing the second part of the name is invariably written with the numeral 40, the symbol of the god Hea, except once when the scribe has miswritten 50, the symbol of Bel, and he has pointed out to me a passage in a bilingual tablet where the name is explained in Assyrian by Nes-Hea. Unfortunately, the texts given in pp. 103-124 cannot be found, and here therefore I have been obliged to leave Mr. Smith’s translations unaltered.

The reader, however, must remember that no translations of these mutilated tablets can be more than approximately correct. Even if the meaning of all the words were well known, and they were divided from one another (which is not the case), the broken condition of so many of the inscriptions would make a good deal of the translation more or less conjectural. This must be doubly the case where the signification of the words is either unknown or only half known. I have always endeavoured to indicate a doubtful word or passage by a query; but there must be instances in which the meaning that I believe ought to be assigned to particular words will be corrected by the further progress of discovery. This is even more true of what may be termed the commentary accompanying the translations. Surprises are constantly in store for the Assyrian decipherer, and a tiny fragment may suddenly throw a new light on a question he had supposed to be settled. In fact, in Assyriology, as in all other branches of science, there is no finality; we cannot be more than approximately exact at any given time, and every month enables us to introduce fresh corrections and improvements into our work.

A fresh illustration of the fact has been afforded even while the present volume has been passing through the press. Mr. Pinches has come across two fragments (one marked S 669, the other unnumbered) which belong to two separate copies or editions of a very interesting work. This is nothing less than a list of the ancient epics and legends of Chaldea, along with the names of their reputed authors, many of whom, however, are probably as mythical as the famous Rishis of India. The list shows how numerous these early poems were, and how few of them, comparatively, we possess at present. Both fragments belong to the same part of the list, and we are therefore ignorant of many of the ancient compositions it must originally have contained. Some of the works mentioned receive their names from the heroes celebrated in them, others are named from their opening lines. A distinction is drawn between those that belonged to the Accadian period, and were written by Accadian poets in the Accadian language, and those that were of Semitic Babylonian origin. The interest of the list is enhanced by the great antiquity of the poems it records, none of them being later than about 2000 B.C. Here is a translation of the text as restored from a comparison of the two fragments according to the copies I have made of them:—

14. .... a tu gab [Acc.]. This is the work of Lig-Dimir the scribe, the man (of a non-existent tablet).

What is meant by the phrase “the man of a non-existent tablet,” I do not know. Possibly it signifies that the autograph of the author no longer existed at the time the list was drawn up. “The Bull of the firmament” was a legend which was probably connected with the second month of the year, originally, it would seem, the first, which like the zodiacal sign after which it was named, was called the month of “the directing bull.”

Future excavations will doubtless bring to light some of the poems mentioned in the list and not previously known. I have myself lately come across two fragments (S 802 and S 316) which belong to legends hitherto unknown, but they are too short to be worth translating. What curious revelations, however, we may yet expect from the cuneiform records may be judged from a small and well preserved tablet recently brought to England, which contains a catalogue of the gardens belonging to Merodach-Baladan, the contemporary of Hezekiah, and grouped according to the districts in which they were situated. Merodach-Baladan must have been fond of horticulture, since the catalogue contains the names of no less than sixty-seven seed-gardens, besides six other pleasure-grounds. Many of them were named from the localities in whose neighbourhood they were, but others bore such significant titles as “the forest of reeds,” “the small enclosure,” or “the garden of the waters of the city.” As the tablet was copied by a scribe named Merodach-sum-iddin, probably in the time of Nebuchadnezzar or his successors, it is evident that some of the contents of the library of Babylon escaped the destruction brought upon that city by Sennacherib in B.C. 692.

I may add that since the greater part of this edition has been in type, I have found myself able to explain the name of the hero which in default of the true transcription has been provisionally read Izdubar. The name is composed of three ideographs, the first of which is the determinative prefix of wood, while the two latter are rendered saptu saplitu, “the lower lip,” in Semitic Assyrian. Now M. Lenormant has shown that Izdubar was originally the Accadian Fire-god, and Mr. Boscawen has pointed out that the fire-stick was once used in Babylonia; it is therefore evident that the three ideographs composing the name represent the lower piece of wood, with a lip or groove in it, which formed the most important part of the primitive fire-machine. I believe the Accadian pronunciation of the name will turn out to be Kibirra.

CHAPTER I.
THE DISCOVERY OF THE GENESIS LEGENDS.

Cosmogony of Berosus.—Discovery of Cuneiform Inscriptions.—Historical texts.—Babylonian origin of Assyrian literature.—Mythological tablets.—Discovery of Deluge texts.—Mutilated condition of tablets.—Lecture on Deluge tablets.—“Daily Telegraph” offer.—Expedition to Assyria.—Fragments of Creation tablets.—Solar Myth.—Second journey to Assyria.—Tower of Babel.—Clay records.—List of texts.—Legend of Oannes.—List of early legends and their authors.

IT has long been known from the fragments of the Chaldean historian, Berosus, preserved in the works of various later writers, that the Babylonians were acquainted with traditions referring to the Creation, the period before the Flood, the Deluge, and other matters of which we read in the book of Genesis.

Berosus, however, who recorded these events, is stated by Eusebius and Tatian to have been a contemporary of Alexander the Great, and to have lived into the reign of Antiochus Soter. His date lies, therefore, between B.C. 330 and 260. As this was three hundred years after the captivity of the Jews in Babylon, the great antiquity of these traditions could not be proved with certainty, much less their independence of the accounts which we have in Genesis.

On the discovery and decipherment of the cuneiform inscriptions, Oriental scholars hoped that copies of the Babylonian histories and traditions would one day be found, and that earlier and more satisfactory evidence as to these primitive histories than had previously been accessible, would thus be gained.

In the mound of Kouyunjik, opposite the town of Mosul, Mr. Layard discovered part of the Royal Assyrian library, and further collections, also forming part of this library, have been subsequently found by Mr. H. Rassam, Mr. Loftus, and Mr. George Smith. Sir Henry Rawlinson, who made the preliminary examination of Mr. Layard’s treasures, and was the first to recognize their value, estimated the number of fragments brought from this Library at over twenty thousand.

The attention of decipherers was in the first instance drawn to the later historical inscriptions, particularly to those of the Assyrian kings contemporary with the Hebrew monarchy; and in this department of research a very large number of texts of great importance rewarded the toil of Assyrian scholars. Inscriptions of Tiglath Pileser, Shalmaneser, Sargon, Sennacherib, Esarhaddon, Nebuchadnezzar, Nabonidus, and numerous other ancient sovereigns, bearing directly on the Bible, and throwing new light upon parts of ancient history previously obscure, for a long time occupied almost exclusively the attention of students, and overshadowed any work in other divisions of Assyrian literature.

Although it was known that Assyria borrowed its civilization and written characters from Babylonia, yet, as the Assyrian nation was throughout the greater part of its independent existence hostile to the southern and older kingdom, it could not be guessed beforehand that the peculiar national traditions of Babylonia would have been transported to Assyria.

Under these circumstances, for some years after the cuneiform inscriptions were first deciphered, nothing was looked for or discovered bearing upon the events described in Genesis; but, as new texts were brought into notice, it became evident that the Assyrians borrowed their literature largely from Babylonian sources, and it appeared likely that search among the fragments of Assyrian inscriptions would yield traces at least of some of these ancient Babylonian legends.

Attention was early drawn to this fact by Sir Henry Rawlinson, who pointed out several coincidences between the geography of Babylonia and the account of Eden in Genesis, and suggested the great probability that the accounts in Genesis had a Babylonian origin.

While preparing the fourth volume of Cuneiform Inscriptions for the trustees of the British Museum, Mr. George Smith noticed references to the Creation in a tablet numbered K 63 in the Museum collection, as well as allusions in other tablets to similar legends; he therefore searched through a series of tablets he had previously classed as “Mythological,” in order to find, if possible, some of these legends. This series of mythological tablets was one of six into which he had divided the Museum collection of cuneiform inscriptions for convenience of working. By placing all the tablets and fragments of the same class together, he had been able to complete several texts, to find easily any subject required, and to get, whenever it was needed, a general idea of the contents of the collection.

The mythological division contained all the tablets which related to Assyrian mythology, and all the legends in which the gods took a leading part, together with prayers and similar subjects.

A steady search among these fragments soon brought to light half of a curious tablet which had evidently contained originally six columns of text; two of these (the third and fourth) were still nearly perfect; two others (the second and fifth) were imperfect, about half being lost, while the remaining columns (the first and sixth) were entirely gone. A statement in the third column that "the ship" had rested on the mountain of Nizir, followed by an account of the sending forth of a dove, and its finding no resting-place and returning, convinced Mr. Smith that he had discovered a portion at least of the Chaldean account of the Deluge. He then proceeded to read through the document, and found it was in the form of a speech from the hero of the Deluge to a person whose name might be transcribed as Izdubar. The same name had already been read on the fragment of another tablet numbered K 231, which turned out to belong to the same series of tablets as the newly-found account of the Deluge. Mr. Smith was thus encouraged to make a search for other portions of the series.

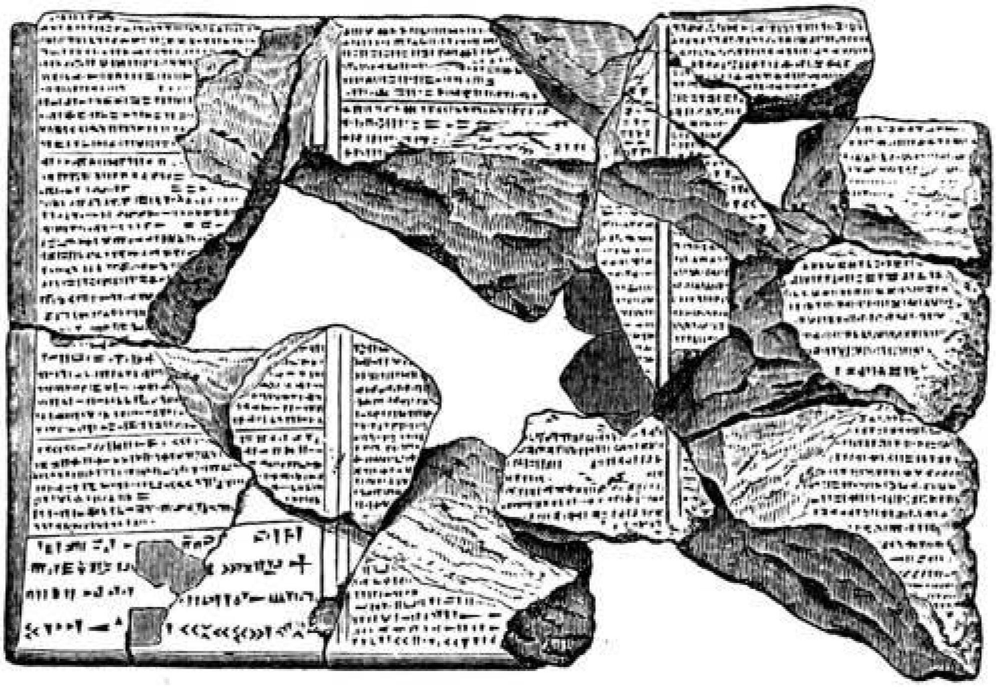
The search was a long and heavy work, for there were thousands of fragments to be examined, and these were so small, and contained so little of the text, that it was extremely difficult to ascertain their meaning. The search, however, proved successful. A fragment of another copy of the Deluge was found containing a second account of the sending forth of the birds. Several other portions of the same tablet were gradually collected and fitted one after another into their places until the greater part of the second column was filled up. Portions of a third copy were next discovered, which, when joined together, completed a considerable part of the first and sixth columns. Mr. Smith now translated the text he had so laboriously pieced together, and published his discovery to the world at a meeting of the Society of Biblical Archæology, December 3rd, 1872. By this time he had made out that the series of Izdubar legends, as we may term them, contained twelve tablets or books. Of this series the tablet describing the Deluge was the eleventh and K 231 the sixth.

The interest excited by Mr. Smith's discovery was naturally very great. Immediately after the meeting of the Society of Biblical Archæology, Mr. E. Arnold, in the name of the proprietors of the "Daily Telegraph," asked the fortunate discoverer to reopen, at their cost, the excavations in Assyria in the hope of finding the missing portions of the story of the Deluge. The trustees of the British Museum granted Mr. Smith leave of absence for the purpose, and he accordingly started for the ruins of Nineveh, and there engaged in researches, the history of which is related in his work entitled "Assyrian Discoveries." Hardly had he begun his excavations on the site of the palace of Assur-bani-pal at Kouyunjik, when he came across a new fragment of the Chaldean account of the Deluge belonging to the first column of the tablet, containing the command to build and fill the ark, and nearly filling up the most considerable blank in the story. Some other fragments, found afterwards, still further completed this tablet, which was already the most perfect one in the Izdubar series. The trench in which the fragment in question was discovered must have passed very near the part of the Library in which the Assyrians kept a series of inscriptions relating to the early history of the world. The same trench soon afterwards yielded a fragment of the sixth tablet, describing the destruction of the bull of Istar by Izdubar and Hea-bani, an incident often depicted on early Babylonian gems. The next discovery was a fragment which referred to the creation of the world; it formed the upper corner of a tablet, and gave a fragmentary account of the creation of animals. Two other portions of this legend were found further on in the trench, one of which contained a mutilated account of the war between the gods and evil spirits.

In the following year Mr. Smith was again in Assyria, in charge of an expedition sent out by the trustees of the British Museum, and succeeded in bringing home fresh fragments relating to the early traditions and legends of Babylonia. Among these is the fragment which seems to describe the building of the Tower of Babel. Then followed the disastrous expedition of 1875-6, in the course of which Mr. Smith fell a victim to over-fatigue and his zeal for Assyrian research. The subsequent explorations of Mr. Hormuzd Rassam, though rich in other results, have added very little to our knowledge of the old Babylonian legends; and it seems probable that the missing portions of the tablets which contained them have irretrievably perished. We must wait for further light upon the subject until the cities and libraries of Babylonia have been excavated. After all, the early Babylonian legends, of which copies were made for the Assyrian Library at Kouyunjik, were but a selected few; the Assyrians took little interest in that part of Babylonian literature which had no connection with their own history or beliefs, and we have reason to congratulate ourselves that among the traditions they borrowed from their older and more civilized neighbours were so many which bear upon the earlier chapters of Genesis.

The fragmentary condition of the legends we possess, however, is much to be lamented. The chief difficulties with which the Assyrian scholar has to contend, when dealing with them, are due to the mutilated state of the tablets. If the inscriptions were perfect, their translation would be a comparatively easy matter. As it is, so skilled a decipherer as Mr. Smith himself was deceived by the defective character of the text into imagining that a hymn addressed to the Creator was the Babylonian version of the Fall of Man.

The fragmentary and scattered character of these legends is explained by the nature of the material of which the tablets are composed, and the changes undergone by them since they were written. They consist of fine clay and were inscribed with cuneiform characters while in a soft state; they were then baked in a furnace until hard, and afterwards transferred to the library. The library seems to have been in an upper storey of the palace, and after the destruction of Nineveh, the fall of the building in which it was placed naturally caused the tablets contained in it to be broken to pieces. Many of them were cracked and scorched by the heat of the burning ruins. Subsequently the ruins were turned over in search of treasure, and the tablets still further broken; while, to complete their destruction, the rain, soaking through the ground every spring, saturates them with water containing chemicals, and these chemicals form crystals in every available crack. The growth of the crystals further splits the tablets, some of them being literally shivered to pieces.



Reverse of Inscribed Terra Cotta Tablet containing the Account of the Deluge, showing the various fragments of which it was composed at the time of Mr. Smith's Translation.

Some idea of the mutilated condition of the Assyrian tablets, and of the work required by the restoration of a single text, will be gained from the engraving above, which exhibits the appearance of one of the Deluge tablets at the time Mr. Smith published his translation of it. In this tablet there are no less than sixteen fragments.

The clay records of the Assyrians are by these means so broken up, that a single text is in some cases divided into over one hundred fragments; and it is only by collecting and joining these together that the old texts can be restored. Many of the fragmentary tablets which have been more than twenty years in the British Museum have been added to considerably by the fragments recently brought to England by Mr. Smith and Mr. Rassam; and yet there probably remain from ten to twenty thousand fragments still buried in the ruins, without the recovery of which it is impossible to complete these valuable Assyrian inscriptions.

It is, nevertheless, out of these imperfect materials that we have at present to piece together our knowledge of the early legends of Babylonia and Assyria. Most, if not all, of them, are, it must be remembered, of Chaldean or Babylonian origin, the Assyrians having either slavishly copied Babylonian originals or simply put into a new form the story they had borrowed from their southern neighbours. Such as they are, however, they are presented to the reader as faithfully translated as our existing knowledge of the Assyrian language allows; it is for him to draw his inferences and make his comparisons. The greater number of them, as we shall see, mount back to a date earlier than the second millennium before the Christian era, and even where the actual text belongs to a later period, the legend which it embodies claims a similar antiquity. We may classify them in the following order:—

1. An account of the Creation of the world in six days, parallel to that in the first chapter of Genesis, and probably in its present form not older than the 7th century B.C.

2. A second account of the Creation, derived from the Library of Cuthah, and belonging to the oldest period of Babylonian literature.

3. A history of the conflict between Merodach, the champion of the gods, and Tiamat, "the Deep," the representative of chaos and evil. To this we may add the bilingual legend of the seven evil spirits and their fight against the moon.

4. The story of the descent of the goddess Istar or Venus into Hades, and her return.

5. The legend of the sin of the god Zu, punished by Bel, the father of the gods.

6. A collection of five tablets giving the exploits of Dibbara the god of the pestilence.

7. The story of the wise man who put forth a riddle to the gods.

8. The legend of the good man Atarpi, and the wickedness of the world.

9. The legend of the tower of Babel, and dispersion.

10. The story of the Eagle and Etana.

11. The story of the ox and the horse.

12. The story of the fox.

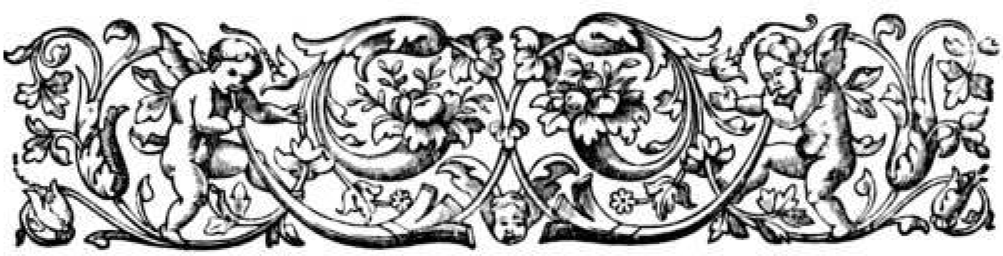
13. The legend of Sinuri.

14. The Izdubar legends: twelve tablets, with the history of Izdubar, and an account of the flood.

15. The story of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah. Besides these there are fragments of other legends, which show that there was a considerable collection of such primitive stories still quite unknown to us. In fact we have little chance of becoming acquainted with them until the libraries of Babylonia are excavated. Thus for example we learn from Berosus that the Babylonians ascribed their civilization to certain wonderful creatures who ascended out of the Persian Gulf, and more especially to a being called Oannes. But of all this the library of Nineveh tells us nothing, although an Accadian Reading-book compiled for Assyrian students contains an excerpt which seems to be taken from the legend of Oannes. It is as follows:—

1. To the waters their god
2. had returned.
3. To the glistening house
4. he descended (as) an icicle.
5. (On) a seat of snow
6. he grew not old in wisdom.
7. The wise people
8. with his wisdom he filled.

Two fragments, belonging to two editions of the same text, have just been found, containing a list of the numerous legends and epics current among the ancient Babylonians, along with the names of their authors. Among them are found several of which translations are given further on in this volume; but there are also several of which we hear for the first time. The great Izdubar Epic, it may be noted, is ascribed to a certain Sin-lici-unnini ("O Moon-god, receive my cry!"). A fuller account of the fragments and their contents will be found in the Introduction.



CHAPTER II.
BABYLONIAN AND ASSYRIAN LITERATURE.

Babylonian literature.—Kouyunjik library.—Fragmentary condition.—Arrangement of tablets.—Subjects.—Dates.—Babylonian source of literature.—Literary period.—Babylonian Chronology.—Accad.—Sumir.—Extinction of the Accadian language.—Izdubar legends.—Creation.—Syllabaries and bilingual tablets.—Assyrian copies.—Difficulties as to date.—Library of Senkereh.—Assyrian empire.—City of Assur.—Library at Calah.—Sargon of Assyria.—Sennacherib.—Removal of Library to Nineveh.—Assur-bani-pal or Sardanapalus.—His additions to library.—Description of contents.—Later Babylonian libraries.

IN order to understand the position to which we must assign the legends of early Chaldea, it is necessary to give some account of the literature of the Ancient Babylonians and their copyists, the Assyrians. As has been already stated, the fragments of burnt brick on which these legends are inscribed were found in the débris which covers the palaces called the South West Palace and the North Palace at Kouyunjik; the former building being of the age of Sennacherib, the latter belonging to the time of Assur-bani-pal. The tablets, which are of all sizes, from one inch long to over a foot square, are generally in fragments, and in consequence of the changes which have taken place in the ruins the fragments of the same tablet are sometimes scattered widely apart. They were originally deposited, it would seem, in one of the upper chambers of the palace, from which they fell on the destruction of the building. In some of the lower chambers the whole floor has been found covered with them, in other cases they lay in groups or patches on the pavement, and there are occasional clusters of fragments at various heights in the earth which covers the ruins. Other fragments are scattered singly through all the upper earth which covers the floors and walls of the palace. Different fragments of the same tablet or cylinder are found in separate chambers which have no immediate connection with each other, showing that their present distribution has nothing to do with the original position of the tablets of which they formed part.

The inscriptions show that the tablets were arranged according to their subjects. Stories or subjects were continued on other tablets of the same size and form as those on which they were commenced, in some cases the number of tablets in a series and on a single subject amounting to over one hundred.

Each subject or series of tablets had a title, the title consisting of the first phrase or part of a phrase in it. Thus, the series of Astrological tablets, numbering over seventy tablets, bore the title “When the gods Anu (and) Bel,” this being the commencement of the first tablet. At the end of every tablet in each series was written its number in the work, thus: “the first tablet of When the gods Anu, Bel,” “the second tablet of When the gods Anu, Bel,” &c. &c.; and, further to preserve the proper position of each tablet, every one except the last in a series had at the end a catch phrase, consisting of the first line of the following tablet. There were besides, catalogues of these documents written like them on clay tablets, and other small oval tablets with titles upon them, apparently labels for the various series of works. All these arrangements show the care taken with respect to literary matters. There were regular libraries or chambers, probably on the upper floors of the palaces, appointed for the reception of the tablets, and custodians or librarians to take charge of them. These regulations were all of great antiquity, and like the tablets had a Babylonian origin.

Judging from the fragments discovered, it appears probable that there were in the Royal Library at Nineveh over 10,000 inscribed tablets, treating of almost every branch of knowledge existing at the time.

In considering a subject like the present one it is a point of the utmost importance to define as closely as possible the date of our present copies of the legends, and the most probable period at which the original copies may have been inscribed. By far the greatest number of the tablets brought from Nineveh belong to the age of Assur-bani-pal, who reigned over Assyria from B.C. 670, and every copy of what we will term the Genesis legends yet found was inscribed with one exception during his reign. The statements made on the tablets themselves are conclusive on this point, and have not been called in question, but it is equally stated and acknowledged on all hands that most of these tablets are not the originals, but are only copies from earlier texts. It is unfortunate that the date of the original copies is never preserved, and thus a wide door is thrown open for difference of opinion on the point. The Assyrians acknowledged that this class of literature was borrowed from Babylonian sources, and of course it is to Babylonia that we have to look to ascertain the approximate dates of the original documents. But here we are met by the following difficulty. It appears that at an early period in Babylonian history a great literary development took place, and numerous works were produced which embodied the prevailing myths, religion, and science of the day. Written many of them in a noble style of poetry, and appealing to the strongest feelings of the people on one side, or registering the highest efforts of their science on the other, these texts became the standards of Babylonian literature, and later generations were content to copy them instead of composing new works for themselves. Clay, the material on which they were written, was everywhere abundant, copies were multiplied, and the veneration in which the texts were held fixed and stereotyped their style. Even the language in which they were written remained the language of literature up to the period of the Persian conquest. Thus it happens that texts of Rim-agu, Sargon, and Khammuragas, who lived at least a thousand years before Nebuchadnezzar and Nabonidus, are composed in the same language as the texts of these later kings, there being no sensible difference in style to match the long interval between them.

We have, however, clear proof that, although the language of devotion and literature remained fixed, the speech of the bulk of the people was gradually modified; and in the time of Assur-bani-pal, when the texts of the Genesis legends which we possess were copied by Assyrian scribes, the common speech of the day was widely different from that of literature. The private letters and despatches of this age which have been discovered differ considerably in language from the contemporary public documents and religious writings, showing the change the language had undergone since the style of the latter had been fixed. So, too, in our own country the language of devotion and the style of the Bible differ in several respects from those of the English of to-day.

These considerations show the difficulty of fixing the age of a cuneiform document from its style, and the difficulty is further increased by the uncertainty which hangs over all Babylonian chronology—an uncertainty that can be cleared away only when the ruined cities of Babylonia are excavated.

Chronology is always a thorny subject, and dry and unsatisfactory to most persons besides; some notice must, however, be taken of it here, in order to fix something like an approximate date or epoch for the original composition of the Genesis legends.

The so-called Assyrian Canon affords us an exact chronology up to the year B.C. 909, and a series of contemporaneous monuments, together with one or two chronological allusions in later inscriptions, enables us to work back from this date to a period falling between B.C. 1450 and 1400 when Assyria was brought into close relation with the southern kingdom of Babylonia. Babylonia was at the time under the sway of a foreign dynasty of Kossæan princes from the mountains of Elam, which was overthrown, as we learn from the Assyrian records, about B.C. 1270. It had been in possession of the country for a considerable time, since a fragmentary list which gives the names of the first nine sovereigns composing it does not come down to the time when the first of the princes who came into close contact with Assyria was reigning. Indeed, a considerable interval must be allowed between the latter period and the last of the nine kings mentioned in the list, in which to insert the isolated names of more than one monarch of the dynasty incidentally mentioned on later monuments. Supposing that not more than fifteen kings preceded Cara-indas in B.C. 1450, and that the average length of their reigns was twenty years, we should have B.C. 1750 as the approximate date of the leader of the dynasty. He could not have been later than this, and there are many reasons which would lead us to suppose that he was earlier.

Khammuragas was the leader of the dynasty in question. He had conquered the rulers of the two kingdoms into which Babylonia was at this time divided. One of these was a queen, with whom ended a dynasty, famous in the annals of early Babylonia, whose seat was at Agané or Agadé, near Sepharvaim. She had been the successor of Naram-Sin, the son of Sargon, who, like his father, had extended his power far and wide, and had even penetrated as far as the shores of the Mediterranean. Sargon had been a great patron of learning as well as a conqueror; he had established a famous library at Agané, and had caused a work on astronomy and astrology to be compiled, which remained the standard authority on the subject up to the end of the Assyrian Empire. It was entitled, “The Illumination of Bel,” and was in seventy-two books. Berosus, the historian, seems to have translated it into Greek.

Like the Babylonians and Assyrians of a later day, Sargon and his subjects belonged to the Semitic stock, and were therefore related to the Hebrews and the Arabians. But they were really intruders in Chaldea. The primitive inhabitants of the country, the builders of its cities, the inventors of the cuneiform system of writing, and the founders of the culture and civilization which was afterwards borrowed by the Semites, were of a wholly different race. They spoke an agglutinative language of the same character as that of the modern Turks or Finns, and were originally divided into two sections—the inhabitants of Sumir or Shinar, the plain country, and the Accadians or “Highlanders,” who had descended from the mountains of Elam subsequently to the first settlement of their kinsfolk in Shinar. At some date between B.C. 3000 and 2000, the Semitic population which bordered upon Babylonia on the west, and had long been settled in some of its western cities, such as Ur (now Mugheir), conquered Shinar or Sumir. The Accadians, however, maintained their independence for a considerable time after this conquest, until, finally, Accad also was reduced under the sway of the Semitic kings. The old population of the country was gradually absorbed, and its language became extinct. The extinction of the Accadian or Sumerian language had already taken place—at all events among the educated classes—at the time that Sargon founded his library at Agané, and one of the chief reasons which led to the compilation of the great work on astronomy, was the necessity of preserving the astronomical and astrological observations recorded in a language which was beginning to be forgotten. At the same time Semitic translations of other portions of the old Accadian literature were made. The library at Agané, however, was not the only place where the work of translation went on; many other libraries existed, and their scribes and readers had alike become Semites, who required works written in their own tongue. The Semitic translations of Accadian works which were made for the library of Erech, one of the earliest seats of Semitic power, must have been considerably older than those made for the library of Sargon.

The extinction of the Accadian language and the translation of Accadian works into Semitic Babylonian are important facts for settling the chronology of a document or inscription. Wherever we can show that a Babylonian or Assyrian text is translated from an Accadian original, or wherever we have a copy of that original itself, we may feel pretty sure that we are dealing with something older than the eighteenth century before the Christian era.

Mr. Smith believed that the "Exploits of the God Dibbara" was one of the oldest of the mythological texts which have come down to us, though he admitted that the mention of Assyria in it was in favour of a somewhat later date.

It notices a large number of peoples or states, the principal being the people of the coast, Subartu or Syria, Assyria, Elam, the Kassi, the Sutu, Goim, Lullubu, and Accad.

The Izdubar legends, containing the story of the Flood, and possibly also the history of Nimrod, were probably written in the south of the country, and at least as early as B.C. 2000. These legends were, however, traditions before they were committed to writing, and were common in some form to the whole of Chaldea.

The account of the Creation in days, though probably of late Assyrian origin in its present form, may nevertheless rest on older traditions. At present, however, it is not possible to assign to it any great antiquity.

It should, of course, be remembered, that the texts we possess at present are written in Semitic Babylonian or Assyrian—Babylonian and Assyrian being but slightly varying dialects of the same language. They are, however, mostly translations of earlier Accadian documents, and belong to the same period as that which witnessed the foundation of the library of Agané. We shall not be far wrong, therefore, in dating them in their present form about B.C. 2000. The translations then made were copied by successive generations of librarians and scribes, the latest copies of which we know being those that have been brought from the library of Kouyunjik.

To the same early period belonged various other literary compositions, among which we may particularize a long work on terrestrial omens, compiled for Sargon of Agané, as well as the syllabaries, grammars, phrase-books and vocabularies, and other bilingual tablets by means of which a knowledge of the old language of Accad was conveyed to the Babylonian or Assyrian scholar.

On the other hand, a series of tablets on evil spirits, which contained a totally different tradition of the Creation from that in days, goes back to the Accadian epoch; and there is a third account from the City of Cutha, closely agreeing in some respects with the account handed down by Berosus, which must be placed about the same date.

In spite of the indications as to peculiarities of worship, names of states and capitals, historical allusions and other evidence, it may seem hazardous to many persons to fix the dates of original documents so high, when our only copies in many cases are Assyrian transcripts made in the reign of Assur-bani-pal, in the seventh century B.C.; but one or two considerations may show that this is a perfectly reasonable view, and no other likely period can be found for the original composition of the documents unless we ascend to a greater antiquity. In the first place, it must be noticed that the Assyrians themselves state that the documents were copied from ancient Babylonian copies, and in some cases state that the old copies were partly illegible even in their day. Again, in more than one case there is actual proof of the antiquity of a text. We may refer, for example, to a text an Assyrian copy of part of which is published in "Cuneiform Inscriptions," vol. ii. plate 54, Nos. 3 & 4. In a collection of tablets discovered by Mr. Loftus at Senkereh, belonging, according to the kings mentioned in it, to about B.C. 1600, is part of an ancient Babylonian copy of this very text, the Babylonian copy being about one thousand years older than the Assyrian one.

Similarly a fragment of a Babylonian transcript of the Deluge tablet has recently been brought from Babylonia, and serves not only to fill up some of the breaks in our Assyrian copies, but also to verify the text of the latter.

It is unfortunate that so many of the documents embodying the Genesis traditions are in such a sadly mutilated condition, but there can be no doubt that future explorations will reveal more perfect copies, and numerous companion and explanatory texts, which will one day clear up the difficulties which now meet us at every step of our examination of them.

So far as known contemporary inscriptions are concerned, we cannot consider our present researches and discoveries as anything like sufficient to give a fair view of the literature of Assyria and Babylonia; and however numerous and important the Genesis legends may be, they form but a small portion of the whole literature of the country.

It is generally considered that the earliest inscriptions of any importance which we now possess belong to the time of Lig-Bagas, king of Ur, who first united under his sway the petty kingdoms into which Chaldea was previously split up, and whose age is generally assigned to about three thousand years before the Christian era.

The principal inscriptions of this period consist of texts on bricks and on signet cylinders, and some of the latter may be of much greater antiquity. Passing down to a time when the country was again divided into the kingdoms of Karrak, Larsa, and Agané, we find a great accession of literary material, almost every class of writing being represented by contemporary specimens. Each of the principal cities had its library, and education seems to have been widely diffused. From Senkereh, the ancient Larsa, and its neighbourhood have come our oldest specimens of these literary tablets, the following being some of the contents of this earliest known library:—

1. Mythological tablets, including lists of the gods, and their manifestations and titles.

2. Grammatical works, lists of words, and explanations.

3. Mathematical works, calculations, tables of cube and square roots, and tables of measures.

4. Works on astronomy, astrology, and omens.

5. Legends and short historical inscriptions.

6. Historical cylinders, one of Kudur-mabuk, B.C. 1800 (?) (the earliest known cylinder), being in the British Museum.

7. Geographical tablets, and lists of towns and countries.

8. Tablets containing laws and law cases, records of sale and barter, wills and loans.

Such are the inscriptions a single library of Babylonia has produced, and beside these there are numerous texts, only known to us through later copies, but which certainly had their origin as early as this period.

Passing down from this period, for some centuries we find only detached inscriptions, accompanied by evidence of the gradual shifting of both political power and literary activity from Babylonia to Assyria.

In Assyria the first centre of literature and seat of a library was the city of Assur (Kileh Shergat), and the earliest known tablets date about B.C. 1500.

Beyond the scanty records of a few monarchs nothing of value remains of this library, and the literary works contained in it are only known from later copies.

A revival of the Assyrian empire began under Assur-natsir-pal, king of Assyria, who ascended the throne B.C. 885. He rebuilt the city of Calah (Nimroud), and this city became the seat of an Assyrian library. Tablets were procured from Babylonia by Shalmaneser, son of Assur-natsir-pal, B.C. 860, during the reign of Nabu-bal-idina, king of Babylon, and these were copied by the Assyrian scribes, and placed in the royal library. Rimmon-nirari, grandson of Shalmaneser, B.C. 812, added to the Calah library, and had tablets written at Nineveh. Assur-nirari, B.C. 755, continued the literary work, some mythological tablets being dated in his reign.

Tiglath Pileser, B.C. 745, enlarged the library, and placed in it various copies of historical inscriptions. It was, however, reserved for Sargon, who founded the last Assyrian dynasty, B.C. 721, to make the Assyrian royal library worthy of the empire. Early in his reign he appointed Nabu-zuqub-cinu principal librarian, and this officer set to work to make new copies of all the standard works of the day. During the whole of his term of office copies of the great literary works were produced, the majority of the texts preserved belonging to the early period previous to Khammuragas.

With the accession of Sargon came a revival of literature in Assyria; education became more general, ancient texts were brought from Babylonia to be copied, and the antiquarian study of early literature became fashionable.

Sennacherib, son of Sargon, B.C. 704, continued to add to his father's library at Calah, but late in his reign he removed the collection from that city to Nineveh (Kouyunjik), where from this time forth the national library remained until the fall of the empire.

Esarhaddon, son of Sennacherib, B.C. 681, further increased the national collection, most of the works he added being of a religious character.

Assur-bani-pal, son of Esarhaddon, the Sardanapalus of the Greeks, B.C. 670, was the greatest of the Assyrian sovereigns, and he is far more memorable on account of his magnificent patronage of learning than on account of the greatness of his empire or the extent of his wars.

Assur-bani-pal added more to the Assyrian royal library than all the kings who had gone before him, and it is to tablets written in his reign that we owe almost all our knowledge of the Babylonian myths and early history, beside many other important matters.

The agents of Assur-bani-pal sought everywhere for inscribed tablets, brought them to Nineveh, and copied them there; thus the literary treasures of Babylon, Borsippa, Cutha, Agané, Ur, Erech, Larsa, Nipur, and various other cities were transferred to the Assyrian capital to enrich the great collection there.

The fragments brought over to Europe give us a good idea of this library and show the range of the subjects embraced by its collection of works. Among the different classes of texts, the Genesis stories and similar legends occupied a prominent place; these, as they will be further described in the present volume, need only be mentioned here. Accompanying them we have a series of mythological tablets of various sorts, varying from legends of the gods, psalms, songs, prayers, and hymns, down to mere allusions and lists of names. Many of these texts take the form of charms to be used in sickness and for the expulsion of evil spirits; some of them are of great antiquity, being older than the Izdubar legends. One fine series deals with remedies against witchcraft and the assaults of evil spirits. Izdubar is mentioned in one of these tablets as lord of the oaths or pledges of the world.

Some of the prayers were for use on special occasions, such as on starting on a campaign, on the occurrence of an eclipse, &c. Astronomy and astrology were represented by various detached inscriptions and reports, but principally by the great work of which mention has already been made, and many copies of which were in the Library of Assur-bani-pal.

Among the Astrological tablets is a fragment which professes to be copied from an original of the time of Izdubar.

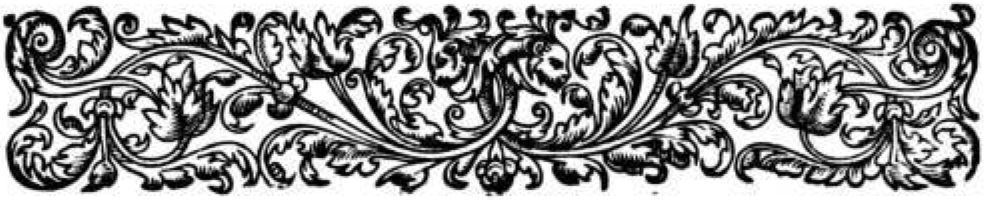
Historical texts formed another section of the library, and these included numerous copies of inscriptions of early Babylonian kings; there were besides, chronological tablets with lists of kings and annual officers, inscriptions of various Assyrian monarchs, histories of the relations between Assyria and Babylonia, Elam, and Arabia, treaties, despatches, proclamations, and reports on the state of the empire and military affairs.

Natural history was represented by bilingual lists of mammals, birds, reptiles, fishes, insects, and plants, trees, grasses, reeds, and grains, earths, stones, &c. These lists are classified according to the supposed nature and affinities of the various species, and show considerable advance in the sciences. Mathematics had a place in the library, there being tables of problems, figures, and calculations; but this branch of learning was not studied so fully as in Babylonia.

Grammar and Lexicography were better represented, since there were many works on these subjects, including lists of the characters, the declension of the noun, the conjugation of the verb, examples of syntactical construction, reading-books, interlinear translations of Accadian texts, and the like. All these tablets were copied from Babylonian originals. In legal and civil literature the library was also rich, and the tablets serve to show that the same laws and customs prevailed in Assyria as in Babylonia. There are codes of laws, law cases, records of sale, barter, and loans, lists of property, lists of titles and trades, of tribute and taxes, &c.

In Geography the Assyrians were not very advanced; but there are lists of countries and their productions, of cities, rivers, mountains, and peoples.

Such are some of the principal contents of the great library from which we have obtained our copies of the Creation and Flood legends. Most of the tablets were copied from early Babylonian ones which have in most cases disappeared; but the copies are sufficient to show the wonderful progress in culture and civilization already made by the people of Chaldea long before the age of Moses or even Abraham. Babylonian literature, which had been the parent of Assyrian writing, revived after the fall of Nineveh, and Nebuchadnezzar and his successors made Babylon the seat of a library rivalling that of Assur-bani-pal at Nineveh. Of this later development of Babylonian literature we know very little, explorations being still required to bring to light its texts. A few fragments only, discovered by wandering Arabs or recovered by chance travellers, have as yet turned up, but there is in them evidence enough to promise a rich reward to future excavators.



CHAPTER III.

CHALDEAN LEGENDS TRANSMITTED THROUGH BEROSUS AND OTHER ANCIENT AUTHORS.

BY way of introduction to the native versions of the early legends left us by the Babylonians, it is advisable to glance at the principal fragments bearing on them which are found in the classical writers of Greece and Rome. Several others might have been quoted, but their origin is doubtful, and they are of less importance for the subject in hand. Those who wish to consult them may turn to Cory's "Ancient Fragments" (2nd edition, 1876), whose translations, as being fairly scholarlike and correct, are here given without alteration.

Berosus, from whom the principal extracts are copied, lived, as has already been stated, about B.C. 330 to 260, and, from his position as a Babylonian priest, had the best means of knowing the Babylonian traditions.

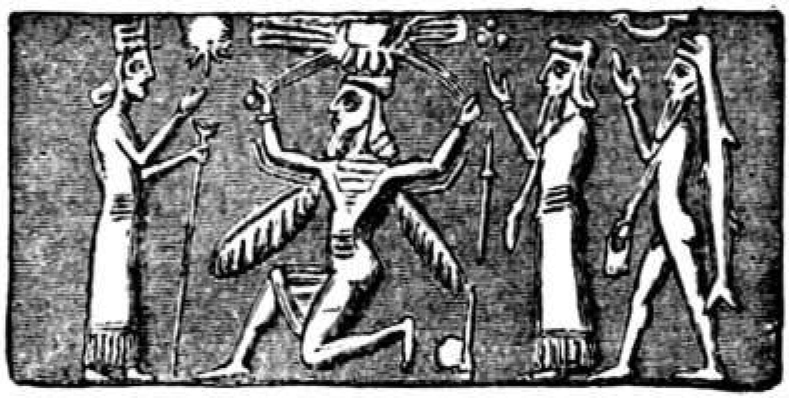
The others are later writers, who copied in the main from Berosus, most of whose notices may be taken as mere abridgments of his statements.

EXTRACT I. FROM ALEXANDER POLYHISTOR (CORY, p. 56).

Berosus, in the first book of his history of Babylonia, informs us that he lived in the age of Alexander, the son of Philip. And he mentions that there were written accounts, preserved at Babylon with the greatest care, comprehending a period of above fifteen myriads of years; and that these writings contained histories of the heaven and of the sea; of the birth of mankind; and of the kings, and of the memorable actions which they had achieved.

And in the first place he describes Babylonia as a country situated between the Tigris and the Euphrates; that it abounded with wheat, and barley, and ocrus, and sesame; and that in the lakes were found the roots called gongæ, which are fit for food, and in respect to nutriment similar to barley. There were also palm-trees and apples, and a variety of fruits; fish also and birds, both those which are merely of flight, and those which frequent the water. Those parts of the country which bordered upon Arabia were without water, and barren; but that which lay on the other side was both hilly and fertile.

At Babylon there was (in these times) a great resort of people of various races, who inhabited Chaldea, and lived in a lawless manner like the beasts of the field.

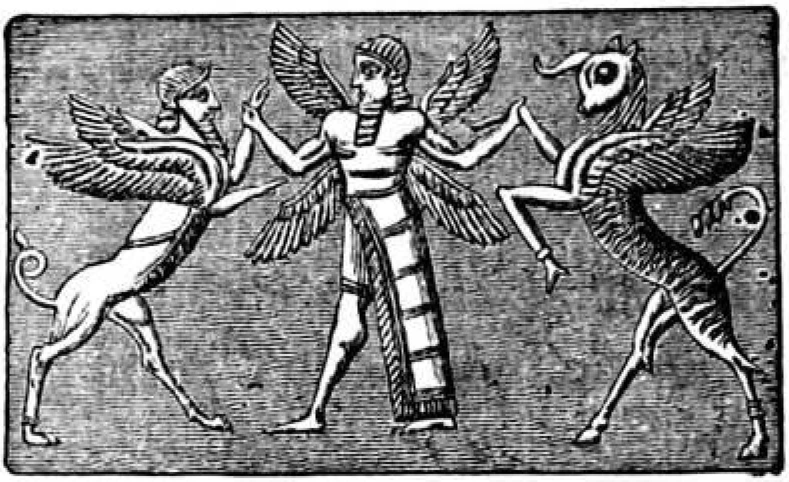


Oannes and other Babylonian Mythological Figures from Cylinder.

In the first year there appeared, from that part of the Erythræan sea which borders upon Babylonia, an animal endowed with reason, by name Oannes, whose whole body (according to the account of Apollodorus) was that of a fish; under the fish's head he had another head, with feet also below similar to those of a man, subjoined to the fish's tail. His voice, too, and language were articulate and human; and a representation of him is preserved even to this day.

This being was accustomed to pass the day among men, but took no food at that season; and he gave them an insight into letters and sciences, and arts of every kind. He taught them to construct houses, to found temples, to compile laws, and explained to them the principles of geometrical knowledge. He made them distinguish the seeds of the earth, and showed them how to collect the fruits; in short, he instructed them in every thing which could tend to soften manners and humanize their lives. From that time, nothing material has been added by way of improvement to his instructions. And when the sun had set this being Oannes used to retire again into the sea, and pass the night in the deep, for he was amphibious. After this there appeared other animals like Oannes, of which Berosus proposes to give an account when he comes to the history of the kings. Moreover, Oannes wrote concerning the generation of mankind, of their different ways of life, and of their civil polity; and the following is the purport of what he said:—

"There was a time in which there existed nothing but darkness and an abyss of waters, wherein resided most hideous beings, which were produced of a two-fold principle. There appeared men, some of whom were furnished with two wings, others with four, and with two faces. They had one body, but two heads; the one that of a man, the other of a woman; they were likewise in their several organs both male and female. Other human figures were to be seen with the legs and horns of a goat; some had horses' feet, while others united the hind quarters of a horse with the body of a man, resembling in shape the hippocentaurs. Bulls likewise were bred there with the heads of men; and dogs with fourfold bodies, terminated in their extremities with the tails of fishes; horses also with the heads of dogs; men, too, and other animals, with the heads and bodies of horses, and the tails of fishes. In short, there were creatures in which were combined the limbs of every species of animals. In addition to these, fishes, reptiles, serpents, with other monstrous animals, which assumed each other's shape and countenance. Of all which were preserved delineations in the temple of Belus at Babylon.



COMPOSITE ANIMALS FROM CYLINDER.

“The person who was supposed to have presided over them was a woman named Omoroka, which in the Chaldean language is Thalatth; which in Greek is interpreted Thalassa, the sea; but according to the most true interpretation it is equivalent to Selene the moon. All things being in this situation, Belus came, and cut the woman asunder, and of one half of her he formed the earth, and of the other half the heavens, and at the same time destroyed the animals within her (or in the abyss).

“All this” (he says) “was an allegorical description of nature. For, the whole universe consisting of moisture, and animals being continually generated therein, the deity above-mentioned (Belus) cut off his own head; upon which the other gods mixed the blood, as it gushed out, with the earth, and from thence men were formed. On this account it is that they are rational, and partake of divine knowledge. This Belus, by whom they signify Hades (Pluto), divided the darkness, and separated the heavens from the earth, and reduced the universe to order. But the recently-created animals, not being able to bear the prevalence of light, died. Belus upon this, seeing a vast space unoccupied, though by nature fruitful, commanded one of the gods to take off his head, and to mix the blood with the earth, and from thence to form other men and animals, which should be capable of bearing the light. Belus formed also the stars, and the sun, and the moon, and the five planets.” (Such, according to Alexander Polyhistor, is the account which Berosus gives in his first book.)

(In the second book was contained the history of the ten kings of the Chaldeans, and the periods of the continuance of each reign, which consisted collectively of an hundred and twenty sari, or four hundred and thirty-two thousand years; reaching to the time of the Deluge. For Alexander, enumerating the kings from the writings of the Chaldeans, after the ninth, Ardates, proceeds to the tenth, who is called by them Xisuthrus, in this manner):—

“After the death of Ardates, his son Xisuthrus reigned eighteen sari. In his time happened the great deluge; the history of which is thus described. The deity Kronos appeared to him in a vision, and warned him that upon the fifteenth day of the month Dæsius there would be a flood, by which mankind would be destroyed. He therefore enjoined him to write a history of the beginning, progress, and conclusion of all things, down to the present term, and to bury it in Sippara, the city of the Sun; and to build a vessel, and take with him into it his friends and relations; and to convey on board every thing necessary to sustain life, together with all the different animals, both birds and quadrupeds, and trust himself fearlessly to the deep. Having asked the Deity whither he was to sail, he was answered, ‘To the Gods;’ upon which he offered up a prayer for the good of mankind. He then obeyed the divine admonition, and built a vessel five stadia in length, and two in breadth. Into this he put everything which he had prepared, and last of all conveyed into it his wife, his children, and his friends.

After the flood had been upon the earth, and was in time abated, Xisuthrus sent out birds from the vessel; which not finding any food, nor any place whereupon they might rest their feet, returned to him again. After an interval of some days, he sent them forth a second time; and they now returned with their feet tinged with mud. He made a trial a third time with these birds; but they returned to him no more: from whence he judged that the surface of the earth had appeared above the waters. He therefore made an opening in the vessel, and upon looking out found that it was stranded upon the side of some mountain; upon which he immediately quitted it with his wife, his daughter, and the pilot. Xisuthrus then paid his adoration to the earth: and, having constructed an altar, offered sacrifices to the gods, and, with those who had come out of the vessel with him, disappeared.

They who remained within, finding that their companions did not return, quitted the vessel with many lamentations, and called continually on the name of Xisuthrus. Him they saw no more; but they could distinguish his voice in the air, and could hear him admonish them to pay due regard to the gods; and he likewise informed them that it was upon account of his piety that he was translated to live with the gods, and that his wife and daughter and the pilot had obtained the same honour. To this he added that they should return to Babylonia, and, as it was ordained, search for the writings at Sippara, which they were to make known to all mankind; moreover, that the place wherein they then were was the land of Armenia. The rest having heard these words offered sacrifices to the gods, and, taking a circuit, journeyed towards Babylonia.

The vessel being thus stranded in Armenia, some part of it yet remains in the Gordyæan (or Kurdish) mountains in Armenia, and the people scrape off the bitumen with which it had been outwardly coated, and make use of it by way of an antidote and amulet. In this manner they returned to Babylon and when they had found the writings at Sippara they built cities and erected temples, and Babylon was thus inhabited again."—Syncel. Chron. xxviii.; Euseb. Chron. v. 8.

Berosus, from Apollodorus (Cory, p. 51).

This is the history which Berosus has transmitted to us. He tells us that the first king was Alorus of Babylon, a Chaldean; he reigned ten sari (36,000 years); and afterwards Alaparus and Amelon, who came from Pantibiblon; then Ammenon the Chaldean, in whose time appeared the Musarus Oannes, the Annedotus from the Erythræan sea. (But Alexander Polyhistor, anticipating the event, has said that he appeared in the first year, but Apollodorus says that it was after forty sari; Abydenus, however, makes the second Annedotus appear after twenty-six sari.) Then succeeded Megalarus from the city of Pantibiblon, and he reigned eighteen sari; and after him Daonus, the shepherd from Pantibiblon, reigned ten sari; in his time (he says) appeared again from the Erythræan sea a fourth Annedotus, having the same form with those above, the shape of a fish blended with that of a man. Then reigned Euedorachus (or Euedoreschus) from Pantibiblon for the term of eighteen sari; in his days there appeared another personage from the Erythræan sea like the former, having the same complicated form between a fish and a man, whose name was Odakon. (All these, says Apollodorus, related particularly and circumstantially whatever Oannes had informed them of; concerning these Abydenus has made no mention.) Then reigned Amempsinus, a Chaldean from Larancha; and he being the eighth in order reigned ten sari. Then reigned Otiartes,[1] a Chaldean, from Larancha; and he ruled eight sari. And, upon the death of Otiartes, his son Xisuthrus reigned eighteen sari; in his time happened the great Deluge. So that the sum of all the kings is ten; and the term which they collectively reigned an hundred and twenty sari.—Syncel. Chron. xxxix.; Euseb. Chron. v.

BEROSUS, FROM ABYDENUS (CORY, p. 53).

So much concerning the wisdom of the Chaldeans.

It is said that the first king of the country was Alorus, and that he gave out a report that God had appointed him to be the shepherd[2] of the people; he reigned ten sari; now a sarus is esteemed to be three thousand six hundred years, a neros six hundred, and a sossus sixty.

After him Alaparus reigned three sari; to him succeeded Amillarus from the city of Pantibiblon, who reigned thirteen sari; in his time there came up from the sea a second Annedotus, a demigod very similar in form to Oannes; after Amillarus reigned Ammenon twelve sari; who was of the city of Pantibiblon; then Megalarus of the same place reigned eighteen sari; then Daos the shepherd governed for the space of ten sari, he was of Pantibiblon; in his time four double-shaped personages came up out of the sea to land, whose names were Euedokus, Eneugamus, Eneubulus, and Anementus; afterwards in the time of Euedoreschus appeared another, Anodaphus. After these reigned other kings, and last of all Sisithrus, so that in all the number amounted to ten kings, and the term of their reigns to an hundred and twenty sari. (And among other things not irrelative to the subject he continues thus concerning the Deluge): After Euedoreschus some others reigned, and then Sisithrus. To him the deity Kronos foretold that on the fifteenth day of the month Dæsius there would be a deluge of rain: and he commanded him to deposit all the writings whatever which were in his possession in Sippara the city of the sun. Sisithrus, when he had complied with these commands, sailed immediately to Armenia, and was presently inspired by God. Upon the third day after the cessation of the rain Sisithrus sent out birds by way of experiment, that he might judge whether the flood had subsided. But the birds, passing over an unbounded sea without finding any place of rest, returned again to Sisithrus. This he repeated with other birds. And when upon the third trial he succeeded, for the birds then returned with their feet stained with mud, the gods translated him from among men. With respect to the vessel, which yet remains in Armenia, it is a custom of the inhabitants to form bracelets and amulets of its wood.—Syncel. Chron. xxxviii.; Euseb. Præp. Evan. lib. ix.; Euseb. Chron. v. 8.

OF THE TOWER OF BABEL (CORY, p. 55).

They say that the first inhabitants of the earth, glorying in their own strength and size and despising the gods, undertook to build a tower whose top should reach the sky, in the place where Babylon now stands; but when it approached the heaven the winds assisted the gods, and overturned the work upon its contrivers, and its ruins are said to be still at Babylon; and the gods introduced a diversity of tongues among men, who till that time had all spoken the same language; and a war arose between Kronos and Titan. The place in which they built the tower is now called Babylon on account of the confusion of tongues, for confusion is by the Hebrews called Babel. —Euseb. Præp. Evan. lib. ix.; Syncel. Chron. xliv.; Euseb. Chron. xiii.

OF THE DISPERSION, FROM HESTIÆUS (CORY, p. 74).

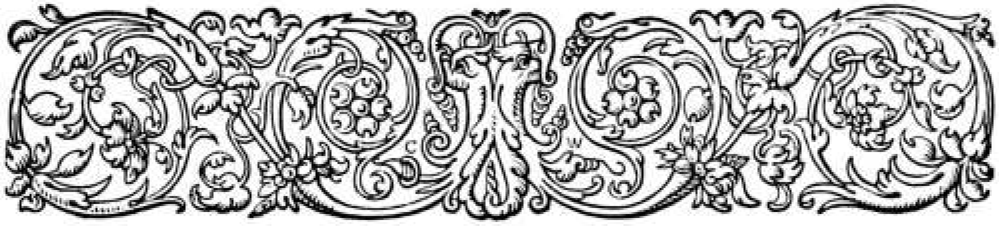
The priests who escaped took with them the implements of the worship of the Enyalian Zeus, and came to Senaar in Babylonia. But they were again driven from thence by the introduction of a diversity of tongues; upon which they founded colonies in various parts, each settling in such situations as chance or the direction of God led them to occupy.—Jos. Ant. Jud. i. c. 4; Euseb. Præp. Evan. ix.

OF THE TOWER OF BABEL, FROM ALEXANDER POLYHISTOR (CORY, p. 75).

The Sibyl says: That when all men formerly spoke the same language some among them undertook to erect a large and lofty tower, that they might climb up into heaven. But God sending forth a whirlwind confounded their design, and gave to each tribe a particular language of its own, which is the reason that the name of that city is Babylon. After the deluge lived Titan and Prometheus, when Titan undertook a war against Kronos.—Sync. xliv.; Jos. Ant. Jud. i. c. 4.; Euseb. Præp. Evan. ix.

The Theogonies, from Damascius (Cory, p. 92).

But the Babylonians, like the rest of the barbarians, pass over in silence the One principle of the universe, and they constitute two: Tauthe[3] and Apason,[4] making Apason the husband of Tauthe, and denominating her the mother of the gods. And from these proceeds an only-begotten son, Moymis,[5] which I conceive is no other than the intelligible world proceeding from the two principles. From them also another progeny is derived, Dache and Dachus;[6] and again a third, Kissare and Assorus, from which last three others proceed, Anus (Anu), and Illinus (Elum), and Aus (Hea). And of Aus and Dauke (Dav-cina, "lady of the earth,") is born a son called Belus, who, they say, is the fabricator of the world, the Demiurgus.



CHAPTER IV.
BABYLONIAN MYTHOLOGY.

Greek accounts.—Mythology local in origin.—Antiquity.—Conquests.—Colonies.—Three great gods.—Twelve great gods.—Angels.—Spirits.—Anu.—Anatu.—Rimmon.—Istar.—Equivalent to Venus.—Hea.—Oannes.—Merodach.—Bel or Zeus.—Zirat-banit, Succoth Benoth.—Bel.—Sin the moon god.—Ninip.—Samas.—Nergal.—Anunit.—Table of gods.

IN their accounts of the Creation and of the early history of the human race the Babylonian divinities figure very prominently, but it is often difficult to identify the deities mentioned by the Greek authors, because the phonetic reading of many of the names of the Babylonian gods is still very obscure, and the classical writers frequently replace them by the deities of their own mythology, whom they imagined to correspond with the Babylonian names.

In this chapter it is proposed to give a general account only of certain parts of the Babylonian mythology, in order to show the relationship between the deities and their titles and work.

Babylonian mythology was local in origin; each of the gods had a particular city which was the special seat of his worship, and it is probable that the idea of weaving the gods into a system, in which each should have his part to play, did not arise until after the Semitic occupation of the country. The antiquity of this systematized mythology may, however, be seen from the fact, that two thousand years before the Christian era it was already completed, and its deities definitely connected into a system which remained with little change down to the close of the kingdom.

In early times the gods were worshipped only at their original cities or seats, the various cities or settlements being independent of each other; but it was natural as wars arose, and some cities gained conquests over others, and kings gradually united the country into monarchies, that the conquerors should impose their gods upon the conquered. Thus arose the system of different ranks or grades among the gods. Colonies, again, were sent out at times, and the colonies, as they considered themselves sons of the cities they started from, also considered their gods to be sons of the gods of the mother cities. Political changes in early times led to the rise and fall of various towns and consequently of their deities, and gave rise to numerous myths relating to the different personages in the mythology. In some remote age there appear to have been three great cities in the country, Erech, Eridu, and Nipur, and their divinities Anu, Hea, and Bel were considered the "great gods" of the country. Subsequent changes led to the decline of these states, but their deities still retained their position to the end of the Babylonian system.

These three leading deities formed members of a circle of twelve gods, also called "great." These gods and their titles are given as:

1. Anu, meaning "the sky" in Accadian, king of angels and spirits, lord of the city of Erech.

2. Bel, Elum or Mul in Accadian, lord of the lower world, father of the gods, creator, lord of the city of Nipur.

3. Hea, "god of the house of water," maker of fate, lord of the deep, god of wisdom and knowledge, lord of the city of Eridu.

4. Sin, the Moon-god, Acu or Agu in Accadian, lord of crowns, maker of brightness, lord of the city of Ur.

5. Merodach, "the glory of the Sun," just prince of the gods, lord of birth, lord of the city of Babylon.

6. Rimmon, the Air-god, Mirmir in Accadian, the strong god, lord of canals and atmosphere, lord of the city of Muru.

7. Samas, the Sun-god, Utuci in Accadian, judge of heaven and earth, director of all, lord of the cities of Larsa and Sippara.

8. Ninip, warrior of the gods, destroyer of the wicked, lord of the city of Nipur.

9. Nergal, "illuminator of the great city" (Hades), giant king of war, lord of the city of Cutha.

10. Nusku, holder of the golden sceptre, the lofty god.

11. Belat, wife of Bel, mother of the great gods, lady of the city of Nipur.

12. Istar, Gingir in Accadian, eldest of heaven and earth, raising the face of warriors.

Below these deities there was a large body of gods forming the bulk of the pantheon, and below these were arranged the Igigi, or 300 angels of heaven, and the Anunnaki, or 600 angels of earth. Below these again came various classes of spirits or genii called Sedu, Vadukku, Ekimu, Gallu, and others; some of these were evil, some good.

The relationship of the various principal gods and their names, titles and offices will appear from the following remarks.

At the head of the Babylonian mythology stands a deity who was sometimes identified with the heavens, sometimes considered as the ruler and god of heaven. This deity is named Anu, his sign is the simple star, the symbol of divinity, and at other times the Maltese cross. In the philosophic theology of a later age, Anu represents abstract divinity, and he appears as an original principle, perhaps as the original principle of nature. He represents the universe as the upper and lower regions, and when these were divided the upper region or heaven was called Anu, while the lower region or earth was called Anatu; Anatu being the female principle or wife of Anu. Anu is termed the old god, and the god of the whole of heaven and earth; one of the manifestations of Anu was under the two forms Lakhmu and Lakhamu, which probably correspond to the Greek forms Dache and Dachus, see p. 44.[7] These forms are said to have sprung out of the original chaos, and they are followed by the two forms Sar and Kisar (the Kissare and Assorus of the Greeks). Sar means the upper hosts or expanse, Kisar the lower hosts or expanse; these are also forms or manifestations of Anu and his wife. Anu is further called lord of the old city, and bears the name of Alalu. His titles generally indicate height, antiquity, purity, divinity, and he may be taken as the general type of divinity. Anu was originally worshipped at the city of Erech, which was called the city of Anu and Anatu, and the great temple there was called the "house of Anu," or the "house of heaven."

Anatu, the wife or consort of Anu, is generally only a female form of Anu, but is sometimes contrasted with him; thus, when Anu represents height and heaven, Anatu represents depth and earth; she is also the lady of darkness, the mother of the god Hea, the mother of heaven and earth, the female fish-god, and is often identified with Istar or Venus. Anatu, however, had no existence in Accadian mythology. She is the product of the imagination of the Semites, whose grammar drew a distinction between the masculine and feminine genders.

Anu and Anatu had a numerous family; among their sons are numbered Lugal-edin, "the king of the desert," Latarak, Ab-gula, Kusu, and the air-god, whose name was Ramman or Rimmon, in Accadian Mirmir. Rimmon is god of the region of the atmosphere, or space between the heaven and earth, he is the god of rain, of storms and whirlwind, of thunder and lightning, of floods and watercourses. He was in high esteem in Syria and Arabia, where he bore the name of Dadda; in Armenia he was called Teiseba. Rimmon is always considered an active deity, and was extensively worshipped.

Another important god, a son of Anu, was the god of fire, whose name was Gibil in Accadian. The fire-god takes an active part in the numerous mythological tablets and legends, and is considered to be the most potent deity in relation to witchcraft and spells generally.

The most important of the daughters of Anu was named Istar; she was in some respects the equivalent of the classical Venus. Her worship was at first subordinate to that of Anu, and as she was goddess of love, while Anu was god of heaven, it is probable that the first intention in the mythology was only to represent love as heaven-born; but in time a more sensual view prevailed, and the worship of Istar became one of the darkest features in Babylonian mythology. As the worship of this goddess increased in favour, it gradually superseded that of Anu, until in time his temple, the house of heaven, came to be regarded as the temple of Venus.

The planet Venus, as the evening star, was identified with Istar of Erech, while the morning star was Anunit, goddess of Agané.

Istar, however, was worshipped under a great variety of forms. Each city, each state, had its own special Istar and its own special worship of her. In the syncretic age of Babylonian theology, these various forms and modes of worship were amalgamated together, and epithets of the goddess which were originally peculiar to particular localities, were applied to the single goddess of the state religion. Thus, according to the legends of one part of Babylonia, Istar was the daughter of the Moon-god, according to those of another part of the country she was the daughter of Anu. Hence in the mythology of a later period she appears sometimes as the daughter of the one deity, sometimes as the daughter of the other.

A companion deity with Anu is Hea, who is god, of the sea and of Hades, in fact of all the lower regions. In some of his attributes he answers to the Kronos of the Greeks, in others to their Poseidon. Hea is called god of the lower region, he is lord of the sea or abyss; he is also lord of generation and of all human beings and bears the titles: lord of wisdom, of mines and treasures; of gifts, of music, of fishermen and sailors, and of Hades or hell. It has been supposed that the serpent was one of his emblems, and that he was the Oannes of Berosus; but these conjectures have not yet been proved. The wife of Hea was Davkina, the Davke of Damascius, who is the goddess of the lower regions, the consort of the deep; and their principal son was Maruduk or Merodach, the Bel of later times.

Merodach, god of Babylon, appears in all the earlier inscriptions as the agent of his father Hea; he goes about the world collecting information, and receives commissions from his father to set right all that appears wrong. He is called the redeemer of mankind, the restorer to life, and the raiser from the dead. He is an active agent in creation, but is always subordinate to his father Hea. In later times, after Babylon had been made the capital, Merodach, who was god of that city, was raised to the head of the Pantheon. Merodach afterwards came to be identified with the classical Jupiter, but the name Bel, "the lord," was only given to him in times subsequent to the rise of Babylon, when the worship of the older Bel, the Accadian Elum, was falling into decay. The wife of Merodach was Zirat-panit, perhaps the Succoth Benoth of the Bible. Besides Merodach, Hea had a numerous progeny, his sons being principally river-gods.

Nebo, the god of knowledge and literature, who was worshipped at the neighbouring city of Borsippa, was a favourite deity in later times, as was also his consort Tasmit "the Hearer." Nebo, whose name signifies "the prophet,” was called Timkhir in Accadian, and had his temple in the island of Dilvun, called “the island of the gods” by the Accadians, now Bahrein. Here he was worshipped under the name of Enzak.

A third great god was united with Anu and Hea, named Enu, Mul, and Elum in Accadian, and Bel in Semitic Babylonian; he was the original Bel of the Babylonian mythology, and was lord of the surface of the earth and the affairs of men. Elum was lord of the city of Nipur, and in the Semitic period had a consort named Belat or Beltis. He was held to be the most active of the gods in the general affairs of mankind, and was so generally worshipped in early times that he came to be regarded as the national divinity, and his temple at the city of Nipur was regarded as the type of all others. The extensive worship of Bel, and the high honour in which he was held, seem to point to a time when his city, Nipur, was the metropolis of the country.

Belat, or Beltis, the wife of Bel, is a famous deity celebrated in all ages, but as the title Belat only signified “lady,” or “goddess,” it was a common one for many goddesses, and the notices of Beltis probably refer to several different personages.

Bel had, like the other gods, a numerous family; his eldest son was the moon-god, called Agu or Acu in Accadian, in later times generally termed Sin. Sin was presiding deity of the city of Ur, and early assumed an important place in the mythology. The moon-god figures prominently in some early legends, and during the time when the city of Ur was capital of the country his worship became very widely-spread and popular throughout the country.

Ninip, god of hunting and war, was another celebrated son of Bel; he was worshipped with his father at Nipur. Ninip was also much worshipped in Assyria as well as Babylonia, his character as presiding genius of war and the chase making him a favourite deity with the warlike kings of Assyria. Originally he was a form of the sun-god.

Sin the moon-god had a son Samas, the sun-god. Samas is an active deity in some of the Izdubar legends and fables, but he is generally subordinate to Sin. In the Babylonian system the moon takes precedence of the sun, as befitted a nation of astronomers, and the Samas of Larsa was probably considered a different deity from Samas of Sippara.

Among the other deities of the Babylonians may be counted Nergal, god of Cutha, who like Ninip, presided over hunting and war, and Anunit, the goddess of one of the quarters of Sippara, and of the city of Agané.

The following table will exhibit the relationship of the principal deities as it had been drawn up by the native writers on the cosmogony; but it must be noted that it belongs to a late age of syncretic philosophy, when the scholars of Assur-bani-pal's court were endeavouring to resolve the old deities of Accad into mere abstractions, and so explain the myths which described the creation of the world.

Chapter V.

BABYLONIAN LEGEND OF THE CREATION.

Mutilated condition of tablets.—List of subjects.—Description of chaos.—Tiamat.—Generation of Gods.—Damascius.—Comparison with Genesis.—Three great gods.—Doubtful fragments.—Fifth tablet.—Stars.—Moon.—Sun.—Abyss or chaos.—Creation of moon.—Creation of animals.—Monotheism.—Hymn to Merodach.—The black-headed race or Adamites.—Garden of Eden.—The flaming sword.—The fall.—The Sabbath.—Sacred tree.—Hymn to the Creator.

IT is extremely unfortunate that the legend of the Creation in days has reached us in so fragmentary a condition. It is evident, however, that in its present form it is of Assyrian, not of Babylonian, origin, and was probably composed in the time of Assur-bani-pal. It breathes throughout the spirit of a later age, its language and style show no traces of an Accadian original, and the colophon at the end implies by its silence that it was not a copy of an older document. No doubt the story itself was an ancient one; the number seven was a sacred number among the Accadians, who invented the week of seven days, and kept a seventhday Sabbath, and excavations in Babylonia may yet bring to light the early Chaldean form of the legend. But this we do not at present possess.

So far as the fragments can be arranged, they seem to observe the following order:—

1. Part of the first tablet, giving an account of the Chaos and the generation of the gods.
2. Fragment of subsequent tablet, perhaps the second on the foundation of the deep.
3. Fragment of tablet placed here with great doubt, possibly referring to the creation of land.
4. Part of the fifth tablet, recording the creation of the heavenly bodies.
5. Fragment of the seventh? tablet, recording the creation of land animals.

These fragments indicate that the series included at least seven tablets, the writing on each tablet being in one column on the front and back, and probably including over one hundred lines of text.

The first fragment in the story is the upper part of the first tablet, giving the description of the void or chaos, and part of the generation of the gods. The translation is as follows:

1. At that time above, the heaven was unnamed:
2. below the earth by name was unrecorded;
3. the boundless deep also (was) their generator.
4. The chaos of the sea was she who bore the whole of them.
5. Their waters were collected together in one place, and
6. the flowering reed was not gathered, the marsh-plant was not grown.
7. At that time the gods had not been produced, any one of them;
8. By name they had not been called, destiny was not fixed.
9. Were made also the (great) gods,
10. the gods Lakhmu and Lakhamu were produced (the first), and
11. to growth they ....
12. the gods Sar and Kisar were made next.
13. The days were long; a long (time passed), (and)
14. the gods Anu (Bel and Hea were born of)
15. the gods Sar and (Kisar).......

On the reverse of this tablet there are only fragments of the eight lines of colophon, but the restoration of the passage is easy; it reads:—

1. First tablet of "At that time above" (name of Creation series).
2. Palace of Assur-bani-pal king of nations, king of Assyria,
3. to whom Nebo and Tasmit gave broad ears
4. (his) seeing eyes regarded the engraved characters of the tablets;
5. this writing which among the kings who went before me
6. none of them regarded,
7. the secrets of Nebo, the literature of the library as much as is suitable,
8. on tablets I wrote, I engraved, I explained, and
9. for the inspection of my people within my palace I placed.

This colophon will serve to show the value attached to the documents, and the date of the present copies.

The fragment of the obverse, broken as it is, is precious as giving the description of the chaos or desolate void before the Creation of the world, and the first movement of creation. This corresponds with the first two verses of the first chapter of Genesis.

1. “In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth.

2. And the earth was without form and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters.”

On comparing the fragment of the first tablet of the Creation with the extract from Damascius, we do not find any statement as to there being two principles at first called Tauthe and Apason, and these producing Moymis, but in the Creation tablet the first existence is called Mummu Tiamatu, a name meaning “the chaos of the deep.” The compound Mummu Tiamatu, in fact, combines the two names Moymis and Tauthe of Damascius. Tiamatu must also be the same as the Thalatth of Berosus, which we are expressly told was the sea. It should, therefore, be corrected to Thavatth, as M. Lenormant proposed some years ago. It is evident that, according to the notion of the Babylonians, the sea was the origin of all things, and this also agrees with the statement of Genesis i. 2. where the chaotic waters are called tĕhôm, “the deep,” the same word as the Tiamat of the Creation text and the Tauthe of Damascius.

The Assyrian word Mummu is probably connected with the Hebrew mĕhûmâh, confusion, its Accadian equivalent being Umun. Besides the name of the chaotic deep called tĕhôm in Genesis, which is, as has been said, evidently the Tiamat of the Creation text, we have in Genesis the word tohû, waste, desolate, or formless, applied to this chaos. The correspondence between the inscription and Genesis is complete, since both state that a watery chaos preceded the creation, and formed, in fact, the origin and groundwork of the universe. We have here not only an agreement in sense, but, what is rarer, the same word used in both narratives as the name of this chaos, and given also in the account of Damascius.

Next we have in the inscription the creation of the gods Lakhmu and Lakhamu; these are male and female personifications of motion and production, and correspond to the Dache and Dachus of Damascius, and the moving rûakh, the wind, or spirit of Genesis. The next stage in the creation was the production of Sar and Kisar, representing the upper expanse and the lower expanse, and corresponding with the Assorus and Kissare of Damascius. The resemblance in these names is probably even closer than is here represented, since Sar is generally read Assur as a deity in later times, being an ordinary symbol for the supreme god of the Assyrians.

So far as can be made out from the mutilated text, the next step in the creation of the universe was (as in Damascius) the generation of the three great gods, Anu, Elum, and Hea, the Anus, Illinus, and Aus of that writer. Anu here symbolizes the heaven, Elum the earth, and Hea the sea.

It is probable that the inscription went on to relate the generation of the other gods, and then passed to the successive acts of creation by which the world was fashioned.

The successive forms Lakhmu and Lakhamu, Sar and Kisar, are represented in some of the lists of the gods as names or manifestations of Anu and Anatu. These lists were compiled at a time when a school of monotheists had risen in Chaldea, and an attempt was made on the part of its adherents to resolve the various deities of the popular creed into forms of “the one god” Anu. In each case there appears to be a male and female principle, which principles combine in the formation of the universe.

As has been already remarked, the conception of a male and female principle was due to the Semites. Hence it is clear that the system of cosmology embodied in these Creation tablets was of Semitic and not Accadian origin.

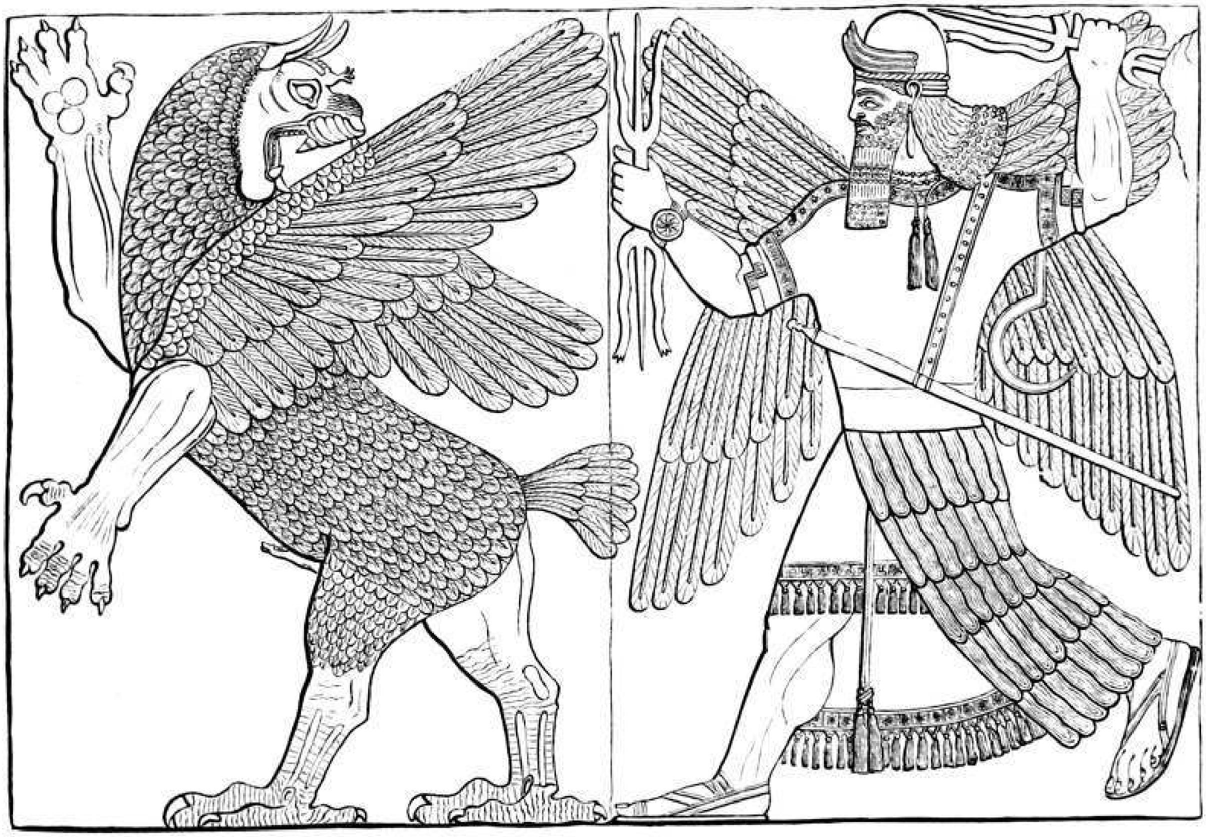
The resemblance between the extract from Damascius and the account in the Creation tablet as to the successive stages or forms of the Creation, is striking, and leaves no doubt about the source of the quotation from the Greek writer.

The three next tablets in the Creation series are absent, there being only two doubtful fragments of this part of the story. Judging from the analogy of the Book of Genesis, we may conjecture that this part of the narrative contained the description of the creation of light, of the atmosphere or firmament, of the dry land, and of plants. One fragment which probably belonged to this space is a small portion of the top of a tablet referring to the fixing of the dry land; but it may belong to a later part of the story, since it is part of a speech to one of the gods. This fragment is—

1. At that time the foundations of the caverns of rock [thou didst make];
2. the foundations of the caverns thou didst call [them] (?)
3. the heaven was named ......
4. to the face of the heaven ......
5. thou didst give ......
6. a man ......

There is a second more doubtful fragment which also may come in here, and, like the last, relate to the creation of the dry land. It is, however, given under reserve—

1. The god Khir ... si ....
2. At that time to the god ....
3. So be it, I concealed thee ....



FIGHT BETWEEN MERODACH (BEL) AND THE DRAGON.

4. from the day that thou ....
5. angry thou didst speak ....
6. The god Assur his mouth opened and spake, to the god ....
7. Above the deep, the seat of ....
8. in front of Bit-Sarra which I have made ...
9. below the place I strengthen ....
10. Let there be made also Bit-Lusu, the seat ..
11. Within it his stronghold may he build and ..
12. At that time from the deep he raised ....
13. the place .... lifted up I made ....
14. above .... heaven ....
15. the place .... lifted up thou didst make.
16. .... the city of Assur the temples of the great gods ....
17. .... his father Anu ....
18. the god .... thee and over all which thy hand has made
19. .... thee, having, over the earth which thy hand has made
20. .... having, Assur which thou hast called its name.

This fragment is both mutilated and obscure, and it is more than doubtful whether it has anything to do with the Creation tablets. It seems rather to be a local legend relating to Assur, the old capital of Assyria, and possibly recording the legend of its foundation. Bit-Sarra or E-Sarra, “the temple of the legions,” was dedicated to Ninip, and forms part of the name of Tiglath-Pileser (Tuculti-pal-esara “Servant of the son of Bit-Sarra,” i.e. Ninip). It seems to have denoted the firmament, the “legions” or “hosts” referring to the multitudinous spirits of heaven. The Biblical expression “the Lord of hosts” may be compared.

The next recognizable portion of the Creation legends is the upper part of the fifth tablet, which gives the creation of the heavenly bodies, and runs parallel to the account of the fourth day of creation in Genesis.

This tablet opens as follows:—

Fifth Tablet of Creation Legend.

Obverse.

1. (Anu) made suitable the mansions of the (seven) great gods.
2. The stars he placed in them, the lumasi[8] he fixed.
